

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

---

CONDUCTED BY E. LITTELL.

---

VOL. I.

FROM 11 APRIL TO 3 AUGUST, 1844.

FOR CONTENTS OF THIS VOLUME

SEE PAGES 1, 65, 129, 193, 257, 321, 385, 449, 513, 577, 641, 705.

---

BOSTON:
PUBLISHED BY E. LITTELL & CO.

506826

AP2
26-455

30 20 10 0

INDEX TO VOL. I. OF LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

|   |  |   |                              |
|---|--|---|------------------------------|
| inger, Lord, . . . . .                          | 436  | Free Thinker, . . . . .                         | 145                          |
| ouchement of the Queen, . . . . .               | 586  | French Cookery, . . . . .                       | 49                           |
| advice to Young Men, . . . . .                  | 438  | French Novels, . . . . .                        | 387                          |
| Alfred, King : a Poem, . . . . .                | 439  | French Songs, . . . . .                         | 531                          |
| Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression, . . . . . | 289  | Girardin, Mad. De, . . . . .                    | 545                          |
| Ancient Institutions, . . . . .                 | 673  | Grant, Mrs., of Laggan, . . . . .               | 419                          |
| Anonymous Letter, . . . . .                     | 62   | Greece, . . . . .                               | 76                           |
| Antiquarian Intelligence, . . . . .             | 395  | Groans of the Internal Genii, . . . . .         | 541                          |
| Atmospheric Railway, . . . . .                  | 302, 475                                   | Guano, . . . . .                                | 197, 207, 344                |
| Bank of England, . . . . .                      | 582  | Halleck Fitz Greene, . . . . .                  | 41                           |
| Barère's Memoirs, . . . . .                     | 93   | Hay's Western Barbary, . . . . .                | 458, 668, 676                |
| Barnfield, Richard, . . . . .                   | 246  | Hayti, . . . . .                                | 284                          |
| Bayley, T. Haynes, . . . . .                    | 442  | Highlands of Ethiopia, . . . . .                | 368                          |
| Bernadotte, . . . . .                           | 269, 298                                   | Hood, Mr., . . . . .                            | 642                          |
| Books for Working Class, . . . . .              | 343  | House of Mourning, . . . . .                    | 435                          |
| Brigands in Spain, . . . . .                    | 536  | Hume, and his Influence upon History, . . . . . | 161                          |
| British Fleet, . . . . .                        | 78   | Hunt on Light, . . . . .                        | 213                          |
| British Institutions, . . . . .                 | 591  | Hunt's Poetical Works, . . . . .                | 342                          |
| Brougham Vindicated, . . . . .                  | 291  | Howitt's German Experiences, . . . . .          | 671, 757                     |
| Brummel, George, . . . . .                      | 195, 268, 333                              | Hypochondriac, . . . . .                        | 482                          |
| Bryant, William Cullen, . . . . .               | 42   | Import Duties, . . . . .                        | 582                          |
| Budget, . . . . .                               | 270  | India, . . . . .                                | 280                          |
| Butler's (Bishop) Writings, . . . . .           | 691  | Irish State Trials, . . . . .                   | 471                          |
| Campbell, Thomas, . . . . .                     | 706  | Irish Travelling Anecdote, . . . . .            | 255                          |
| Cape Town, . . . . .                            | 756  | Italy, . . . . .                                | 202, 582                     |
| Cheapest Nation in the World, . . . . .         | 340  | Jerusalem at Sunset, . . . . .                  | 679                          |
| Cheap Books, . . . . .                          | 496  | Joinville, Prince De, . . . . .                 | 468, 469, 470, 474, 589      |
| Chess Studies, . . . . .                        | 263  | Judges' Sentences, . . . . .                    | 590                          |
| Chess Match, . . . . .                          | 266  | Kendall's Santa Fé, . . . . .                   | 346                          |
| Children's Books, . . . . .                     | 296  | Knight Charles, . . . . .                       | 583                          |
| China, . . . . .                                | 212, 285, 582                              | Laissez-Faire, Bigotry of, . . . . .            | 338                          |
| Church, The, . . . . .                          | 581  | Lakes, Rise and Fall of, . . . . .              | 523                          |
| Client's Story, . . . . .                       | 87   | Land Draining, . . . . .                        | 681                          |
| Coöperative Principle, . . . . .                | 591  | Last Citation, . . . . .                        | 445                          |
| Copyright, International, . . . . .             | 473  | Law Reform, . . . . .                           | 276                          |
| Corday Charlotte, . . . . .                     | 440, 560                                   | Leghorn, Adventure at, . . . . .                | 501                          |
| Correspondence, . . . . .                       | { 2, 66, 130, 194, 258, 322, 396, 450, 514 | Longfellow, H. W., . . . . .                    | 42                           |
| Cranberry, . . . . .                            | 485  | Louis Philippe, . . . . .                       | 221, 276, 343                |
| Criminal Law, . . . . .                         | 270  | Lunar Eclipse, . . . . .                        | 467                          |
| Crockford, Mr., . . . . .                       | 466  | Mann's Report on Education, . . . . .           | 428                          |
| Crusades, Influence of, . . . . .               | 360  | Marlborough, . . . . .                          | 593                          |
| Cuba, Slavery in, . . . . .                     | 206  | Marlow, Christopher, . . . . .                  | 245                          |
| Currency, . . . . .                             | 271, 274, 275, 469, 582                    | Mauvais Pas, . . . . .                          | 44                           |
| Custom House Frauds, . . . . .                  | 465  | Mexico as it was, and as it is, . . . . .       | 533                          |
| D'Angoulême, Duc, . . . . .                     | 583  | Mirrors, . . . . .                              | 684                          |
| Deaf, Dumb and Blind, . . . . .                 | 759  | Mistresses, Masters, and Servants, . . . . .    | 540                          |
| Debt, Imprisonment for, . . . . .               | 270  | Monster Misery of Literature, . . . . .         | 659                          |
| Deceased People, . . . . .                      | 222  | Morocco, . . . . .                              | 578                          |
| D'Engbien, Duc, his murder, . . . . .           | 739  | Napoleon, . . . . .                             | 134, 666                     |
| De Lille and Napoleon, . . . . .                | 524  | Nemesis War Steamer, . . . . .                  | 212                          |
| Dodo, . . . . .                                 | 331  | New Faith, . . . . .                            | 189                          |
| Duelling and its Punishment, . . . . .          | 160  | News of the Week, . . . . .                     | 270                          |
| Duke of Sussex, . . . . .                       | 453  | Newspapers, . . . . .                           | 274                          |
| Dunbar William, . . . . .                       | 382  | Nicholas' Visit to England, . . . . .           | 264, 275, 583, 584, 585, 688 |
| East India Company, . . . . .                   | 272  | Niger, Intercourse with, . . . . .              | 465                          |
| Edward, Charles, Letter from, . . . . .         | 33   | Night before the Duel, . . . . .                | 135                          |
| Eldon, Lord, . . . . .                          | 717  | Nile, . . . . .                                 | 51, 81, 207                  |
| Ellenborough, . . . . .                         | 270, 272, 279, 465                         | O'Connell, . . . . .                            | 470, 579, 580                |
| Emerson Ralph Waldo, . . . . .                  | 41   | Orleans, Duchess of, her Letters, . . . . .     | 478, 679                     |
| Engraving, . . . . .                            | 491  | Our Family, . . . . .                           | 137, 707                     |
| English in China, . . . . .                     | 462  | Paris Exhibition, . . . . .                     | 217                          |
| Espartero, Forced March, . . . . .              | 259  | Peel Government, . . . . .                      | 753                          |
| Featherstonhaugh's Slave States, . . . . .      | 674  | Philadelphia Mobs, . . . . .                    | 590                          |
| First Offence, . . . . .                        | 131  | Political Judges, . . . . .                     | 337                          |
| Flame in Volcanoes, . . . . .                   | 209  | Polka, . . . . .                                | 521                          |
| Fortnight of Europe, . . . . .                  | 578  |   |                              |

|   |                         |                                     |                  |
|---|-------------------------|-------------------------------------|------------------|
| Popery in America, . . . . .                                      | 544                     | Enigmas, . . . . .                  | 40, 63, 336, 349 |
| Post-Office, . . . . .  | 286, 287                | Excessive Fruit Pie, . . . .        | 642              |
| Postage, Penny, . . . . .   | 87, 221                 | Family Meeting, . . . . .           | 77               |
| Prescott's Conquest of Mexico, . . . .                            | 10                      | First Warbler, . . . . .            | 218              |
| Present Struggles and Final Issues, . .                           | 401                     | Footsteps of Angels, . . . .        | 448              |
| Prize Preface, . . . . .  | 673                     | Fragment, . . . . .                 | 61               |
| Railway Carriages, . . . . .                                      | 685                     | German Weaver's Song, . . . .       | 453              |
| Rock, Structure of, . . . . .                                     | 683                     | Gladness of May, . . . . .          | 217              |
| Rolle, Richard, . . . . .   | 382                     | Good Emperor, . . . . .             | 673              |
| Roly-Poly Martyrs, . . . . .                                      | 466                     | Good Wife, . . . . .                | 766              |
| Royal George Billiard Table, . . . . .                            | 64                      | Greenwood Shrift, . . . . .         | 85               |
| Sandwich Islands, Scenes, &c., . . . .                            | 390                     | Hair Cutting, . . . . .             | 528              |
| Saxony, King of, . . . . .  | 286, 473                | Heart of the Bruce, . . . . .       | 750              |
| Scottish Dialect, . . . . .                                       | 411                     | Hope, . . . . .                     | 751              |
| Shetland, Life in, . . . . .                                      | 406                     | Husband to his Latch Key, . . .     | 256              |
| Shopping in London, . . . . .                                     | 250                     | I'd be a Parody, . . . . .          | 509              |
| Sidney Smith and Mr. Everett, . . . .                             | 204                     | I envy thee, thou careless wind, .  | 61               |
| Simpson's Discoveries on the North Coastof America, . . . . . | 3                       | I gazed upon a Landscape, . . .     | 672              |
| Slaver, Scenes on Board, . . . . .                                | 425                     | Immortality, . . . . .              | 591              |
| Slavery, Anti-, People, . . . . .                                 | 588                     | Jenny's First Love Letter, . . .    | 555              |
| Sliding Scale of Manners, . . . . .                               | 353                     | Joinville, Dream of, . . . . .      | 589              |
| Song of a German Weaver, . . . . .                                | 453                     | Kingdom of Christ, . . . . .        | 658              |
| Steam Ships for War, . . . . .                                    | 589                     | Last Wish, . . . . .                | 341              |
| Stoddart and Conolly, . . . . .                                   | 208                     | Little Frenchman's First Lesson, .  | 266              |
| Stuttgart Literary Union, . . . . .                               | 497                     | Little Leonard's Good Night, . .    | 705              |
| St. Vincent, Admiral, . . . . .                                   | 225                     | To M——, . . . . .                   | 40               |
| Submarine Researches, . . . . .                                   | 199                     | May Fashions, . . . . .             | 388              |
| Sugar and Slavery, . . . . .                                      | 470, 586                | Malbrough, . . . . .                | 532              |
| Sugar Duties, . . . . .   | 581, 588                | My Countrymen, Liberty calls you, . | 69               |
| Sweden, . . . . .   | 286                     | Naebody kens ye, . . . . .          | 582              |
| Sylvester, Joshua, . . . . .                                      | 246                     | O come to me now, . . . . .         | 61               |
| Tahiti, . . . . .   | 295                     | Old Man's Reverie, . . . . .        | 640              |
| Tailor Creditor, . . . . .  | 67                      | Omen, . . . . .                     | 266              |
| Texas, . . . . .  | 271, 281, 282, 467, 687 | Pauper's Christmas Carol, . . .     | 192              |
| Thoughts on being sent for, . . . . .                             | 754                     | Poet's Lament, . . . . .            | 475              |
| Threatening Letter, . . . . .                                     | 281                     | Polka, . . . . .                    | 205              |
| Topics of the Day, . . . . .                                      | 272, 465                | Poor Man to his Dead Child, . .     | 381              |
| Turkey, . . . . .   | 202, 583                | Prophetic Echo, . . . . .           | 349              |
| United States, Moral Prospects, . . . .                           | 276                     | Resurrection, . . . . .             | 658              |
| News from, . . . . .  | 471                     | Shooting, Going out a, . . . . .    | 206              |
| Vienna, Congress of, . . . . .                                    | 566                     | Song for the Million, . . . . .     | 92               |
| Walpole's Letters, . . . . .                                      | 351                     | Song of the Season, . . . . .       | 260              |
| Wanderings of a Journeyman Tailor, . .                            | 563                     | Song of the Session, . . . . .      | 654              |
| Waterloo Banquet, . . . . .                                       | 755                     | Spring, a new version, . . . . .    | 481              |
| Willfulness of Woman, . . . . .                                   | 352                     | Spring Shower, . . . . .            | 42               |
| Wine, A Tale, . . . . .   | 710                     | Stolen Kiss, . . . . .              | 61               |
| Wolff, Dr., . . . . .   | 208                     | Summer Midnight, . . . . .          | 565              |
| Wood Engravers, Female, . . . . .                                 | 485                     | Swallows on the Eve of Departure, . | 522              |
| Zollverein, . . . . .   | 278, 582                | Swan and the Eagle, . . . . .       | 591              |

POETRY.

|  |     |                                     |     |
|--|-----|-------------------------------------|-----|
| Afar in the Desert, . . . . .          | 752 | 'Tis Past, the fond, . . . . .      | 753 |
| Age-fearing, . . . . .                 | 332 | The verdant sunbeam gaily sweeps, . | 220 |
| Benevolent Rustic, . . . . .           | 749 | Thy smiles; thy talk, . . . . .     | 766 |
| Birth Day Prophecy, . . . . .          | 211 | Trooper's Song, . . . . .           | 336 |
| Breakfast—what shall I have, . . . .   | 136 | Try Again, . . . . .                | 341 |
| Bridge of Sighs, . . . . .             | 198 | Vale Crucis, . . . . .              | 76  |
| Brooklet, . . . . .                    | 704 | Village Blacksmith, . . . . .       | 86  |
| Brougham, Lord, . . . . .              | 661 | Well I remember, . . . . .          | 473 |
| Casa Wappy, . . . . .                  | 133 | When courting slumber, . . . . .    | 622 |
| Child's Warning, . . . . .             | 77  | When heavenly sounds, . . . . .     | 63  |
| Columbus, . . . . .                    | 527 | White, Bishop, . . . . .            | 520 |
| Come gentle Sleep, . . . . .           | 76  | White Slave, . . . . .              | 476 |
| Disgusted wife to her Husband, . . . . | 218 | Why do the flowers bloom, . . . .   | 208 |
| Eagle, The . . . . .                   | 766 | Why thus longing, . . . . .         | 690 |
| Emigrant Mother, . . . . .             | 192 | Wild Bird, To a, . . . . .          | 381 |
| Emigrants of San Tomasso, . . . . .    | 188 | Woman's Destiny, . . . . .          | 665 |
|  |     | Workhouse Clock, . . . . .          | 218 |
|  |     | Yes, labor, love, . . . . .         | 64  |

SCRAPS.

|                                      |          |                                       |                    |
|--------------------------------------|----------|---------------------------------------|--------------------|
| Accident, . . . . .                  | 287      | Jews in Russia, . . . . .             | 350                |
| Ages of Sovereigns, . . . . .        | 649      | "    Restoration of, . . . . .        | 207                |
| Agricultural College, . . . . .      | 194      | Legal Examination, . . . . .          | 80                 |
| Albert, Prince, . . . . .            | 134      | Leprosy, New Brunawick, . . . . .     | 288                |
| American Doings, . . . . .           | 480      | Lifts for Lazy Lawyers, . . . . .     | 85, 160            |
| Anti-State Church, . . . . .         | 286      | Liverpool Merchant, . . . . .         | 286                |
| Ant Lion, . . . . .                  | 434      | Lover's Irish Evenings, . . . . .     | 392                |
| Art Union, . . . . .                 | 336      | Love of Country, . . . . .            | 330                |
| Baby Wanted, . . . . .               | 208      | Madeira, Persecution in, . . . . .    | 472                |
| Bar to Marriage, . . . . .           | 285      | Manufacturing Pressures, . . . . .    | 434                |
| Barnvelt and Grotius, . . . . .      | 400      | Marriage, Wholesale, . . . . .        | 285                |
| Bedstead, Romance of, . . . . .      | 665      | Marked Man, . . . . .                 | 288                |
| Birth in a Wheelbarrow, . . . . .    | 285      | Medicine, Encouragement of, . . . . . | 475                |
| Black Spots on Leaves, . . . . .     | 447      | Minister and his Friends, . . . . .   | 749                |
| Blind, London Society for, . . . . . | 207      | Napoleon and Wellington, . . . . .    | 134                |
| Buried Treasure, . . . . .           | 288      | Napoleon's Furniture, . . . . .       | 286                |
| Burns and Clarinda, . . . . .        | 480      | Neapolitan Mss., . . . . .            | 265                |
| Buttons from Clay, . . . . .         | 441      | Notices of Motion, . . . . .          | 537                |
| Cairo, . . . . .                     | 640      | Odd Turn of the Wheel, . . . . .      | 766                |
| Cast Iron Pulpit, . . . . .          | 295      | Ojibbeway Indians, . . . . .          | 217, 264, 265, 269 |
| Cheeryble, Brothers, . . . . .       | 92       | Old and New Style, . . . . .          | 365                |
| Cheering Sentiments, . . . . .       | 654      | Old Beau bit, . . . . .               | 384                |
| Chinese Smokers, . . . . .           | 194      | Panorama of Hong-kong, . . . . .      | 350                |
| Christian Sepulchre, . . . . .       | 265      | Paper Making, . . . . .               | 217                |
| Church Convocation, . . . . .        | 224      | Parent and Child, . . . . .           | 248                |
| Church Needle-work, . . . . .        | 130      | Peccavi, . . . . .                    | 352                |
| Coinage of Saxe Coburg, . . . . .    | 665      | Peninsular War, . . . . .             | 642                |
| Coke, Lady Mary, . . . . .           | 477      | Pennsylvania Law, . . . . .           | 207                |
| Communion Services, . . . . .        | 295      | Play Writers, . . . . .               | 532                |
| Concerts of Sivori, . . . . .        | 339      | Pole Cats of the Press, . . . . .     | 136                |
| Convict, Aristocratic, . . . . .     | 285      | Port Wine, . . . . .                  | 430                |
| Country in Danger, . . . . .         | 254      | Potatoes, with bones in, . . . . .    | 360                |
| Credulity, . . . . .                 | 265      | Press on, . . . . .                   | 758                |
| Dickens, Charles, . . . . .          | 295      | Prussian King, . . . . .              | 248                |
| Distressed Needle-Women, . . . . .   | 265      | Quick Travelling, . . . . .           | 265                |
| Diving Bell, . . . . .               | 336      | Railways for the Million, . . . . .   | 136                |
| Drunkenness and Murder, . . . . .    | 287      | "    in France, . . . . .             | 202                |
| Due Proportions, . . . . .           | 288      | Rope, a stout, . . . . .              | 285                |
| Dublin Shoe Black, . . . . .         | 448      | Rapid Growth of Plants, . . . . .     | 709                |
| Encouraging Hints, . . . . .         | 448      | Salmon Fishing, . . . . .             | 288                |
| English Vocalists, . . . . .         | 286      | Scotland, Income of, . . . . .        | 295                |
| Espartero, . . . . .                 | 288      | Scripture Readers, . . . . .          | 235                |
| Exhumation from Guano, . . . . .     | 207      | Shakespeare at Court, . . . . .       | 332                |
| Family Bottle, . . . . .             | 285      | Sheriff's Officers, . . . . .         | 268                |
| Fantastic Conceptions, . . . . .     | 709      | Slavery in France, . . . . .          | 343                |
| Female Friendship, . . . . .         | 384      | Slips of the Tongue, . . . . .        | 341                |
| Fine Arts, . . . . .                 | 286, 287 | Spanish Intelligence—Punch, . . . . . | 92                 |
| First Hamburg Whaler, . . . . .      | 687      | Strong Wind in St. Martins, . . . . . | 264, 265           |
| Fowling Piece, . . . . .             | 448      | Submarine Plough, . . . . .           | 341                |
| Foxes nursed by a Dog, . . . . .     | 285      | Suffocation, Preventive, . . . . .    | 287                |
| French Savings Bank, . . . . .       | 496      | Stuckey's Patent Filter, . . . . .    | 349                |
| Galvanic Telegraph, . . . . .        | 265      | Syrian Medical Aid, . . . . .         | 265                |
| Geographical Intelligence, . . . . . | 473      | Tagua Nut, . . . . .                  | 476                |
| Gipsy Wit, . . . . .                 | 285      | Taxation of Mottoes, . . . . .        | 339                |
| Glaciærum, . . . . .                 | 201      | Walks, Public, . . . . .              | 295                |
| Glory, . . . . .                     | 509      | White Crows, . . . . .                | 288                |
| Governesses Institution, . . . . .   | 285      | White Lead, Substitute, . . . . .     | 658                |
| Great Business, . . . . .            | 330      | Woodpaving, . . . . .                 | 288                |
| Habit, Effect of, . . . . .          | 523      | Writing under Difficulties, . . . . . | 349                |
| Hanover, King of, . . . . .          | 249      | TALES.                                |                    |
| Heartless Spoliations, . . . . .     | 132      |                                       |                    |
| Hint to Publicists, . . . . .        | 330      | Annie Macleod, . . . . .              | 538                |
| Holy Thursday in Vienna, . . . . .   | 207      | Anonymous Letter, . . . . .           | 62                 |
| Hot-Bed, . . . . .                   | 649      | Arabella, . . . . .                   | 623                |
| Hume's Letters, . . . . .            | 473      | Client's Story, . . . . .             | 87                 |
| Indian Oxen, . . . . .               | 194      | Connor M'Gloghlin, . . . . .          | 628                |
| India Rubber Making, . . . . .       | 288      | Dream, The, . . . . .                 | 625                |
| Jews, Diplomats, . . . . .           | 288      | First Offence, . . . . .              | 131                |
|                                      |          | Free Thinker, . . . . .               | 145                |

|                                    |          |                                     |                    |
|------------------------------------|----------|-------------------------------------|--------------------|
| Hair Cutting, . . . . .            | 528      | Explosive Mixtures, . . . . .       | 686                |
| Hermit of Cripplegate, . . . . .   | 361      | Fossil Man, . . . . .               | 686                |
| Hypochondriac, . . . . .           | 482      |                                     |                    |
| Insurance and Assurance, . . . . . | 662      | FOREIGN POLITICS.                   |                    |
| Love and Authorship, . . . . .     | 643      | Italy, . . . . .                    | 202                |
| Love Child, . . . . .              | 486      | France, . . . . .                   | 202, 283, 477, 580 |
| Lost Jager, . . . . .              | 515      | Turkey, . . . . .                   | 202, 583           |
| Man of Genius, . . . . .           | 323      | Portugal, . . . . .                 | 224                |
| Mauvais Pas, . . . . .             | 44       | Hungary, . . . . .                  | 224                |
| Our Family, . . . . .              | 137, 707 | Circassia, . . . . .                | 269                |
| Partie Fine, . . . . .             | 214, 623 | Spain, . . . . .                    | 283                |
| Power of Friendship, . . . . .     | 219      | Prussia, . . . . .                  | 286                |
| Son and Heir, . . . . .            | 650      | Morocco, . . . . .                  | 578                |
| Susan Oliphant, . . . . .          | 556      | Tahiti, . . . . .                   | 295                |
| Tailor Creditor, . . . . .         | 67       | Algiers, . . . . .                  | 581                |
| Ten Pounds, . . . . .              | 431      | Russia, . . . . .                   | 687                |
| Tea Rose, . . . . .                | 451      |                                     |                    |
| Wedding in Back Woods, . . . . .   | 503      | NOTICES OF BOOKS.                   |                    |
| Wine, . . . . .                    | 710      | American Criminal Trials, . . . . . | 128                |

BIOGRAPHY.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| Christian Frederic Schwartz, . . . . . | 510 |
| John Parish Robertson, . . . . .       | 506 |
| John Wicklif, . . . . .                | 655 |
| Lord Eldon, . . . . .                  | 717 |

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

|  |          |
|--|----------|
| Amber, . . . . .                       | 393      |
| Professor Bache, . . . . .             | 393      |
| Royal Library, Copenhagen, . . . . .   | 393      |
| Explosion of Water, . . . . .          | 393      |
| Institution Civil Engineers, . . . . . | 393, 685 |
| Royal Institution, . . . . .           | 394, 674 |
| Societies of Arts, . . . . .           | 395, 686 |
| Paris Academy, . . . . .               | 395, 686 |
| Geographical, . . . . .                | 473      |
| Chemical Discovery, . . . . .          | 520      |
| Appletrees, Planting, . . . . .        | 523      |
| Pneumatic Apparatus, . . . . .         | 686      |
| Draining Land, . . . . .               | 681      |
| Rocks, Structure of, . . . . .         | 683      |
| Mirrors, . . . . .                     | 684      |
| Railway Carriage, . . . . .            | 685      |
| Horticultural Society, . . . . .       | 686      |
| Celestial Mechanism, . . . . .         | 686      |
| Spontaneous Locomotion, . . . . .      | 686      |

|                                      |     |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| Thomson's Scottish Music, . . . . .  | 128 |
| Picture Gallery, . . . . .           | 128 |
| Military Annual, 1844, . . . . .     | 204 |
| Nelson's Letters, . . . . .          | 263 |
| Religio Medici, . . . . .            | 508 |
| Wellington's Despatches, . . . . .   | 537 |
| Gentleman's Toilet, . . . . .        | 544 |
| North British Review, . . . . .      | 639 |
| Psalms of David, . . . . .           | 661 |
| Uncle Sam's Peculiarities, . . . . . | 661 |
| Silent Love, . . . . .               | 690 |
| Pilgrim's Progress, . . . . .        | 752 |
| Forlorn Hope, . . . . .              | 758 |

OBITUARY.

|                                   |     |
|-----------------------------------|-----|
| Thorwaldson, . . . . .            | 205 |
| J. Pitts, . . . . .               | 208 |
| W. Beckford, Esq., . . . . .      | 269 |
| W. Beckford, . . . . .            | 396 |
| J. H. Merivale, . . . . .         | 397 |
| Earl of Lonsdale, . . . . .       | 398 |
| Don Augustin Arguelles, . . . . . | 398 |
| Sir Henry Halford, . . . . .      | 399 |
| George Lackington, . . . . .      | 400 |
| Miss Sarah Martin, . . . . .      | 529 |
| James Wadsworth, . . . . .        | 543 |
| Duc D'Angoulême, . . . . .        | 583 |

THE LIVING AGE.

---

No. I.—11 MAY, 1844.

---

CONTENTS.

|   |                                    | PAGE. |
|---|------------------------------------|-------|
| 1. Simpson's Discoveries on the North Coast of America, . . . | Quarterly Review,           | 3     |
| 2. Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico, . . . . .    | Do.                         | 10    |
| 3. Letter from Charles Edwards, Esq., . . . . .               | Blackwood's Magazine,       | 33    |
| 4. Ralph Waldo Emerson, . . . . .                             | Foreign Quarterly Review,   | 41    |
| 5. Fitz-Greene Halleck, . . . . .                             | Do.                         | 41    |
| 6. W. C. Bryant, . . . . .                                    | Do.                         | 42    |
| 7. H. W. Longfellow, . . . . .                                | Do.                         | 42    |
| 8. The Mauvais Pas, . . . . .                                 | Blackwood's Magazine,       | 44    |
| 9. On French Cookery, . . . . .                               | London Magazine,            | 49    |
| 10. The Nile—Its Battles—Cairo, . . . . .                     | Dublin University Magazine, | 51    |
| 11. The Anonymous Letter, . . . . .                           | Monthly Magazine,           | 62    |
| 12. The Queen—Royal George and Billiard Table, . . . .        | Punch,                      | 64    |

POETRY.

|   |   |
|---|---|
| Oh, ask me not how long, . . . . . 40         | I envy thee, thou careless wind, . . . . . 61 |
| Sir Hilary charged at Agincourt, . . . . . 40 | Come from my first, aye come, . . . . . 63    |
| The Spring Shower, . . . . . 43               | When heavenly sounds, . . . . . 63            |
| Oh come to me now, . . . . . 61               | Yes, labor, love! . . . . . 64                |
| The Stolen Kiss, . . . . . 61                 |   |

BOSTON:

E. LITTELL & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

---

BOSTON.—REDDING & CO.—JORDAN & CO.—W. B. KIMBALL—BRINARD & CO.

NEW YORK.—BURGESS & STRINGER—MOWATT & CO.—SUN OFFICE.

PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUSE & CANNING—BERFORD & CO.—ZIEBER & CO.

BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.

ALBANY.—GEORGE JONES.

CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.

NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Office of the Living Age.

THE FIRST STEP is not always the only difficulty; it is not so in a journal; but it is a difficulty. There is so much to be done in organizing a new office, and preparing so large a number as this, that we have been delayed a week longer than we intended. Finding that we should necessarily be slow, until we can "get the steam up," we determined not to attempt to do more than to show, in a first number, the size, general appearance, and about the weight of our matter. So that our readers will not find the gloss of novelty on every article;—not, for instance, on the excellent review of Prescott's Conquest of Mexico;—but we should not have been willing under any circumstances to fail to appropriate so hearty a commendation, by such high authority, of an American author.

We lose much by the absence of MISCELLANY, SCIENCE, ART, OBITUARY, which will be regular heads in our work; and also by not including any English political speculations—or even the slight view of domestic affairs which comes within our plan.

Even as it is, we publish before we are quite prepared, and shall be obliged to delay our second number till the 25th—making an interval of a fortnight.

We hope our Southern and Western correspondents will not give us up because we have annexed New England. We cannot agree to the dissolution of the union which has subsisted between us for so many years. It is to their advantage that we should have the most favorable post for our army of observation, that is, our printing-office. We shall here receive the foreign periodicals earliest;—we shall have the best communication with western New York, and with the countries bordering on the lakes (north as well as south; ) and we hope that we shall receive a kindly welcome to many new post-offices in this part of the country. No time will be lost in the transmission of the work to distant subscribers, and the advantage of appearing four times as often as before will make our matter fresher than it was in the Museum, even to Philadelphia subscribers. We beg leave to borrow for a moment from our friend the New York Albion his motto, "CÆLUM, NON ANIMUM, MUTANT, QUI TRANS MARE CURRUNT;"—which means, when done into English, that we are as desirous of continuing and increasing our business to the south and west as ever.

As we go to press we hear the noise of the steamer's arrival, and that our periodicals are on board, but we cannot use them for this number.

We shall have abundant time and opportunity for treating of the matter of Texas, on its rebound from Europe in about a month. But we wish to say a few words in the mean time. Finally, and we hope not dishonorably, we shall probably be united to that territory, and the coasters of New England will have a home voyage equal in length to a passage to Europe. Apart from the constitutional question—and the still more important point of good faith to Mexico—the principal excitement relates to the matter of slavery. The National Intelligencer has an article addressed to Southern readers, in which it gives very good reasons for supposing that the effect of annexation will be to draw a large part of the population from Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky and Missouri—and that the vacated lands will be settled by emigration from Pennsylvania and other free states, and cultivated by free labor; and that these states may be expected to become free states. This is our opinion, based upon some knowledge of the process which has already begun there. Besides this, it appears by Mr. Clay's letter, that not more than half of Texas itself is fit for slave labor;—and this consideration, as he well observes, may lessen the avidity of the south, and the opposition of the north, so far as these feelings are founded upon political considerations. We do not believe that the acquisition of Texas will increase the political power of the slave states—and we hope that the whole matter may be considered on its own merits.

That England would take Texas, if it could be quietly accomplished, we doubt not. But that could not be done without war with us, and we hope that for that she has no more disposition than we have. We need not fear any rival: the bride is very willing, and we think will be constant: we shall have time for a regular marriage; and need not disgrace ourselves by a runaway match.

From the Quarterly Review.

Narrative of the Discoveries on the North Coast of America, effected by the Officers of the Hudson's Bay Company, during the years 1836—39. BY THOMAS SIMPSON, Esq. 8 vo. London; 1843.

THIS, the last page in the history of the British arctic exploration, is a melancholy one; for though the task undertaken was gallantly and successfully accomplished, the publication is posthumous, and the adventurous author lived not to wear the laurels so honorably won. His own recital is one which must be read by his countrymen with satisfaction, only impaired by regret for his melancholy and mysterious fate. Its style, remarkable even beyond that of his recent predecessors for concision, is, like theirs, of that simple and unpretending character which best becomes the narrative of real enterprise and endurance. The achievements it records place the author's name on the long list of British worthies which begins with Frobisher. The utility of such achievements may indeed be questioned. To what purpose are the realms of all but eternal winter invaded by such repeated incursions? Why expose the nose of man to the blast of the barrens, with the thermometer at  $60^{\circ}$  below zero: and when government, weary of its efforts, abandons the task, why should officials of the Hudson's Bay Company exchange their proper functions as purveyors of peltry for those of navigators and geographers? The answer to all such utilitarian interrogatories rises spontaneously to the lips of every one who takes an interest either in the advancement of science or the honor of England. We are indeed no longer lured, like our ancestors, by the prospect of commercial advantages from a north-western communication with Japan or Cathay; but, without condescending to argue the question, we regret no past, we shall grudge no future expenditure, whether of money or heroism, which may have contributed, or hereafter may contribute, to the final discharge of one of Great Britain's proper functions, the survey of the coastline of North America. This primary object attained, it will yet remain to be shown that the North Pole itself is inaccessible, and that the difficulties of a north-west passage are insurmountable by British navigators. On both these questions we venture to refer our readers to our article, of the year 1840, on Wrangell's expedition, vol. lxvi. p. 444.

Meanwhile the Franklins, the Backs, and the Simpsons have left but little to be achieved towards the accomplishment of the coast survey. The extent of the hiatus remaining on our maps will be best understood by a reference to Mr. Simpson's instructions and the objects embraced in his enterprise. We call them Mr. Simpson's instructions in virtue of his authorship, and without fear of exciting any jealousy on the part of the able and veteran chief of the expedition, Mr. Dease, who appears to have conceded to his youthful subordinate, when occasion permitted, precedence in labor and fatigue, as well as in the scientific operations of the expedition, which were entirely in Mr. Simpson's hands. Mr. Dease's merits and services are well known to the readers of Franklin and Back. The first object indicated in the instructions issued by the Hudson's Bay Company Directors, was the completion of that part of the coast survey to the westward of the Mackenzie River which had been left unfinished by Franklin and Beechey in 1826. Such of our readers as have not recently pored over the additions to our arctic maps, contributed by successive expeditions, have to be reminded that in that year a combined operation was conducted, from the Pacific by Captain Beechey, from the mouth of the Mackenzie River by Captain Franklin, in the hope that the two parties might meet somewhere on the coast. They failed in effecting their junction, but how nearly they succeeded, the following dates and positions will show.

On the 18th of August, the barge of Captain Beechey's vessel, the Blossom, quitted that shore off Icy Cape, and on the 22d, reached longitude  $156^{\circ} 21' W.$ , some 120 miles to the eastward of their point of departure. Hence, after being embedded for some days in ice, and after her commander, Mr. Elson, had made up his mind to abandon her and return on foot, she was fortunately extricated, and made sail again to rejoin the Blossom on the 25th. On the 16th of August Captain Franklin reached longitude  $138^{\circ} 52' W.$  and on the 17th, the weather cleared sufficient to allow him, as he believed, to ascertain the position of a point of land to the westward, which he named after Captain Beechey; at which point he writes, longitude  $149^{\circ} 27'$ , "our discoveries terminated." "Could I have known," he continues "or by any possibility imagined, that a party from the Blossom had been at the distance of only 16 miles from me, no difficulties, no dangers, no discouraging circumstances, should have prevailed upon me to return." It is a satisfaction to know that, in Sir John Franklin's own opinion, founded on subsequent information, the attempt would have been fruitless, and probably fatal to all concerned. This interval, therefore, of somewhat less than 7 of longitude (averaging 23 miles to a degree, was all that, since 1826, remained to complete the survey from Mackenzie River westward to the Pacific; and that completion was indicated in the instructions as the first object of the expedition. It will be seen that it was effectually and speedily accomplished.

To the eastward a wider field was open to conjecture and discovery. In 1826, while Franklin was working to the west, his admirable coadjutor Richardson had surveyed the interval between the Mackenzie and Coppermine rivers. In 1833 Captain Back descended the Tlewocho, and Great Fish River, to its estuary; but he had been able to survey but little of the neighboring coast in either direction; and, with the exception of this point, the region between the 115th and 83d degrees of longitude, from the Coppermine River to the offshoot, called Melville Peninsula, was still unexplored. It would appear from the instructions that the exploration of this interval to its full eastward extent did not enter into the immediate contemplation of the directors. The party is merely instructed, starting from the Coppermine, to reach, if possible, the scene of Captain Back's discoveries; deciding, as in case of success it must, on its way the question at issue between Sir John Ross and Sir George Back, whether Boothia, the land so named by the former officer, be a peninsula joined on to the main land to the west of the Flewchocho, or whether, as Back opined, a strait existed which had escaped Ross's observation. It will be seen that Mr. Simpson more than performed the service indicated in this instruction; that, after discovering and passing through the trait suspected by Sir G. Back, and thus disposing of the presumed peninsula, and of Sir J. Ross's famous discovery of a difference of level between the seas on either side, he followed the coast-line to some little extent beyond the point where Back was repelled by the advanced state of the season. From this summary it will be seen that, for some ten degrees of longitude, the coast of the continent still presents a field for further adventure. We have been robbed of one peninsula, but it appears nearly certain that a considerable tract of land, of which the eastern continuous coast has been ascertained by Parry and Franklin, deserves the name it bears of Melville Peninsula; that it shoots out to the north for some 5° of latitude, and is joined to the main land by a narrow isthmus near Repulse Bay. This latter fact does not indeed rest as yet on actual observation, but there is every reason to put faith in the Esquimaux accounts, which bring a gulf of the Polar Sea to within 40 or 50 miles of Repulse Bay.

Our author's narrative is prefaced by an interesting though meagre sketch of his biography, by the pen of a surviving brother. The boy is not always father to the man. The transformation of a sickly and timid youth, educated for the Scottish church, into the hardy man who walks fifty miles a-day in snow-shoes, is one of those phenomena which we believe to be quite as common as the instances of juvenile promise and precocious aptitude for a particular career so often traced out by the biographers of eminent men. In 1829, at the age of twenty-one, Mr. Simpson, despairing of early advancement in the Kirk, and averse from the usual resource of private tuition, accepted from the governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, Mr., now Sir George Simpson—(a relative, we presume, but in what degree is not stated)—an offer of employment under the Company, and sailed for North America. By the same powerful interest it appears that he was appointed, in 1836, to the second station in command of the expedition which forms the subject of the present narrative. There can be no doubt that during his apprenticeship he showed qualities which justified his selection, and no one who peruses the record will accuse the governor of nepotism.

To any one acquainted with the numerous works of Mr. Simpson's predecessors, his volume can of course present little attraction in the way of novelty. The incidents, whether of the summer's journey or the winter's residence at one of the Company's forts, admit of little variety, as described either by a Back or a Simpson. The same exertions of fortitude and endurance, the same devices of skill and ingenuity to meet danger in its various forms of river-rapid, of marine ice, of fog, and squall, and current, are required of each successive arctic adventurer; but the simplicity and concision of the present narrative prevents weariness even with these details. There is one fact, evidence of which pervades the volume, and which makes us rise from its perusal with peculiar satisfaction; we mean the truly humanizing and Christian effect of the operations of the Hudson's Bay Company on the aboriginal tribes. The period is not distant when the "bella plusquam civilia," which raged between the Hudson's Bay Company and a rival association, reddened the desert with other blood than that of the beaver or musk-ox. The blessings, indeed, usually bestowed by the white Christian on the red heathen are soon enumerated;—fire-arms, fire-water, and the small-pox; but probably in no part of the world had the European invaders set a worse example to the native tribes than here, or enlisted them into more savage contests than those which raged, within the present century, within the dominions and between the subjects of the British crown in North America. It is perhaps useless now to inquire into the relative guilt of the parties engaged, and to attempt to discriminate between aggression and lawful resistance. The true history of such contests would rival in unprofitable tedium the Florentine and Pisan wars of Guicciardini. We know no better picture of the character of the struggle than is to be found in the work of Mr. Ross Cox, a gentleman who from an adventurous trader has become an efficient and trusted officer of the Irish police. His narrative, published in 1830, has scarcely an equal for incident and adventure, unless it be in Mr. Irvine's charming volume, the "Adventures of the Followers of Columbus." We shall have occasion to remark, that some of his observations on the habits of native tribes derive confirmation from the volume under review. It is gratifying to us, as Englishmen and Christians, to be able to show the reverse of such a picture. Subsequently to the coalition effected between the two companies in 1821, their system towards the natives appears to have been one which Howard and Wilberforce would have approved, and might have directed. Sufficient proofs of this fact appear at the outset of Mr. Simpson's volume, even in his description, though cursory, of the Red River settlement, from which he started for his journey.

The untiring efforts of the Company's Church establishment, Protestant and Roman Catholic, extend from Labrador to the Pacific—from where the rattlesnake basks in the hot summer of climes westward of the Rocky mountains, to where the Indian ceases to roam, and the Esquimaux becomes the sole representative of humanity. These exertions are not the less creditable if, as Mr. Simpson, we fear truly, states, they are often unrewarded: not always however. In the maritime districts of the far West the Indian character is softened, as he states, by the influences of the Pacific; food is abundant, man congregates in villages, and here the labors of the missionaries promise every success. Even among the wandering hunters of the North the endeavors of the Company to check the supply of spirituous liquors and to instil morality, have not been unavailing. Mr. Simpson says:—

“No stronger proof of the salutary effect of the injunctions of the Company's officers can be adduced than that, while peace and decorum mark the general character of the Northern tribes, bloodshed, rapine, and unbridled lust are the characteristics of the fierce hordes of Assiniboines, Pigeons, Blackfeet, Circees, Fall and Blood Indians who inhabit the plains between the Saskatchewan and Missouri, and are without the pale of the Company's influence and authority.”—p. 19.

Mr. Simpson goes on to describe a reconciliation effected by the sole influence of the Company between the Saulteaux and Sioux nations, till lately inveterate and bloody enemies.

On the 1st of December, 1836, Mr. Simpson quitted the Red River settlement for Athabasca. This preliminary journey, of one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven statute miles was completed with singular precision on the very day prefixed for its termination, the 1st of February. For the first three days, as far as the Manitoba Lake, the nature of the country and the state of the weather permitted the use of horses and wheel carriages. The remainder of the journey was performed on foot, the baggage being conveyed on sledges drawn by dogs. The author's route enabled him to enjoy the reasonable hospitality of three of the Company's stations between the Red River and the Athabasca station, Fort Chipewyan, destined for his residence till the period when returning spring should enable him to effect the descent of the Coppermine River.

The first point decided on at this station was, that instead of building, according to the letter of their instructions, or large boat for their future expedition, they should construct two of smaller dimensions; a measure to which Mr. Simpson attributes the ultimate safety and success of the party. This portion of the author's narrative exhibits further gratifying evidence of the influence of the Company on the character of the Chipewyan Indians, and of the establishment of friendly relations between this race and the Esquimaux. The wanton and relentless massacre of the latter, described by Hearne, is a specimen of the former habits of the natives, conspicuous by its contrast to the present state of things; and the regulations of the Company for the prevention of the sale of spirits, and for the supply of necessities to the Indian, seem admirable in effect as well as intention.

The expedition set sail from Athabasca on the 1st of June. On the 10th it reached the Great Slave Lake, where, for eleven weary days, it suffered provoking detention by the ice, and it was not till the 20th that it entered the great River Mackenzie. Fort Good Hope, situated in lat. 66° 16', the most northerly station of the Company, was reached on the 5th of July, and at 4 P. M. of the 9th, the Arctic Ocean burst on the view of the party. The expedition plodded its westward way along the coast surveyed by Franklin in 1826, meeting and overcoming the usual difficulties of such a route, and holding friendly but cautious intercourse with various families of Esquimaux, till it reached Franklin's Return Reef on the 23d. The weather here became stormy, and the temperature such as to bring the winter-dresses of the party into requisition. The ice drove them occasionally almost beyond sight of the coast, but one happy run of twenty-five hours effected nearly half the distance between the point reached by Franklin and the Point Barrow, from which Captain Beechey's barge returned in 1826. In this interval the mouths of two considerable rivers were discovered. One of these, named by the party the Colville, Mr. Simpson remarks (p. 171): “That it separates the Franklin and Pelly mountains, the last seen by us, and probably flows in a long course through a rich fur country and unknown tribes on the west side of the Rocky mountains.” Mr. Simpson thinks that it is probably identical with a river of which Mr. Campbell, one of the most adventurous of the Company's servants, who has pushed its establishments into the Rocky mountains and to the confines of the Russian territory, received accounts from the natives; if so, it has a course of at least 1000 English miles. It appears that Mr. Campbell, in 1839, narrowly escaped massacre and starvation at the hands of the Nahanie Indians, but that his future operations are likely to be facilitated by a transaction with the Russian Governor, the eminent Baron Wrangel, by which the Russian line of coast as far as Cape Spencer is leased to the Company. On the 28th they hauled up their boats on a cape, in longitude 154°, which they named after Governor Simpson. The ice now rapidly accumulated, and on the 31st Mr. Simpson writes:—“From the extreme coldness of the weather and the interminable ice, the further advance of our boats appeared hopeless. In four days we had only made good as many miles, and in the event of a late return to the Mackenzie, we had every reason to apprehend being set fast in Bear Lake river, or at least at Fort Franklin, which would have been ruinous to our future plans. I therefore lost no time in imparting to Mr. Dease my desire of exploring the remainder of the coast to Point Barrow on foot. In order to secure the safe retreat of the party, he handsomely consented to remain with the boats; and as Point Barrow was still distant only two degrees of longitude, ten or twelve days were considered sufficient for my return." The author therefore, selecting five companions, started on his pedestrian expedition on the 1st of August. While the boats had been forcing their way through the shore ice to Cape Simpson, the appearance of the ice to seaward had been so smooth and solid that the party had longed for horses and carioles to drive at once to Point Barrow. Our author could not, indeed, resort to this expedient to facilitate the interesting labor of the remaining interval of unexplored coast. He could not call a coach, but he did better, for finding the sea open he called an oomiak—one of the large family-boats of the Esquimaux which bear that name. The incident of his meeting with the family which supplied him with the loan of this invaluable conveyance was certainly one of the most fortunate of his journey. The taste for tobacco, acquired from intercourse with the Russians, was a passport to their good graces. Among other mutual civilities Mr. Simpson exchanged his travelling service of plate, consisting of a tin pan, for a platter made out of a mammoth tusk, as appropriate to his daily mess of pemmican as pewter to the draught beloved by metropolitan coalheavers. The Esquimaux suffered him without scruple to select the best of three oomiaks for his purpose. These boats float in half a foot of water, and the one selected bounded gallantly over the high waves of an inlet five miles wide, which would have cost him a weary march to circumvent by land. Disregarding the portentous appearance of young ice and the landward flight of wild fowl, omens of approaching winter, and occasionally carrying their light craft over the older ice, they hurried onward to their goal, and reached it with triumph and gratitude on the morning of the 4th.

Point Barrow, henceforth famous as the focus to which British enterprise from west and east has successfully converged, is described as a long, low spit of gravel, some five miles across. It appears to be a place of considerable resort: a kind of Brighton to the Esquimaux, a summer camp, a winter burrow, and a fashionable burying-place. Mr. Elson, in 1826, had been deterred, by the hostile demeanor of the natives, from attempts at intercourse; but Mr. Simpson was bolder, and though the natives were numerous, and their demonstrations at first suspicious, he opened with them a brisk and friendly intercourse, exchanging the ever current coin of tobacco for seal-skin boots, water-proof shirts of seals' entrails, ivory toys, &c. —ances followed, performed by Ceritos in deerskin unmentionables; and it was not till Mr. Simpson launched again on the ocean, averting his prow reluctantly from a lane of open water which invited him to Behring's Straits, that an attempt to steal his paddles, and some appearance of a disposition to misdirect his course, afforded any ground for apprehending bad intentions. He was soon joyfully received by the party from whom he had borrowed his frail but buoyant and effective conveyance; and as he required its further use, four of them readily consented to accompany him in their canoes. These people displayed acute sensibility to the power of music, listening with delight to the French and Highland boat-songs of the party. This sensibility is shared by the Indian tribe of Loucheux, but strange to say, is not found among their neighbors the Chipewayans. These distinctive peculiarities among races in juxtaposition are interesting, and not confined to savage tribes. We doubt whether, in this respect of musical faculty, the Loucheux differ more from the Chipewayans than do the natives of the hilly districts of Lancashire and Derbyshire from those of some neighboring counties. In discussing the origin of the native tribes, Mr. Simpson (after attributing, as we think, on very questionable grounds, and differing with his predecessors in discovery, an European origin to the Esquimaux) enumerates several distinct families of Indians, whom he supposes to have migrated from Asia, but who have preserved the most decided differences of language and customs. He mentions the practice prevalent in New Caledonia of burning the dead, and of subjecting the widow to various degrading and painful observances, which probably indicate an Hindoo affinity, though not extending to the suttee of Hindostan. Mr. Ross Cox had the opportunity of observing this practice, which we believe the influence of the Company has since nearly abolished. We have lately seen it stated that in the Marquesas Islands the ocean is substituted for the pile, and the widow is sunk with the corpse of her partner. With all respect for the philosophers of the last century, who endeavored to set up the superiority of savage over civilized man, we prefer the more cumbrous contrivance of jointure, with all its delays to impatient lovers and burthen on heirs.

Mr. Simpson was certainly as fortunate in avoiding collision with the natives as in procuring assistance from them; but the measure of proceeding with so small a party was, with reference to them, one of extreme hazard. The usual source of collision is the inability of the savage to resist temptation to pilfer. We have seen that at Point Barrow this risk occurred. Mr. Dease also, while waiting the return of the party, had to protect himself from similar attempts. Man hates and fears those whom he has injured. Mr. Simpson justly observes, that should the Russians ever furnish the Esquimaux with fire-arms, the day of discovery with small parties will be over. This was, however, the only juncture at which the natives were met with in force sufficient to create danger ; and though it was certainly a critical one, the object in view was one of those which justify a rush at the fence without a scrutiny into the possible ditch at the other side.

While the operations above described were in progress, a party, left behind at Fort Good Hope, had ascended the Bear Lake River, and established themselves on the lake of that name to prepare the winter residence of the expedition. The ascent of the stream, however, had been one of difficulty, conducted between impending walls of ice, in some instances forty feet high. Thirty miles of such navigation had cost a fortnight's labor, and the passage of the lake itself was scarcely less difficult. It was not till the 17th of August, the day on which the coasting party reëntered the Mackenzie River, that the building party reached the scene of its labors, named Fort Confidence. Mr. Simpson's arrival here occurred on the 29th of September. They found their simple and diminutive log dwellings finished as well as the scanty materials of the country allowed, but miserably inadequate to the climate. An express soon after reached them, conveying, among other intelligence, that of Sir G. Back's intended expedition to Wager Inlet, and affording hopes of a meeting with that officer in the course of the summer, which were frustrated by the well-known failure of his gallant efforts. The incidents of the winter residence demand little comment. From the 11th of November to the end of January the temperature ranged from 32° to 33° below zero. Occasionally, however, it descended to 50°; and when at 49° the author cast a bullet of quicksilver, which, fired from a pistol at ten paces, passed through an inch plank. The students of Liebig will not be surprised to hear that, when abundance permitted, the daily ration of an individual was from eight to twelve pounds of venison. On some occasions it appears that the allowance to the Company's servants has been fourteen pounds of moose or buffalo. We apprehend that bone is included, but the amount is yet enormous, as compared with the consumption of man in temperate climates. The great chemist clearly explains why this large amount of solid and nitrogenized food should be not only innocent but salutary under an arctic temperature. How far, however, it be necessary, and how great the addition desirable for due enjoyment, or essential to the healthy condition of the frame, apart from the adventitious consequences of habit, may be doubted. We have at least reason to doubt that the officers of these expeditions, whose education and habits removed them from the influences of idleness and mere sensuality, have felt and had occasion to satisfy any inordinate cravings. Experience and theory alike condemn the use of spirituous liquors as aids to exertion in these climates.*

* We have been assured that in the Russian expedition

The 11th of March exhibited the greatest degree of cold observed. A spirit thermometer, more scrupulous than its fellows, stood at 60°, an older one at 66°.

Had Mr. Simpson's ardent mind and powerful frame been totally unoccupied during his long and wearisome detention, he might have been driven to the remedy which our French neighbors accuse us of adopting for low spirits, and have committed an appropriate suicide with a quicksilver bullet. He was not, however, driven to this resource. His winter excursions, on Great Bear Lake and the neighboring barrens, exceeded a thousand miles. On the 27th of March he set out, with two men and four dogs, to explore the country between Bear Lake and the Coppermine, their intended pathway to the sea. Buried in the snow-drift of a north-easter, scarcely broken by the screen of a few dwarf spruces, the author naturally felt it difficult to comprehend how people could perish in an English snow-storm in the hot desert of Salisbury Plain, or the tropical regions of Shap Fell.

Indian education begins early. Lewis and Clarke describe equestrians of some two years old using both whip and bridle with vigor and effect. An unweaned member of an Indian family reached Fort Confidence on snow shoes two feet in length :—

"I must not," says Mr. Simpson, "close this part of the narrative without bestowing a just encomium on the generally docile character of the natives of Great Bear Lake. They soon become attached to white men, and are fond of imitating their manners. In our little hall I have repeatedly seen the youngsters who were most about us get up from their chairs, and politely hand them to any of our people who happened to enter. Some of them even learned to take off their caps in the house, and to wash instead of greasing their faces. Their indulgent treatment of their women, who indeed possess the mastery, was noticed by Sir J. Franklin. I wish I could speak as favorably of their honesty and veracity."—p. 243.

The next great object of Mr. Simpson's instructions was, as we have stated, to trace the unexplored interval from Franklin's point Turnagain to the Tlewocho estuary. For this object he was to reach the coast by the Coppermine River, with the choice, as far as his instructors could give it, of spending one or two seasons on the attempt, and of returning by whichever of the two rivers he might prefer. He started on the 6th of June, ascended the Dease River, crossed the Dismal Lakes on the still solid ice, partly with the assistance of sails, and launching on the Kendal River reached the confluence of that stream with the Coppermine on the 20th. The rapids of the Coppermine made of the descent and ascent of that river perhaps the two most critical operations of the expedition. Franklin had descended them in July, when at their summer level ; they were now to Khiva, those who, avoiding the use of spirits, confined themselves to tea, alone survived.

in spring flood, but skill and nerve brought the party through. We extract the following passage :—

"The day was bright and lovely as we shot down rapid after rapid; in many of which we had to pull for our lives to keep out of the suction of the precipices, along whose base the breakers raged and foamed with overwhelming fury. Shortly before noon we came in sight of the Escape Rapid of Franklin, and a glance at the overhanging cliffs told us that there was no alternative but to run down with full cargo. In an instant we were in the vortex; and, before we were aware, my boat was borne towards an isolated rock which the boiling surge almost concealed. To clear it on the outside was no longer possible; our only chance of safety was to run between it and the lofty eastern cliff. The word was passed, and every breath was hushed. A stream, which dashed down upon us over the brow of the precipice more than a hundred feet in height, mingled with the spray that whirled upwards from the rapid, forming a terrific shower-bath. The pass was about eight feet wide, and the error of a single foot on either side would have been instant destruction. As, guided by Sinclair's consummate skill, the boat shot safely through those jaws of death, an involuntary cheer arose."—p. 258.

If it had appeared strange to Mr. Simpson, with his thermometer at 50°, that people should perish of cold in England, during this performance he must have been equally at a loss to account for the destruction of life which so often used to attend the shooting of Old London Bridge.

From the 1st to the 17th of July the party were detained by the ice at the mouth of the Coppermine. From the latter date to the 19th of August they were occupied in struggling along the coast to the point reached by Franklin in 1821, and here the prospect before them showed that they had drawn a blank in the lottery of arctic summers. On the 16th of August Franklin had seen a perfectly open sea from this point. Before them now, to the eastward, lay an unbroken barrier of ice, glittering with snow, evidently destined soon to unite with the new formation of approaching winter. Behind them the disjointed masses through which they had forced their way kept closing in under the pressure of violent gales. Mr. Simpson, under these discouraging circumstances, again decided on the experiment of a pedestrian journey of exploration for some ten days with seven of the party, to be followed by Mr. Dease with the remaining five men in one of their two boats, should wind and weather so far change as to permit. This enterprise was well rewarded. Franklin's furthest point was passed on the 21st. From a cape named after that officer, a little beyond that point, land was seen twenty or twenty-five miles to the northward, and stretching from west to north-east. Was this land insular or continental,—were the party coasting a bay or the shore of a continuous sea? This interesting question was solved on the 23d, on which day Mr. Simpson writes :—

"The coast led somewhat more to the northward. The travelling was exceedingly painful. We, however, advanced with spirit, all hands being in eager expectation respecting the great northern land, which seemed interminable. Along its distant shore the beams of the declining sun were reflected from a broad channel of open water; while on the coast we were tracing the ice lay still immovable, and extended many miles to seaward. As we drew near in the evening an elevated cape, land appeared all round, and our worst fears seemed confirmed. With bitter disappointment I ascended the height, from whence a vast and splendid prospect burst suddenly upon me. The sea, as if transformed by enchantment, rolled its free waves at my feet, and beyond the range of vision to the eastward. Islands, of various shape and size, overspread its surface; and the northern land terminated to the eye in a bold and lofty cape, bearing east-north-east, thirty or forty miles distant, while the continental coast trended away south-east. I stood in fact on a remarkable headland at the eastern outlet of an ice-obstructed strait. On the extensive land to the northward I bestowed the name of our most gracious sovereign, Queen Victoria. Its eastern visible extremity I called Cape Pelly, in compliment to the governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the promontory where we encamped Cape Alexander, after an only brother, who would give his right hand to be the sharer of my journeys."

With these discoveries Mr. Simpson for this season was forced to content himself :—

"They were not in themselves," he observes, "unimportant; but their value was much enhanced by the disclosure of an open sea to the eastward, and the suggestion of a new route—along the southern coast of Victoria Land—by which that open sea might be attained while the shores of the continent were yet environed by an impenetrable barrier of ice, as they were this season."—p. 300.

On the 29th they rejoined Mr. Dease and his party, who had continued ice-bound till the day previous, when he wisely judged it too late to attempt progress by sea to the eastward.

The course now adopted by the party is best explained and vindicated in Mr. Simpson's own words :—

"The bad weather and advanced season now rendered every one anxious to return to winter quarters, and I reluctantly acquiesced in the general sentiment; but for doing so I had reasons peculiar to myself. I considered that we could not now expect to reach Back's Great Fish River; that by exploring a part only of the unknown coast intervening, our return to the Coppermine must be so long protracted as to preclude the possibility of taking the boats up that bad river; and that by abandoning them on the coast to the Esquimaux we excluded the prospect of accomplishing the whole by a third voyage, with the benefit perhaps of a more propitious season. Three great travellers, Hearne, Franklin, and Richardson, had successively pronounced the ascent of the Coppermine, above the Bloody Fall, to be impracticable with boats; and our people, recollecting only the violence and impetuosity of our descent, entertained the same opinion. Fully aware of the great importance of this point to any future operations, I had with a careful eye inspected every part of the river, and formed in my own mind the following conclusions respecting the upward navigation:—

 1st. That in a river of that size there must always be a lead somewhere, of depth enough for light boats. 2d. That the force of the rapids would be found much abated, and that with strong ropes the worst of them might be surmounted. 3d. From the fury of the breakers in June I inferred the existence at no great depth of a narrow projecting ledge of rock that, bared by the falling of the waters, would afford footing to the towing-party, without which the ascent indeed must have baffled all our efforts.”—p. 303.

These views proved in the sequel to be just and well-founded. We refer our readers to the narrative to learn how highly indeed the skill and courage of the party were taxed to demonstrate the soundness of the above conclusions. Every danger, however, was baffled, and every difficulty surmounted; and on the 14th the party regained Fort Confidence in safety.

The summer of 1839 proved more favorable to the task of discovery than its predecessor. On reaching the Coppermine, on the 19th of June, the party found that the ice had ceased to drift down on the 16th, ten days earlier than the last year. The rapids were passed with far greater facility; and on reaching Cape Barrow, on the 18th of July, they found the wide extent of Coronation Gulf partially open. Threading the ice across the inlet to Cape Franklin, they met with, instead of the unbroken barrier which had foiled them last year, an open channel two miles wide along the main. On the 8th of August they had followed the coast as far as the 99th degree of longitude; i. e. some 11 degrees to the eastward of their point of departure. On the 10th, Mr. Simpson writes:—

“We proceeded north-eastward all day among the islands, and some began to apprehend that we had lost the continent altogether, till in the evening we opened a strait running in to the southward of east, while the rapid rush of the tide from that quarter left no longer any room to doubt the neighborhood of an open sea leading to the mouth of Back's Great Fish River. * * * I must candidly acknowledge,” he continues, “that we were not prepared to find so southerly a strait leading to the estuary of the Great Fish River, but rather expected first to double Cape Felix of Captain James Ross, towards which the coast had been latterly trending. The extensive land, on which that conspicuous cape stands, forms the northern shore of the strait through which we passed on the 11th; and which led us, the same afternoon, by an outlet only three miles wide to the much desired eastern sea. That glorious sight was first beheld by myself from the top of one of the high limestone islands; and I had the satisfaction of announcing it to some of the men, who, incited by curiosity, followed me thither. The joyful news was soon conveyed to Mr. Dease, who was with the boats at the end of the island, about half a mile off; and even the most desponding of our people forgot for the time the great distance we should have to return to winter quarters, though a wish that a party had been appointed to meet us somewhere on the Great Fish River, or even at Fort Reliance, was frequently expressed.”

A strong wind from the westward rapidly extricated the party from the labyrinth of islands which had long impeded their voyage; and on the 13th, says Mr. Simpson, “On doubling a very sharp point, that offered a lee spot for the boats, I landed, and saw before me a perfect sandy desert. It was Back's Point Sir C. Ogle that we had at length reached!”

Here then the author's performance of his duty, as designated by his instructions, was complete; but he was naturally desirous to push his exploration as far to the eastward beyond Sir G. Back's limit as the season would permit. He still considered it possible that the isthmus, the existence of which in the region assigned to it by Sir John Ross, he had disproved, might be found further eastward. The men assented without a murmur to the unexpected prolongation of their hard service—a circumstance which says much for them, and for the commanders who had won their attachment. The Great Fish River and the other streams which reach this coast flow through unwooded regions; a fact which much aggravates the condition of the coast navigator, who finds no drift-wood for fuel, and on his shivering bivouac is reduced to uncooked pemmican and cold water for his diet. The latter luxury itself was scarce among the islands; strong north-east winds prevailed, and one of Sir G. Back's stores, on Montreal Island, to which they were directed by M'Kay, one of that officer's expedition, afforded nothing but pemmican alive with maggots, and chocolate rotten with five years' decay. In the teeth of all these difficulties they persevered, running over from Montreal Island to the eastern coast, to a cape somewhat north of Cape Hay, the extreme point seen by Sir G. Back, to which they gave the name of Britannia. Hence, with a fair wind and tossing sea, they made a run of thirty miles to a cape which they christened after the name of Lord Selkirk; and some three miles further, on the 20th, the return of the north-east wind forced them into the mouth of a small river.

“It was now,” says Mr. Simpson, “quite evident to us, even in our most sanguine mood, that the time was come for commencing our retreat to the distant Coppermine River, and that any further foolhardy perseverance could only lead to the loss of the whole party, and also of the great object which we had so successfully achieved. The men were therefore directed to construct another monument in commemoration of our visit; while Mr. Dease and I walked to an eminence three miles off, to see the further trending of the coast. Our view of the low main shore was limited to about five miles, when it seemed to turn off more to the right. Far without lay several lofty islands, and in the northeast, more distant still, appeared some high blue land; this, which we designated Cape Sir J. Ross, is in all probability one of the south-eastern promontories of Boothia. We could therefore hardly doubt being now arrived at that large gulf uniformly described by the Esquimaux as containing many islands, and with numerous indentations, running down to the southward till it approaches within forty miles of Repulse and Wager Bays. The exploration of such a gulf to the strait of the Fury and Hecla would necessarily demand the whole time and energies of another expedition, having some point of retreat much nearer to the scene of operations than Great Bear Lake; and we felt assured that the Honorable Company who had already done so much in the cause of discovery, would not abandon their munificent work till the precise limits of this great continent were fully and finally established.—p. 376.

After all that has been accomplished, the nil actum reputans of Juvenal would be an exaggeration, but we confess we sympathize with the hope here expressed, and are satisfied that the Company might easily accomplish the remaining task, probably by making one of their establishments on the eastern coast,—Fort Churchill, for instance,—the starting place or base of their operation. The mouth of the stream which bounded the last career of the admirable little boats, and received their name, the Castor and Pollux, lies in latitude 68° 28' 23" North, longitude 94° 14' West; or, adopting Back's longitude, which for some reason Simpson could not reconcile with his own, in longitude 93° 7' 30". The expedition, on its return, instead of pursuing the shores of the main land, coasted the southern shores of Boothia, and their new discovery, Victoria Land; the former for nearly sixty-seven miles, to within fifty-seven miles of Ross's pillar, and within ninety miles of the magnetic pole. Their run along Victoria Land amounted to upwards of one hundred and seventy miles. Their winds were favorable, their navigation, though sometimes rough for craft so light, was prosperous, and on the 10th, having triumphantly crossed the strait of fifty miles, to Cape Barrow, they revelled once more in the luxury of a drift-wood fire, to which they had been strangers since July. The party regained the Coppermine River on the 16th of September, after the longest voyage yet performed by boats in the Polar sea—in all one thousand six hundred and thirty-one statute miles.

It would remain for us to notice the sad and mysterious termination of a life so distinguished by enterprise and honorable service, but the task is distressing; and, as we could do nothing towards elucidating the truth, we leave our readers to read for themselves in the preface the few ascertained particulars of the occurrence. It is more than enough for us to know that Mr. Simpson perished by violence on his way from the Red River settlement towards England. It is just possible that some tardy confession, or some word spoken in the veracity of intoxication, may confirm our own impression that, after killing two of his half-breed companions in self-defence, he was murdered in revenge. Till then the possibility may be, however reluctantly, admitted, of the tale as told by the survivors, that insanity was the cause of the catastrophe. More fortunate, in one sense, than Parke or Hudson, he has left behind him his own record of his own achievements. And we cannot close the volume without once more remarking on its literary merit. For judicious selection of topics and incidents, for clearness and simplicity of description, it is the model of a diary, and like the masculine and modest character of the man, reflects honor on Mr. Simpson's venerable Alma Mater, King's College, Aberdeen.

From the Quarterly Review.

History of the Conquest of Mexico, with a Preliminary View of the Ancient Mexican Civilization, and the Life of the Conqueror, Hernando Cortes. BY WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT. 3 vols. 8 vo. London; 1843.

IN his excellent history of Ferdinand and Isabella, Mr. Prescott had the advantage of entering upon ground not preoccupied by any of the great modern historians. He now ventures to measure his strength with the Spaniard De Solis, and with Robertson. De Solis, whose swelling style was so peculiarly congenial to the Spanish ear, by the higher merits of his work, his skilful arrangement, his animation and dramatic power, as well as by the inextinguishable interest of his story, commanded considerable popularity even in the English translation. The narrative of Robertson has all the charm of his inimitable style. The conquest of Mexico is but one chapter, indeed, in his history of America; but it seems to have been labored with peculiar care, till every vestige of labor has disappeared, and the story flows on with the ease and gracefulness of a romance.

Yet ancient Mexico, and the adventures of her Spanish conquerors, may still afford full scope for the labor and the genius of an historian, who may aspire to tell the story in a more Christian and enlightened spirit than the bigot De Solis; on a more extended scale, and with a full command of the stores of knowledge which have accumulated since the time both of De Solis and of Robertson. If, indeed, we are to judge from the astonishment expressed by some persons, who at least might be supposed familiar with such works as Robertson's, at the discoveries of Mr. Stephens among the ancient cities in Mexico and the adjacent provinces, it might appear full time to revive the history of the conquest in the public mind. This surprise seemed to imply an utter forgetfulness of the state of the country at the time of the Spanish conquest; that it was not a wild forest wandered over by savage hunters, or a land peopled by simple and naked Caribs; but the seat of more than one comparatively ancient, powerful and wealthy monarchy, containing many large and populous cities, embellished with vast buildings, chiefly temples; and advanced to a high state of what we may venture to call, without pledging ourselves to its origin, Asiatic civilization.

Mr. Prescott possesses high qualifications, and some peculiar advantages for the execution of such a work. He has a high sense of the obligation of an historian to explore every source of information relating to his subject; to spare neither industry, nor, we may add, expense, in the collection of materials; and his extensive acquaintance with Spanish literature, and the name which he has already established in connexion with Spanish history, have, perhaps, enabled him to command sources of knowledge unattainable by an unknown author. In his disquisitions on the political state and the civilization of the Aztec kingdoms, he is full and copious, without being prolix and wearisome; his narrative is flowing and spirited, sometimes very picturesque; his style has dropped the few Americanisms which still jarred on our fastidious ear in his former work, and is in general pure and sound English. Above all, his judgments are unaffectedly candid and impartial; he never loses sight of the immutable principles of justice and humanity, yet allows to the Spanish conquerors the palliation for their enormities, to be drawn from those deeply-rooted and mis-called Christian principles, which authorized and even sanctified all acts of ambition and violence committed by Europeans and Christians against barbarians and infidels. His general estimate of the character of his hero appears to us singularly just. As an adventurer the bravest, the most enterprising, the most persevering, who set his foot on the shores of America; Cortes was, as a commander, rapid and daring in forming his resolutions; undaunted and resolute in their execution; beyond example prompt and fertile in resources; unappalled by the most gigantic difficulties; unshaken by the most disastrous reverses; accomplishing the most inconceivable schemes with forces apparently the most inadequate, and, as he advanced, creating means from what might seem the most hopeless and hostile sources; and with a power of attaching men to his service, which might almost look like magic. He combined under one discipline the rude and reckless adventurer, who began by thinking only of gold, but gradually kindled to the absorbing desire of glory; the jealous enemy who came to overthrow his power, and before long became its most steadfast support; the fiercest and most warlike of the natives, whom he bent not merely into obedient followers, but zealous and hearty allies. Avaricious, yet generous, and never allowing his avarice to interfere with his ambition; with address which borders close on cunning, reading men's hearts and minds, and knowing whom to trust and how far; he was not without humanity, but when war was raging and as peculiar exigences seemed to demand, utterly remorseless and utterly reckless of the extent of carnage, hewing down human life as carelessly as the backwoodsman the forest; and withal as stern a bigot as Spain ever sent forth in cowl or in mail, to propagate the doctrine of the Cross by the Mahometan apostleship of fire and sword.

Mr. Prescott, in his collection of materials for his work, has laid all accessible quarters under contribution. The Spanish archives, which were closed against Dr. Robertson, have been freely opened to him; or rather, we should say, he has had liberal access to the rich collections made by Don Juan Baptista Muñoz, the historiographer of the Indies; to that of Don Vargas Ponce, whose papers were chiefly obtained from the archives of the Indies at Seville; and that of Navarrete, the President of the Academy, whose work on the early discoveries of the Spaniards is well known. These three collections are in the possession of the Royal Academy of Madrid; Mr. Prescott was allowed the selection and transcription of as many as he might choose; and the result has been a mass of MS. documents amounting to eight thousand folio pages. Mexico has furnished some unprinted and some printed documents, among the latter those edited by Bustamante, especially the valuable history of Father Sahagun, which appeared nearly at the same time in Mexico, and in Lord Kingsborough's great collection of Mexican antiquities. Mr. Prescott mentions other private libraries and collections, among them that of the Duke of Monteleone, the present representative of Cortes, which have been courteously placed at his command.

Among printed works that of Clavigero had not appeared when Robertson published his history. Clavigero, indeed, professed that the object of his writing was partly to correct the errors of Robertson. Since that time, England and France have sent forth the magnificent volumes of Lord Kingsborough and the French "Antiquités Mexicaines," and many of the Muñoz MSS. which have appeared in the translations of M. Ternaux Compans. We have mentioned the history of Father Sahagun. The "Historia Antiqua" of Don Mariano Veytia, the executor of Boturini, a most adventurous but injudicious collector of Aztec antiquities, was published in Mexico in 1838. To these printed works Mr. Prescott adds, as his authorities: I. The MS. History of India, by the celebrated Las Casas, the Bishop of Chiapa, a name which commands our highest veneration, yet who wanted some of the first requisites of an historian, impartiality and judgment. The good bishop has all the amiability, all the ardor, and all the prejudice of an Abolitionist. II. The works of the Tezucucan historian, who rejoices in the magnificent name of Fernando de Alva Ixtlilxochitl, according to Mr. Prescott, the Livy of Anahuac. These are still in manuscript, but have been consulted by some of the Spanish historians. The Historia Chichimeca, the best of his "Relaciones," has been rendered into French in Mons. Ternaux Compans's collection. III. The Historia General de las Indias, by Gonzalo Fernandez de Oviedo é Valdez. Oviedo passed some time in the Spanish Indies, in Darien, and afterwards in Hispaniola. On his return to Spain he was appointed "Chronicler of the Indies."

It is understood that the Royal Academy of History at Madrid are preparing this work for the press. IV. The History of Tlascala, by Diego Muñoz Camargo. Camargo was a noble Tlascan vestee, and lived in the latter half of the sixteenth century. His work supplies much curious and authentic information respecting the social and religious institutions of the land at the time of the conquest. His patriotism warms as he recounts the old hostilities of his countrymen with the Aztecs; and it is singular to observe how the detestation of the rival nations survived their common subjection under the Castilian yoke.

Yet it is chiefly on the institutions, manners, and polity of the kingdoms of the New World, that these masses of published and unpublished documents throw light. The great facts of the invasion and conquest; the life and character of Cortes himself; the triumphs and disasters, the gains and losses, have long been before the world. The principles and motives of these warriors, who were at once too rude and too proud to dissemble or disguise their designs and objects, are manifest from their actions. There is no secret history which is not immediately betrayed by the event. Success or failure reveals the subtlest policy of Cortes. The large works of Herrera and Torquemada contain, in general, a full and accurate account of the actual exploits, dangers, escapes, and victories of the adventurers. The despatches of Cortes, which have been long before the world, show us the course of events as they appeared to the leader himself, and as he wished them to appear before his master and before Europe.* They are bold and honest "Commentaries," for neither would Cortes condescend to, nor feel the slightest desire of concealment; nor would he have found a more favorable hearing with the Emperor or the court of Castile, if he had softened or disguised any of those parts of the history which most offend the moral and Christian feelings of our day. Besides this, we have the frank and gallant, however rugged, Bernal Diaz, chronicling, from recollection it is true, but still with the fidelity of honest pride and the complacent satisfaction of an old soldier, day by day, the occurrences of the whole war; speaking out, without fear or hesitation, the living feelings, the hopes, and even the fears, the passions, the superstitions of the camp. Bernal Diaz avowedly wrote to vindicate for the soldiers of Cortes that share in the common glory, which Gomara, the other great authority for the war, has ascribed too exclusively to the general. Gomara was the chaplain of Cortes on his return to Spain, and derived his information from Cortes himself, (though the book was not written till after his death,) from his family, and from some of the other distinguished actors in the great drama. Yet after all, the character of Cortes comes out still more strongly in the Chronicle of Diaz. Though Diaz is asserting the independence and voluntary subjection of the soldiers, they are only more manifestly under the despotic rule of the master mind; for that is the most consummate authority which persuades its obedient instruments to imagine that they are free agents. Honest Bernal Diaz seems to have made himself believe that he had a leading voice in the destruction of the ships. It is on this introductory portion of Mexican history, and on the character, institutions, manners, and usages, of the conquered empire, that Robertson's brilliant episode is meagre and unsatisfactory. His calm and philosophic mind was not much alive to the romantic and picturesque; and he was so afraid of being led away by the ardent imagination of some of the older authorities, who had been dazzled by the external splendor of the Mexican monarchy, that he was disposed to depreciate to the utmost its real state of advancement. Mr. Prescott has availed himself of his superior advantages, and done more ample and equal justice to the subject. His preliminary view of the Aztec civilization is a full and judicious summary of that which is scattered in numerous, large, and we may add, expensive volumes, those of the printed and unpublished works of the older writers, and the modern publications of Clavigero, of the invaluable Humboldt, and the English and French Mexican Antiquities.

On the great and inexplicable problem as to the origin of this singular state of civilization, Mr. Prescott has wisely declined to enter in the opening chapters of his history: he has reserved the subject for a separate disquisition, in his Appendix. His conclusions are those of a sensible man, and a lover of truth rather than of brilliant theory. Among the great tests and trials of an historian's honesty, and therefore of his due sense of the dignity of his office, is the acknowledgment of ignorance; the steady refusal to admit that as history, which has not sufficient historical evidence. Mr. Prescott sums up the whole discussion thus:—First, the coincidences are sufficiently strong to authorize a belief that the civilization of Anahuac was, in some degree, influenced by that of Eastern Asia. And, secondly, the discrepancies are such as to carry back the communication to a very remote period; so remote, that this foreign influence had been too feeble to interfere materially with the growth of what may be regarded, in its essential features as a peculiar and indigenous civilization.

Unquestionably, the general character of the great Mexican empire has an Asiatic appearance; it resembles the great Tartar or Mongol empires, as they offered themselves to the astonished imaginations of the early Christian missionaries, or the merchant Marco Polo. Montezuma was most like Kubla Khan, or that splendid but evanescent personage, always heard of but never found, the magnificent Prester John. The analogies with Jewish and Christian customs and notions, so fondly sought and so readily believed by religious zeal, (the inspiration which fortunately gave birth to the costly publication of the late Lord Kingsborough, was a fancy about the Jewish origin of the Mexicans,) resolve themselves almost entirely into common or wide-spread Oriental customs and opinions. But when we would derive, according to the most probable theory, the American civilization from Eastern Asia, there remains this insuperable difficulty. To transplant the civilization of one distant country to another, requires either the simultaneous migration of a large body of the people, or a long and regular intercourse, a constant immigration from the parent race. A few adventurers from the most civilized region of the world—accidentally thrown upon a remote shore, or wandering to it through immeasurable tracts of forest, and savanna, and swamp, cut off from all communication with the mother country, and struggling to bring a new land into cultivation—would almost inevitably degenerate, or acquire new habits and usages adapted to their new circumstances. Whether this Tartar, Mongol, or Chinese, or, at any rate, Oriental race, found its way across the Pacific, or slowly descended southward, leaving vestiges of its passage in some of the curious monuments in North America; its preservation of so much of its peculiar character in all the vicissitudes of its fortunes seems scarcely conceivable. And language, which in general, at least in its elemental forms and simplest sounds, is the fine but enduring thread which leads us back to the parent stock, is here utterly broken and lost. If originally Asiatic, or connected with any of the dialects of Eastern Asia, it has diverged away so completely as not to retain a vestige of its origin. In its words, and in its structure, though split up into innumerable dialects—nay, as it should seem, innumerable independent families—the language of New Spain has baffled all the attempts of the most profound and ingenious philologists (and they are not easily baffled) to connect it with any of the tongues of the Old World. Yet either a great length of time, or a total change of social condition, appears absolutely necessary to obliterate every vestige of affiliation from cognate languages; and it is remarkable, that variable usages should survive that which is usually so much less mutable, the elements and the structure of speech. Nor is it unimportant to remark how comparatively recent appears the whole civilization of Anahuac. Even if, as is not improbable, the race who peopled Mexico and Tezcuco were ruder and fiercer tribes, who descended upon an older civilization, and yielded to its subduing influence, (like the shepherds in Egypt or the Tartars in China,) yet that which we are able, on the authority of the earliest traditions, to throw up into the highest antiquity, comes far within the historic times of the Old World. This recent origin effectually cuts off all possible connexion with the West; even Plato's Atlantis, and the Phœnician voyagers, are tales in comparison of hoary eld; and it renders any permanent intercourse with the East, at least with greater empires, highly improbable. Clavigero indeed, who would by no means incline to take a low view of Aztec antiquities, fixes the descent of the Toltecs—the earliest race to whom the vague tradition, which by courtesy is called history, assigns any important influence on the civilization of this part of the New World—in the year 648 of our æra;—the foundation of Mexico, probably far better ascertained, in the year 1325.

* A very respectable and useful Translation of these Despatches, by Mr. George Folsom, has been published at New York (1843.) We have availed ourselves of this translation in our extracts.

Are we not, then, thrown back upon the previous question, whether man at earlier social stages has not a tendency to develop his social being in the same manner? May we not be required by true philosophic investigation, as far as it can lead us, to inquire how far similitude of polity, usage, law, manners, really proves identity of origin, or even remote affiliation; how far certain customs grow, not out of tradition but out of our common nature; how far, in the almost infinite varieties of human culture, there is not, up to a certain point, a necessary uniformity, which ensures a general resemblance, or, at least, by limiting the range of accident, caprice, climate, habit, enforces the adoption of kindred institutions where there is no kindred blood, and no mutual intercourse? So many curious coincidences occur, where it is impossible to imagine either common descent (except from our first parents, or from the ark) or communication; such wayward and fanciful usages, such strange deviations from the ordinary principles and feelings of man, grow up in such distant regions, and such disconnected tribes, that we become extremely cautious in receiving such evidence as showing even the most remote relationship of race. It might seem that human nature has only a limited number of forms in which it can cast its social institutions, and that, however variously it may combine these forms, it is almost impossible but that points of the closest similitude should exist, where there can have been neither imitation nor common tradition.

Yet, while the institutions of the Aztec civilization may have been but the development of the common principles of justice, the necessity of mutual protection and security may have led to the establishment of the monarchical government, distinction of ranks, regular tribunals of law, fixed rules for the tenure of property; the ordinary usages of life, the invention and application of the useful, and indeed necessary arts, may have been the spontaneous, as it were, and but recent evolutions of the common wants and faculties of man: there are some few very remarkable traditions, which can scarcely be traced but to some original connexion with the brotherhood, apparently, of the Asiatic nations. Some of these are religious, the most remarkable of which is that universal one of the Deluge, the authenticity of which seems recognized by Humboldt, and admitted by Mr. Prescott. Most of the others, especially those which show too close a resemblance to Christianity, fall under the suspicion of having been invented, or, at least, of being native traditions, colored into similitude by the zeal of the new converts, anxious to propitiate the favor of their teachers, and fondly welcomed without examination, or after an examination strongly biased by the profound but natural prejudices of the unenlightened monkish teachers.

One or two of the scientific analogies are still more singular, particularly with regard to the Aztec calendar. The system of intercalation may indeed have forced itself upon different peoples, when they had arrived at the knowledge of the time of the sun's annual course; and nature itself might seem to establish, especially in the period of superstition through which all nations seem doomed to pass, that period of mourning which followed the sun's declension, and of rejoicing after the winter solstice, when the lengthening days gave the hope of another revolving year, with all its fruits and blessings. But, in the words of Mr. Prescott, after he has noticed the remarkable analogy of the Mexican cycles of years with those of the Mongol nations,—

“A correspondence quite as extraordinary is found between the hieroglyphics used by the Aztecs for the signs of the days, and those zodiacal signs which the Eastern Asiatics employed as one of the terms of their series. The symbols in the Mongolian calendar are borrowed from animals. Four of the twelve are the same as the Aztec. Three others are as nearly the same as the different species of the animals in the two hemispheres would allow. The remaining five refer to no creature then found in Anahuac.”

The note gives the names of the zodiacal signs used as the names of the years by the Eastern Asiatics (of the signs of the zodiac the Mexicans probably had no knowledge):—

“Among the Mongols, 1. mouse, 2. ox, 3. leopard (Mantchou, Japanese, &c., tiger,) 4. hare, 5. crocodile (Mantchou and Japanese, dragon,) 6. serpent, 7. hare, 8. sheep (Mantchou, &c., goat,) 9. monkey, 10. hen, 11. dog, 12. hog. In the Mexican signs for the names of the days, we also meet with hare, serpent, monkey, dog. Instead of the leopard, crocodile, and hen, neither of which animals were known in Mexico at the time of the conquest, we find the ocelot, the lizard, and the eagle. The lunar calendar of the Hindoos exhibits a correspondence equally extraordinary. Seven of the terms agree with those of the Aztecs, namely, serpent, cane, razor, path of the sun, dog's tail, house. [Mr. Prescott gives but six.] These terms are still more arbitrarily selected, not being confined to animals.”—Vol. iii., p. 345.

We cannot but suspect that all these signs arose out of hieroglyphic or picture writing, but this by no means explains the curious resemblance. There is another point of considerable importance, which tends to show that the more civilized tribes of Southern America were of a different family of mankind from the common savage races of the islands and continent. The crania disinterred from the sepulchral mounds in those regions, as well as those of the inhabitants of the high plains of the Cordilleras, differ from those of the more barbarous tribes. The ampler forehead intimates a decided intellectual superiority, and bears a close resemblance with that of some of the Mongol tribes. We are inclined to think the habit of burning the dead, familiar to the Mongols and the Aztecs, no very strong evidence of common descent. The departure from the strange habit of burying the dead in a sitting posture, practised, according to Mr. Prescott, by most, if not all, the aborigines from Canada to Patagonia, is a more convincing proof of the independent origin of those more savage races. The latter argument tends, as far as it goes, to establish an identity of race with the Eastern Asiatics; the other singular coincidences of the calendar and the names of the days might possibly be ascribed to the casual visit of a few strangers from the Asiatic coasts, who may have imparted their superior knowledge and their religious traditions. There was, however, no such distinct tradition among the Aztecs, as among the Peruvians, of a Mango Capac, who, suddenly appearing among a barbarous race, from his superior intelligence and knowledge, was hailed with awe and reverence as a deity, as a child of the sun, and to whom is ascribed the whole framework of the social polity, and all which may be called civilization. The Mexican traditions relate to the migration of tribes rather than to the power or influence of individual chiefs or sages, unless perhaps that beneficent God, supposed to have reappeared in the person of the Spaniards.

We have glanced thus rapidly at some of the more prominent points in this curious, but, we must confess, unsatisfactory discussion, because this appears to be the strongest case in history of a spontaneous and indigenous civilization growing up without foreign influence, and within a recent period. Whatever traditions the natives of Anahuac might inherit from their Asiatic origin, if Asia was indeed the cradle of the race, have survived, what seems incredible, the total extinction of every sign of relationship in the language. The only faint traces of etymological resemblance have been found or imagined in the Otomic, the language of one of the most barbarous tribes, which is supposed to offer the nearest analogy, and that with the Chinese. Besides this, it is acknowledged that far the larger part, and that which gives its general Asiatic character to the Mexican civilization, is to all appearance but of late development. Even their legendary or mythic history is modest in its pretensions; neither Mexico nor Tezucuo claim any high or mysterious antiquity. The account of the foundation of both cities, as we have seen, is probable and recent. Let us take a very hasty survey of this introductory chapter of Mexican history.

The Toltecs are the Pelasgians of this civi-zation of Anahuac. They were an agricultural race, skilled in some of the mechanical arts, and to them are ascribed the buildings of the greatest solidity and magnificence, the monuments of Transatlantic Cyclopean architecture—yet neither they nor their buildings aspire to any formidable age. Even if we ascribe the ruins of Palenque and Uxmal, and some of the structures in the adjacent provinces, described by Mr. Stephens, to this race and to their descendants, there is no considerable difference, either in the style, the form, or the construction, or what we may conjecture to have been their uses, from the buildings found by the Spaniards in the Mexican cities, from the temples and fortresses of the existing people; there is nothing to throw the one upward into a more remote antiquity; nothing like the wide distinction between the architectures of Egypt and Greece, or even between the Pelasgian or Cyclopean masonry and that of the Hellenic tribes. A period of a very few centuries will connect the two races, even if we admit to the utmost the only evidence of a certain degree of antiquity in the older ruins, the growth of trees of enormous size within their precincts, which must have taken root after the buildings had been abandoned either as habitations or places of worship. In all these cases we must know more accurately the ordinary growth of such trees, since some kinds of timber, in that climate and in that soil, are known to increase with extraordinary rapidity.

Mexican history, however, as we have seen, did not scruple to assign, if a vague and uncertain, yet certainly no very remote period for the disappearance of the Toltec population, and the settlement and growth of the Aztec races, who were in possession of the country at the time of the Spanish invasion. The league between the great leading tribes of Mexico, of Tezcuco, and the smaller state of Tlacopan, in which these three kingdoms had combined, is a singular example of a national confederation. The league was both defensive and offensive; and the spoils and conquests torn by the combined forces from their more barbarous neighbors were divided upon a fixed scale. Yet with this dangerous element of jealousy and discord, the league had continued for a considerable period in perfect harmony.

Mexico, when the Spaniards landed, was the leading state in wealth and in power. But Tezcuco had attained to a much higher, and, if we are to credit the native historians, a much more enlightened state of civilization. The most curious and interesting passage in Mr. Prescott's history of the earlier state of Anahuac describes the rise and the reign of the great king of Tezcuco, with whose awful name we shall not appal our reader's eyes or ears till it is absolutely necessary. Whether read as sober history, or as mythic legend, or as a kind of Aztec Cyropedia, it is equally extraordinary, resting as it does on the authority of a native Livy, who, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, combined into a regular history or histories the hieroglyphics, the songs, and traditions of his native land, as well as the oral testimony of many aged persons. Ixtlilxochitl, whose name we have before noticed, a descendant of the royal race, became interpreter to the viceroy; his high situation gave him command of all the ancient documents in the possession of the Spanish government, to which he added large collections of his own. He wrote in Castilian, and Mr. Prescott observes that "there is an appearance of good faith and simplicity in his writings, which may convince the reader that, when he errs, it is from no worse cause than national partiality." But it would seem almost incredible that, even under the inspiration of the most ardent reverence for his ancestors, the ideal of a Mexican educated under Spanish influence, and living among either statesmen or friars of that period, should take this remarkable form. Our Aztec Livy must indeed have possessed a noble genius, if he could imagine some of the social and political institutions which he ascribes to the Numa of Tezcuco.*

The rising fortunes and the civilization of the Acolhuans, who entered the Valley and founded Tezcuco about the close of the twelfth century, were checked and interrupted by the subjugation of the city and territory under the Tepanecs, a kindred but more barbarous tribe:—

"This event took place about 1418; and the young prince, Nezahualcoyotl, the heir to the crown, then fifteen years old, saw his father butchered before his eyes, while he himself lay concealed among the friendly branches of a tree, which overshadowed the spot. His subsequent history is as full of romantic daring and perilous escapes as that of the renowned Scanderbeg, or of the 'young Chevalier.'"—Vol. i., p. 146.

These adventures, of which Mr. Prescott gives a brief but stirring account, terminated with the defeat of the Tezcapecs, the death of Maxtla, the last king of their race, the accession of Nezahualcoyotl to his ancestral throne, and the establishment of the federal league between Mexico, Tezcuco, and Tlacopan:—

"The first measure of Nezahualcoyotl, on returning to his dominions, was a general amnesty. It was his maxim, 'that a monarch might punish, but revenge was unworthy of him.' In the present instance he was averse even to punish, and not only freely pardoned his rebel nobles, but conferred on some, who had most deeply offended, posts of honor and confidence. Such conduct was doubtless politic, especially as their alienation was owing, probably, much more to fear of the usurper than to any disaffection towards himself. But there are some acts of policy which a magnanimous spirit only can execute.

* We would observe that the reign of this lawgiver of Tezcuco had been before given at some length, not to say profusely, by Torquemada, in his "Monarchia Indiana;" and the resemblance of the incident in his life, which will hereafter be noticed, to the narrative of Scripture, could not escape the ecclesiastical writer.

"The restored monarch next set about repairing the damages sustained under the late misrule, and reviving, or rather remodelling, the various departments of government. He framed a concise, but comprehensive, code of laws, so well suited, it was thought, to the exigencies of the times, that it was adopted as their own by the two other members of the triple alliance. It was written in blood, and entitled the author to be called the Draco, rather than the 'Solon of Anahuac,' as he is fondly styled by his admirers. Humanity is one of the best fruits of refinement. It is only with increasing civilization that the legislator studies to economize human suffering, even for the guilty; to devise penalties, not so much by way of punishment for the past as of reformation for the future.

"He divided the burden of government among a number of departments, as the council of war, the council of finance, the council of justice. This last was a court of supreme authority, both in civil and criminal matters, receiving appeals from the lower tribunals of the provinces, which were obliged to make a full report, every four months, or eighty days, of their own proceedings to this higher judicature. In all these bodies a certain number of citizens were allowed to have seats with the nobles and professional dignitaries. There was, however, another body, a council of state, for aiding the king in the despatch of business, and advising him in matters of importance, which was drawn altogether from the highest order of chiefs. It consisted of fourteen members; and they had seats provided for them at the royal table.

"Lastly, there was an extraordinary tribunal, called the council of music, but which, differing from the import of its name, was devoted to the encouragement of science and art. Works on astronomy, chronology, history, or any other science, were required to be submitted to its judgment before they could be made public. This censorial power was of some moment, at least with regard to the historical department, where the wilful perversion of truth was made a capital offence by the bloody code of Nezahualcoyotl. Yet a Tezucan author must have been a bungler who could not elude a conviction under the cloudy veil of hieroglyphics. This body, which was drawn from the best instructed persons in the kingdom, with little regard to rank, had supervision of all the productions of art and of the nicer fabrics. It decided on the qualifications of the professors in the various branches of science, on the fidelity of their instructions to their pupils, the deficiency of which was severely punished, and it instituted examinations of these latter. In short, it was a general board of education for the country. On stated days, historical compositions, and poems treating of moral or traditional topics, were recited before it by their authors. Seats were provided for the three crowned heads of the empire, who deliberated with the other members on the respective merits of the pieces, and distributed prizes of value to the successful competitors.

"Such are the marvellous accounts transmitted to us of this institution; an institution certainly not to have been expected among the aborigines of America. It is calculated to give us a higher idea of the refinement of the people than even the noble architectural remains which still cover some parts of the continent."—Vol. i., pp. 152–155.

The monarch himself, like some other great potentates of the East and West, aspired to be a poet. The burthen of his song seems to have been that "vanity of vanities," of King Solomon, which is echoed along the course of Eastern, at least of Mahometan poetry, with more or less touching melancholy, and more or less grave epicurean advice to enjoy, while we may, the pleasures of this fleeting and uncertain life. The king of Tezucuo may take his place among royal and noble authors, not merely from traditionary fame, but from a translation of one of his Odes into Castilian. Mr. Prescott has subjoined a translation of the Castilian into English, "by the hand of a fair friend."

"But the hours of the Tezucan monarch were not all passed in idle dalliance with the muse, nor in the sober contemplations of philosophy, as at a later period. In the freshness of youth and early manhood he led the allied armies in their annual expeditions, which were certain to result in a wider extent of territory to the empire. In the intervals of peace he fostered those productive arts which are the surest sources of public prosperity. He encouraged agriculture above all; and there was scarcely a spot so rude, or a steep so inaccessible, as not to confess the power of cultivation. The land was covered with a busy population, and towns and cities sprung up in places since deserted, or dwindled into miserable villages.

"From resources thus enlarged by conquest and domestic industry, the monarch drew the means for the large consumption of his own numerous household, and for the costly works which he executed for the convenience and embellishment of the capital. He filled it with stately edifices for his nobles, whose constant attendance he was anxious to secure at his court. He erected a magnificent pile of buildings which might serve both for a royal residence and for the public offices. It extended, from east to west, 1234 yards; and from north to south, 978. It was encompassed by a wall of unburnt bricks and cement, six feet wide and nine high, for one half of the circumference, and fifteen feet high for the other half. Within this enclosure were two courts. The outer one was used as the great market-place of the city; and continued to be so until long after the Conquest, if, indeed, it is not now. The interior court was surrounded by the council chambers and halls of justice. There were also accommodations there for the foreign ambassadors; and a spacious saloon, with apartments opening into it, for men of science and poets, who pursued their studies in this retreat, or met together to hold converse under its marble porticoes. In this quarter also were kept the public archives, which fared better under the Indian dynasty than they have since under their European successors.

"Adjoining this court were the apartments of the king, including those for the royal harem, as liberally supplied with beauties as that of an eastern sultan. Their walls were encrusted with alabasters and richly tinted stucco, or hung with gorgeous tapestries of variegated feather-work. They led through long arcades, and through intricate labyrinths of shrubbery, into gardens, where baths and sparkling fountains were overshadowed by tall groves of cedar and cypress. The basins of water were well stocked with fish of various kinds, and the aviaries with birds glowing in all the gaudy plumage of the tropics. Many birds and animals, which could not be obtained alive, were represented in gold and silver so skilfully, as to have furnished the great naturalist, Hernandez, with models for his work.

"Accommodations on a princely scale were provided for the sovereigns of Mexico and Tlacopan, when they visited the court. The whole of this lordly pile contained three hundred apartments, some of them fifty yards square. The height of the building is not mentioned; it was probably not great, but supplied the requisite room by the immense extent of ground which it covered. The interior was doubtless constructed of light materials, especially of the rich woods, which, in that country, are remarkable, when polished, for the brilliancy and variety of their colors. That the more solid materials of stone and stucco were also liberally employed, is proved by the remains at the present day; remains which have furnished an inexhaustible quarry for the churches and other edifices since erected by the Spaniards on the site of the ancient city.

"We are not informed of the time occupied in building this palace; but two hundred thousand workmen, it is said, were employed on it! However this may be, it is certain that the Tezcucan monarchs, like those of Asia and ancient Egypt, had the control of immense masses of men, and would sometimes turn the whole population of a conquered city, including the women, into the public works.—The most gigantic monuments of architecture which the world has witnessed would never have been reared by the hands of freemen.

"Adjoining the palace were buildings for the king's children, who, by his various wives, amounted to no less than sixty sons and fifty daughters. Here they were instructed in all the exercises and accomplishments suited to their station; comprehending, what would scarcely find a place in a royal education on the other side of the Atlantic, the arts of working in metals, jewelry, and feather-mosaic. Once in every four months the whole household, not excepting the youngest, and including all the officers and attendants on the king's person, assembled in a grand saloon of the palace, to listen to a discourse from an orator, probably one of the priesthood. The princes, on this occasion, were all dressed in nequen, the coarsest manufacture of the country. The preacher began by enlarging on the obligations of morality, and of respect for the gods, especially important in persons whose rank gave such additional weight to example. He occasionally seasoned his homily with a pertinent application to his audience, if any member of it had been guilty of a notorious delinquency. From this wholesome admonition the monarch himself was not exempted, and the orator boldly reminded him of his paramount duty to show respect for his own laws. The king, so far from taking umbrage, received the lesson with humility; and the audience, we are assured, were often melted into tears by the eloquence of the preacher. This curious scene may remind one of similar usages in the Asiatic and Egyptian despotisms, where the sovereign occasionally condescended to stoop from his pride of place, and allow his memory to be refreshed with the conviction of his own mortality. It soothed the feelings of the subject to find himself thus placed, though but for a moment, on a level with his king; while it cost little to the latter, who was removed too far from his people to suffer anything by this short-lived familiarity. It is probable that such an act of public humiliation would have found less favor with a prince less absolute."—Vol. i., pp. 166, 164.

The villas of this Western Sultan were no less splendid, tasteful, and luxurious, and the history of his domestic life is, for another reason, even more surprising. The harem of these sovereigns, as we have seen, was no less amply peopled than those of the most gorgeous Oriental potentates. But the law of Tezcuco allowed only one lawful wife, to whose children the crown descended by immemorial usage. The king had been disappointed in an early attachment—the princess who had been educated for his wife had been given to another; and the just prince submitted to the decree of the court, which awarded her to his rival. His lawful wife, however, he obtained in a manner so strangely resembling the Old Testament history of David and Uriah, that we should not be satisfied by less than the solemn protest of the historian, that it was related on the authority of the son and grandson of the king. This act is recorded as the great indelible stain upon his character; and national partiality and ancestral reverence would here have struggled against any unconscious bias towards assimilating the life of his great forefather to that example in the Sacred History which he might have heard from his Christian instructors.

But Nezahualcoyotl was likewise the Haroun Alraschid and the Akber of the West. He not only resembled the former in his magnificence, but in his love of disguise, in which he went about discovering the feelings of his subjects in regard to his government, and meeting with adventures which in like manner tried his barbaric justice. Some of the stories are as pithy and diverting as the "Arabian Nights," which we are obliged to remember were not known in Europe till very long after the Tezcucan historian had been gathered to his forefathers. The resemblance to the great Mahometan sovereign of India is the superiority of the Acolhuan to the religious creed of his ancestors. There is something, to those familiar with the old Oriental legends of the Tal-mud or the Koran, singularly and unaccountably similar:—

"He had been married some years to the wife he had so unrighteously obtained, but was not blessed with issue. The priests represented that it was owing to his neglect of the gods of his country; and that his only remedy was to propitiate them by human sacrifice. The king reluctantly consented, and the altars once more smoked with the blood of slaughtered captives. But it was all in vain; and he indignantly exclaimed, 'These idols of wood and stone can neither hear nor feel, much less could they make the heavens and the earth, and man, the lord of it. These must be the work of the all-powerful, unknown God, Creator of the universe, on whom alone I must rely for consolation and support.'

"He then withdrew to his rural palace of Tezcotzinco, where he remained forty days, fasting and praying at stated hours, and offering up no other sacrifice than the sweet incense of copal, and aromatic herbs and gums. At the expiration of this time, he is said to have been comforted by a vision assuring him of the success of his petition. At all events, such proved to be the fact; and this was followed by the cheering intelligence of the triumph of his arms in a quarter where he had lately experienced some humiliating reverses.

"Greatly strengthened in his former religious convictions, he now openly professed his faith, and was more earnest to wean his subjects from their degrading superstitions, and to substitute nobler and more spiritual conceptions of the Deity. He built a temple in the usual pyramidal form, and on the summit a tower nine stories high, to represent the nine heavens; a tenth was surmounted by a roof painted black, and profusely gilded with stars on the outside, and incrustured with metals and precious stones within. He dedicated this to 'the unknown God, the Cause of causes.' It seems probable, from the emblem on the tower, as well as from the complexion of his verses, as we shall see, that he mingled with his reverence for the Supreme the astral worship which existed among the Toltecs. Various musical instruments were placed on the top of the tower; and the sound of them, accompanied by the ringing of a sonorous metal struck by a mallet, summoned the worshippers to prayers at regular seasons. No image was allowed in the edifice, as unsuited to the 'invisible God;' and the people were expressly prohibited from profaning the altars with blood, or any other sacrifices than that of the perfume of flowers and sweet-scented gums."—Vol. i., pp. 173, 175.

If we are to trust the verses which the king composed in the midst of the astronomical studies of his old age—with this higher view of religion—nobler and more consolatory thoughts of the future state of being had dimly dawned upon his mind:—

"All things on earth have their term, and, in the most joyous career of their vanity and splendor, their strength fails, and they sink into the dust. All the round world is but a sepulchre; and there is nothing which lives on its surface that shall not be hidden and entombed beneath it. Rivers, torrents, and streams move onward to their destination. Not one flows back to its pleasant source. They rush onward, hastening to bury themselves in the deep bosom of the ocean. The things of yesterday are no more to-day; and the things of to-day shall cease, perhaps on the morrow. The cemetery is full of the loathsome dust of bodies once quickened by living souls, who occupied thrones, presided over assemblies, marshalled armies, subdued provinces, arrogated to themselves worship, were puffed up with vainglorious pomp, and power, and empire. But these glories have all passed away like the fearful smoke that issues from the throat of Popocatepetl, with no other memorial of their existence than the record on the page of the chronicler.

"The great, the wise, the valiant, the beautiful,—alas! where are they now? They are all mingled with the clod, and that which has befallen them shall happen to us, and to those that come after us. Yet let us take courage, illustrious nobles and chieftains, true friends and loyal subjects,—let us aspire to that heaven where all is eternal, and corruption cannot come. The horrors of the tomb are but the cradle of the Sun, and the dark shadows of death are brilliant lights for the stars."

"The mystic import of the last sentence seems to point to that superstition respecting the mansions of the Sun, which forms so beautiful a contrast to the dark features of the Aztec mythology."—Vol. i., pp. 175–177.

We must leave the death of the great Tezcucan monarch, and the reign of his son, in Mr. Prescott's pages. Mexico was to Tezcucan as the sterner and more warlike Rome to the more polite and cultivated Greece. Like Venice, founded by a few wanderers and fugitives on the swampy islands of the great lake, it became a powerful city—the centre of a great nation. The city rose, with rapid progress, to strength and splendor; it connected itself with the land by its strong and solid causeways, bridged over at intervals; and its situation would have been impregnable to less than Spanish valor, European arms, and European vessels. Mexico was an elective monarchy; the choice of the sovereign rested with four of the caciques, who were bound to select one of the brothers, or, in default of brothers, one of the nephews of the late king. The king was a despot; in him was vested the whole legislative and executive power in war and peace; yet there was a powerful nobility of caciques, who held their estates by different tenures, but all might be summoned—perhaps required no summons—to attend the sovereign, with their people, when he went out to war. Their judicial system might excite the astonishment of the Spaniards of that age; it sometimes draws forth a sly expression of envy from their older writers, on whose authority, as well as that of the hieroglyphic paintings, it is described. In each city and its depending territory was a supreme judge, appointed by, and maintained at the expense of, the crown, but entirely independent, holding his office for life, and with no appeal, even to the king, from his tribunal. He took cognizance of all great causes, both civil and criminal. A capital sentence was marked in the hieroglyphical paintings by an arrow drawn across the figure of the criminal. Below the supreme judge there were inferior tribunals for minor causes, down to a kind of police-offices, each of which was to watch over a certain number of families, and report any breach of the laws to the tribunals. Bribery in a judge was punished with death. It was death to usurp the insignia of a judge. The laws were barbarously prodigal of human life. Murder, adultery, some kinds of theft, destruction of the landmarks of property, altering the public measures, unfaithful guardianship of the estate of a ward, even intemperance in young persons, were capital crimes. Barbarism and civilization mingled still more strangely in the law of slavery. Prisoners taken in battle were reserved as sacrifices to the gods; but no one could be born to slavery in Mexico. Criminals, public defaulters, (for the system of taxation was rigorous and well organized,) persons in extreme poverty, either became slaves by law, or sold themselves into slavery. Parents could thus deal with their children. The services, however, of such slaves were limited; their lives and persons protected; they could not be sold, except in case of extreme poverty, by their masters; their children were born free. The law and the usage seem to have been equally lenient. They were often emancipated, as in Rome, at the death of their master.

The Aztecs of Mexico were a martial race; their leading institutions and the national spirit, the splendor of dress, of ornament, and the pride and glory of Aztec, were centered in war; their legions consisting of 8,000 men, not without discipline. Montezuma had been a distinguished warrior and conqueror. The peculiarity in their mode of fighting was that they did not seek to kill, but to make prisoners, and these prisoners were to be solemn votive offerings to the gods. They did not scalp their enemies, like the North American Indians, and esteem their prowess by the number of scalps they had won: but their valor was tested by the numbers which they furnished for the horrid human hecatombs on their teocallis, or temples.

It was the unspeakable barbarity of this part of their religion which so strongly and darkly contrasted with the justice and, in some respects, mild humanity of their civil institutions. All that we know of human sacrifices in the Old World, from "Moloch, horrid king," and the kindred superstitions of older Asia, the self-immolations under the car of Jaganaut, with the other bloody rites of Siva and of Durga in India, the wicker-cages in which our ancestors the Druids consumed their victims; all these terrific scenes shrink into nothing before the amount of human beings regularly slaughtered on the altars of the Mexican gods, with the revolting circumstances which accompanied their sacrifice. These rites seem to have been peculiar to the Aztec races, and among the Mexicans rose to a more dreadful height, and were more inveterately rooted in their habits and feelings. Tradition ascribes to the older Toltecs that milder character which usually belongs to the agricultural races. They offered only purer and bloodless sacrifices to their deities. We have seen that the enlightened sovereign of Tezeuco strove to mitigate, though he could not abolish, this national usage. There can be no doubt that human sacrifices formed a regular part of some of the eastern religions; in the remoter East, as well as in Syria and in Carthage. The instances recorded in later times, in the more polished nations of antiquity, were in general single victims, and offered when the public mind was darkened by the dread, or suffering under the infliction, of some tremendous calamity.* It may be questioned whether the burning alive of men among the Druids was not judicial rather than religious—execution rather than sacrifice; for the Druids were the judges as well as the priests of the ancient Gauls and Britons. But there is nothing like the refinement (if we may use such a word) of cruelty which, among the nations of Anahuac, made it part of the law of war that the prisoner should be spared on the battle-field, and deliberately and in cold blood offered to the god of war. The priest, as it were, held the hands of the warrior, in order that himself might have the exclusive privilege of slaughter.

Mr. Prescott, with pardonable, and indeed enforced incredulity, makes large deductions from the estimates of victims thus regularly sacrificed on the altars in Mexico. Numbers command but little confidence in older histories, whether poetical or traditional, or, like those of Mexico, chiefly hieroglyphical.* But one fact, he observes, "may be considered certain. It was customary to preserve the skulls of the sacrificed in buildings appropriated to the purpose. The companions of Cortes counted 136,000 in one of these edifices. Without attempting a precise calculation, therefore, it is safe to conclude that thousands were yearly offered up, in the different cities of Anahuac, on the bloody altars of the Mexican divinities." The circumstances of these horrid rites were, if possible, more revolting than the amount of the hecatombs. The flesh runs cold at the account. The more distinguished victims were fattened, as it were, were indulged in every kind of luxury and enjoyment till the day of sacrifice arrived. It was the great national spectacle, the most solemn religious festival. The high pyramidal temples appear to have been constructed for the express purpose of exhibiting the whole minute detail of the torture, and the execution, to the largest number of people. Our abhorrence is increased by the manner in which the priests officiated in the ceremony, groping among the entrails with their bloody hands for the heart of the victim. But in the darkest depth there is even a darker depth. Some paradoxical writers have attempted to dispute the proofs of cannibalism; which, if less common than is supposed, appears to us to rest on incontestable evidence in so many quarters of the world. The most amiable skepticism can, we fear, encourage no doubt that in Mexico both priests and both the Iphigenias of Euripides, in one of which the victor is saved by the intervention of the deity, in the other it is the altar of the barbarous Scythian Diana where such offerings are made, show the predominant feeling on this subject in Greece and Rome. Two notes in Milman's "History of Christianity," vol. i., p. 27, mention the recorded exceptions of later times.

* The Roman prohibitory law against human sacrifices, quoted by Mr. Prescott from Pliny, is manifestly directed against foreign and Oriental magical rites. Livy's words relating to such rites, "more non Romano,"

* There is something very honest in old Bernal Diaz, who accuses Gomara of enormously exaggerating the numbers slain in the different battles under Cortes himself. "Our force seldom much exceeded four hundred men; and even if we had found the multitude he speaks of bound hand and foot, we had not been able to put so many to death."

and people feasted on the flesh of the victims, which was cast down among them. It seems to have been a part of the sacrifice; just like the feasting on the slaughtered bulls and goats of other religious sacrifices. Alas for human nature, that such things should be in a land where Providence was so lavish of all its bounties; where man was so far advanced beyond the savage—had learned to improve the blessings of God by the arts of civilization, and in so many respects had submitted himself to the softening influence of regular social order, of just and humane institutions, even of many of the domestic virtues.*

Had the Spaniards appeared in the cities of Mexico solely as the champions of humanity—as commissioned by the common Father of mankind forcibly to put down these unspeakable abominations—not as asserting the sovereignty of a foreign emperor, who had no more right to the supremacy over Mexico than over France or England, on the preposterous claim of a papal grant; had they raised the banner of the cross only to save the thousand victims of this ferocious superstition from their unmerited fate—not to compel, by fire and sword, the adoption, we must not say the belief, of that religion emphatically termed the religion of mercy,—in this case, though the strict justice of such interposition might have been questionable, the stronger sympathies of men would have hailed their triumph. Though their own hands might not be clean, though their own autos da fé might rise up against them, as in one respect more appalling—as more utterly alien to the spirit of their religion—yet no one would have disputed the merit of ridding the earth, and that with such surprising valor, of such a monstrous superstition.

Let us look, however, at the question in another light. Consider the ferocity which a people must have imbibed from these bloody spectacles, and the evidence which is furnished of the warlike character of a nation which could thus feed its altars with thousands of prisoners, from tribes as strong, if not as well armed, as themselves, and our astonishment at the conquest achieved by this handful of Spaniards is immeasurably increased. Consider the dread in which the Aztecs must on this account, as well as on others, have been held by the surrounding nations. It is even more extraordinary, notwithstanding the wide-spread discontent at their tyranny, and the proneness to rebellion or to war of the neighboring tribes, that Cortes should find or make allies who should adhere to him in disaster as well as success—in defeat as well as in victory. It was this mighty empire, or rather confederation of empires, which Cortes, with a few hundred Spaniards, did not hesitate to invade, and hoped to subdue. It was not long, indeed, before he discovered the dissensions which existed in the country; that, besides the valor, and arms, and horses of his own few soldiers, he might array some of the most powerful tribes against the empire of Montezuma; and the revolted subjects of Mexico, weary of their emperor's tyrannical sway, would be his best allies. In the first city which he conquered, (Cempoalla,) the inhabitants of the town and of the neighboring province, who, according to his statement, could bring fifty thousand men into the field, willingly, as Cortes writes to Charles V., became the vassals of his Majesty.

"They also begged me to protect them against that mighty lord (Montezuma) who used violent and tyrannical measures to keep them in subjection, and took from them their sons to be slain, and offered as sacrifices to his idols, with many other complaints against him, in order to avoid whose tyranny they embraced the service of your Majesty, to which they have so far proved faithful, and I doubt not will continue so, since they have been uniformly treated by me with favor and attention."—Despatches of Cortes, p. 40.

In another passage he says,—

"I was not a little pleased on seeing their want of harmony, as it seemed favorable to my designs, and would enable me to bring them more easily into subjection. I applied to their case the authority of the evangelist, who says, 'Every kingdom divided against itself shall be rendered desolate.'"—Ibid., p. 64.

Cortes very early in his career received intelligence of the hostility of the powerful republic of Tlascala to the empire of Mexico, and entertained hopes of turning this to his own advantage: but, though at the same time with the arduous and appalling nature of their enterprise, these more reasonable means of accomplishing it opened upon the minds of the invaders—they had a ready plunged headlong into the adventure, and the esolute heart of Cortes seemed wound up to a accomplish it, or to perish in the attempt. In his first despatch to the emperor (the lost despatch, but to which he appeals in the second,) he "had assured his Highness that he (Montezuma) should be taken either dead or alive, or become a subject to the royal throne of your Majesty." (p. 39.) It was a warfare in which they engaged without counting the cost or the hazard, because it was a warfare of conquest and of glory for Spain; still more because it was a holy warfare—a warfare against infidels. It was not that they knowingly alleged the pretext of religious zeal to cover the nobler passion of ambition, or the baser one of avarice. There can be no doubt that this of itself was a great, if not the great, dominant impulse. The thirst for gold and for power were so inseparably mixed up with this lofty and disinterested bigotry that they themselves never paused to discriminate between the prevailing motives; nor could they have discriminated, if they had ever so scrupulously examined their own hearts.

* Let the reader turn to the advice of an Aztec mother to her daughter—(the first article in Mr. Prescott's Appendix)—and though that deepest well-spring of tenderness, a mother's heart, is never dry, even in the lowest condition of humanity, and the "advice inculcates conjugal fidelity, not merely because God, who is in every place, sees you, but because the law punished adultery with death;" yet it seems almost incredible that such pure and gentle, though simply expressed, sentiments could prevail among a people whose altars, whose lips, reeked with human blood.

It was, as Mr. Prescott calls it, a crusade; it was one of the last, but not least, vigorous outbursts of that same spirit which had poured Europe in arms upon the East; and in the Peninsula had just fought out the long and implacable contest of Christian and Moor. Some more enlightened churchmen, like Las Casas, some more gentlemanly and more prudent friars (like Father Olmedo, who was of the utmost use in restraining the blind and headstrong bigotry of Cortes,) might have gleams of a more genuine Christianity; but in Spanish armies, in Europe as well as in America, hardly one, from the Duke of Alva to the meanest common soldier, but believed it, in the depth of his heart, to be his solemn duty to compel the baptism of unbelievers at the point of the sword. The velvet banner which Cortes raised before his door at Cuba, to invite adventurers to join him in his enterprise, bore the royal arms, with a cross, and the motto—"Brothers, follow the cross in faith; for under its guidance we shall conquer." "And besides, (Cortes, as he himself writes, reminded his soldiers,) we are only doing what as Christians we are under obligations to do, by warring against the enemies of the faith—by which means we secured to ourselves glory in another world, and gained greater honor and rewards, in this life, than had fallen to the lot of any other generation at any former period; they should also reflect that God was on our side, and that to him nothing is impossible, as they might see in the victories we had gained, when so many of the enemy were killed without any loss on our part." On their first serious affair with the Indians an apostle was believed at the time (or afterwards fabled) to have appeared, and fought on their side. And on other occasions of peril and disaster, the same faith beheld the same supernatural appearances. Even Diaz himself ceases to doubt in the celestial presence of St. Jago.* Throughout, the Mexicans are the "enemies of God and our King."

*The passage of Bernal Diaz relating to the first apparition, which we take from the English translation, is worth notice, as to that story itself, and still more so with reference to his subsequent convictions. "Gomara relates that in this battle, previous to the arrival of Cortes with his cavalry, one of the Holy Apostles, either St. Jago or Peter, appeared on a dapple-grey horse, under the semblance of Francesco de Morla. All our victories were assuredly guided by the hand of our Lord Jesus Christ; but if this were the case, I, a poor sinner, was not worthy to be permitted to see it, neither was it seen by any of our army, above four hundred in number. I certainly saw Francesco de Morla along with Cortes; but he rode a chestnut horse that day. We certainly were bad Christians indeed, if, according to the account of Gomara, God sent one of his Holy Apostles to fight at our head, and we ungratefully neglected to give thanks for so great a mercy; but, till I read the chronicle of Gomara, I never heard of the miracle, neither was it ever mentioned by any of the conquerors who were present in the battle."

We shall not undertake to follow Mr. Prescott through the early life of Cortes—the difficulties of the expedition before it quitted the coasts of Cuba—or the miserable weakness and jealousies of the governor, Velasquez—who, after entrusting the charge of the expedition to Cortes, and allowing him to spend his whole fortune, and all that he could raise from other quarters, on the outfit of the fleet—suddenly endeavored to revoke his commission, to arrest the fleet, and either to abandon or to place the enterprise in other hands. It is sometimes of great advantage to be ill-used: even now, as in his own day, the vacillating conduct of Velasquez, the low intrigues at his petty court, kindle all the generous sympathies in favor of Cortes; we follow him with breathless interest till he is beyond these wretched obstructions. But we are still more inclined to admiration at the extraordinary skill with which he triumphs over what might seem fatal to his success, the divided allegiance of his soldiery. He had to deal with troops, half of them, especially the leaders, malcontents—and malcontents who certainly could plead a higher authority for their mutinous behavior. We are inclined to feel more regret than is expressed by Mr. Prescott at the loss of the first despatch of Cortes, which has been sought in vain in all the archives of Europe. Some, we think very unreasonably, doubt if it was ever written; and that Cortes alludes to this imaginary document, which it would have been difficult to have framed in accordance with Spanish notions of subordination, especially those which prevailed with the counsellors of the emperor on Indian affairs. This despatch would have added, perhaps, little to our knowledge of the facts, or of the conduct of Cortes; and his own version of the quarrel with Velasquez, and his own assertion of independence, may be fully collected from other quarters—yet we should have liked to read the exact statement, as he had dressed it up for the imperial ear: still more his own first fresh impressions when he found himself, not merely in a new land, and with a meek or a hostile savage population, but on the verge of a great empire, gradually expanding before him. The expeditions of Cordova, and, still more, that of Grijalva, who had reached the coast of Mexico, had spread the knowledge of a people who lived in houses of stone and lime, cultivated maize, and possessed gold. Grijalva had seen some of their temples, with their wild priesthood, and their altars wet with human blood; and some vague rumors had transpired of powerful and wealthy races. But it was not till Cortes could avail himself of the services of Marina, that he had the least notion of the extent and power of the Mexican empire. The singular history of the beautiful and faithful interpreter, the mistress and preserver of Cortes, her unshaken attachment to the Spaniards, and wonderful escape in all their perils and disasters, is not the least truly romantic incident in the romance of their history.

On the other hand, the picture writing of the Mexicans transmitted immediately to the court the description of these awful and wonderful strangers who had suddenly appeared upon their shores. Mr. Prescott thus describes this incident, which shows the promptitude with which Cortes seized at once upon every thing which, by impressing the Mexican mind with awe of their mysterious powers, might tend to advance his designs of conquest:—

“While these things were passing, Cortes observed one of Teuhtile’s attendants busy with a pencil, apparently delineating some object. On looking at his work, he found that it was a sketch on canvass of the Spaniards, their costumes, arms, and, in short, different objects of interest, giving to each its appropriate form and color. This was the celebrated picture-writing of the Aztecs, and, as Teuhtile informed him, this man was employed in portraying the various objects for the eye of Montezuma, who would thus gather a more vivid notion of their appearance than from any description by words. Cortes was pleased with the idea; and, as he knew how much the effect would be heightened by converting still life into action, he ordered out the cavalry on the beach, the wet sands of which afforded a firm footing for the horses. The bold and rapid movements of the troops, as they went through their military exercises; the apparent ease with which they managed the fiery animals on which they were mounted; the glancing of their weapons, and the shrill cry of the trumpet, all filled the spectators with astonishment; but when they heard the thunders of the cannon, which Cortes ordered to be fired at the same time, and witnessed the volumes of smoke and flame issuing from these terrible engines, and the rushing sound of the balls, as they dashed through the trees of the neighboring forest, shivering their branches into fragments, they were filled with consternation, from which the Aztec chief himself was not wholly free.

“Nothing of all this was lost on the painters, who faithfully recorded, after their fashion, every particular; not omitting the ships—‘the water-houses,’ as they called them—of the strangers, which, with their dark hulls and snow-white sails reflected from the water, were swinging lazily at anchor on the calm bosom of the bay. All was depicted with a fidelity that excited in their turn the admiration of the Spaniards, who, doubtless unprepared for this exhibition of skill, greatly over-estimated the merits of the execution.”—Vol. i., pp. 274, 275.

It is remarkable how the circumstances of the time conspired to favor the Spanish invaders. Montezuma himself, from an intrepid warrior and a successful conqueror, had sunk into a secluded and indolent Oriental despot—instead of commanding the confidence and devoted attachment of his subjects, the glory which his youthful conquests had obtained for the Mexican name, and the advantages which had ensued from the more peaceful years of his reign, were now almost forgotten in his oppressive tyranny. Half-conquered provinces, groaning under heavy taxation, had yet the remembrance of their former freedom, and were ready to cast off the yoke. It is still more remarkable that the superstition to which Montezuma had surrendered himself as the devoutest votary, which had led him to crowd the altars with human sacrifices in unprecedented numbers, and to ally himself by the strongest ties with the bloody priesthood, now, as it were, turned against him, and prostrated his spirit before the imagined divinity, or at least the predicted success of the stranger. The desperate energy with which the religion, even more than the national spirit, maddened, it is true, by the cruelty or outrages of the Spaniards, rallied under his successor Guatemozin; the actual part which the priesthood took in the last struggle, which was so nearly fatal to the Spaniards; the manner in which the Spaniards themselves were appalled by seeing their brethren in the agony of sacrifice; and the mad hope and ungovernable frenzy of the Mexicans at that manifest triumph of their gods; all combine to show how fortunate it was that the religious feeling of Montezuma was cowed and subdued, and this most powerful weapon of resistance fell, as it were, from his hand. This alone accounts for the strange manner in which the mind of Montezuma was paralyzed at the first news of the landing of the Spaniards. The paintings of the white-bearded men in flying castles, who spoke in thunder and lightning, shook him with awe, from which he never recovered. All authorities agree about the currency of these prophecies, which no one in the empire believed with more shuddering faith than the emperor. Dryden puts them in the mouth of the high priest in his “Indian Emperor.” From the intolerable love-rants which fill that strange play, in which Spaniards and Mexicans, Cortes and Montezuma, cross each other in all the wild intricacy of amorous intrigue (as in a comedy “de Capa y Espada,”) we are inclined to rescue the few lines, more worthy of glorious John.

“Enter Guyomar hastily: the scene is a Sacrifice in the Temple.”

Odmar.—My brother Guyomar! methinks I spy,
Haste in his steps, and wonder in his eye.

Montezuma.—I sent thee to the frontiers; quickly tell

The cause of thy return; are all things well?

Guyomar.—I went in order, sir, to your command,
To view the utmost limits of the land,

To that sea-shore where no more world is found,

But foaming billows breaking on the ground,
Where, for a while, my eyes no object met,
But distant skies, that in the ocean set;
And low-hung clouds that dipp’d themselves in rain

To shake their fleeces on the earth again.

At last, as far as I could cast my eyes

Upon the sea, somewhat methought did rise

Like bluish mists, which, still appearing more,
Took dreadful shapes, and moved towards the shore.

Montezuma.—What forms did these new wonders represent?

Guyomar.—More strange than what your wonder can invent.

The object I could first distinctly view
 Was tall, straight trees, which on the waters flew :
 Wings on their sides, instead of leaves, did grow,
 Which gathered all the breath the winds could blow ;
 And at their roots grew floating palaces,
 Whose outbowed bellies cut the yielding seas.
Montezuma.—What divine monsters, O ye Gods, are these,
 That float in air, and fly upon the seas ! o
 Came they alive or dead upon the shore ?
Guyomar.—Alas ! they lived, too sure ; I heard them roar ;
 All turned their sides, and to each other spoke—
 I saw their words breathe out in fire and smoke :
 Sure 'tis their voice, that thunders from on high,
 Or these the younger brothers of the sky ;
 Deaf with the noise, I took my hasty flight—
 No mortal courage can support the fright.
High Priest.—Old prophecies foretell our fall at hand
 When bearded men in floating castles land ;
 I see it is of dire portent.”
Indian Emperor, Act i., Scene 2.

Mr. Prescott has collected these prodigies, as they rest on the Mexican authorities, either from chronicles of the time, or from those historians who wrote soon after the conquest. His explanation is sensible, and no doubt true :—

“In a preceding chapter I have noticed the popular traditions respecting Quetzalcoatl, that deity with a fair complexion and flowing beard, so unlike the Indian physiognomy, who, after fulfilling his mission of benevolence among the Aztecs, embarked on the Atlantic Sea for the mysterious shores of Tlapallan. He promised, on his departure, to return at some future day with his posterity, and resume the possession of his empire. That day was looked forward to with hope or with apprehension, according to the interest of the believer, but with general confidence throughout the wide borders of the Anahuac. Even after the conquest, it still lingered among the Indian races, by whom it was as fondly cherished, as the advent of their king Sebastian continued to be by the Portuguese, or that of the Messiah by the Jews.

“A general feeling seems to have prevailed, in the time of Montezuma, that the period for the return of the deity, and the full accomplishment of his promise, was near at hand. This conviction is said to have gained ground from various preternatural occurrences, reported with more or less detail by all the most ancient historians. In 1510, the great lake of Tezcuco, without the occurrence of a tempest, or earthquake, or any other visible cause, became violently agitated, overflowed its banks, and, pouring into the streets of Mexico, swept off many of the buildings by the fury of the waters. In 1511, one of the turrets of the great temple took fire, equally without any apparent cause, and continued to burn in defiance of all attempts to extinguish it. In the following years three comets were seen ; and not long before the coming of the Spaniards a strange light broke forth in the east. It spread broad at its base on the horizon, and, rising in a pyramidal form, tapered off as it approached the zenith. It resembled a vast sheet or flood of fire, emitting sparkles, or, as an old writer expresses it, ‘seemed thickly powdered with stars.’ At the same time, low voices were heard in the air, and doleful wailings, as if to announce some strange, mysterious calamity ! The Aztec monarch, terrified at the apparitions in the heavens, took council of Nezahualpili, who was a great proficient in the subtle science of astrology. But the royal sage cast a deeper cloud over his spirit, by reading in these prodigies the speedy downfall of the empire.

“Such are the strange stories reported by the chroniclers in which it is not impossible to detect the glimmerings of truth. Nearly thirty years had elapsed since the discovery of the islands by Columbus, and more than twenty since his visit to the American continent. Rumors, more or less distinct, of this wonderful appearance of the white men, bearing in their hands the thunder and the lightning, so like in many respects to the traditions of Quetzalcoatl, would naturally spread far and wide among the Indian nations. Such rumors, doubtless, long before the landing of the Spaniards in Mexico, found their way up the grand plateau, filling the minds of men with anticipations of the near coming of the period when the great deity was to return and receive his own again.”—Vol. I., pp. 283-285.

What wonder, then, that when Montezuma found himself face to face with the invincible, inevitable stranger, he stood rebuked and awestruck before him ! All his embassies, all his prohibitions to advance, all his intrigues, all his conspiracies, all the courageous resistance of the republicans of Tlascala, had been in vain. From the first moment in which Cortes announced his intention of visiting Mexico, he had been constantly, though slowly, approaching nearer and nearer. Montezuma may have known, probably did know, nothing of the greatest difficulties which embarrassed the movements of Cortes—of the dissensions in his own camp, the struggles of the partisans of Velasquez, joined with the fears of the more timid—of the address with which he had persuaded his troops to invest him with a kind of legal sovereignty in the new colony, holding his power direct from the crown of Spain, and independent of the governor of Cuba. He might receive vague rumors of the destruction of the ships at Vera Cruz. That daring and decisive measure, which plainly announced to the Spaniards that they had no alternative but conquest or death in a foreign land, would not carry its distinct import to the mind of the Mexican ; their motives would be obscure, and he could have no notion of the difficulties of building ships for a long sea-voyage. But this he would know, and know too certainly—that the Spaniards were moving on, and still moving on, and that obstacles fell, as by enchantment, before them. They had first reached the great city of Cempoalla, and had been received with the utmost hospitality ; they had awed or won the whole tribe to join them as allies—there, too, they had impudently, yet with impunity, denied the gods of the land, hurled the idols boldly from their pedestals, cleansed the temples from the blood which had so long flowed in honor of the deities, and set up images of their own to receive divine worship. And the gods had allowed these insults, this total abolition of their rites, to pass unresisted and unavenged! The strangers had gone fearlessly forward, ascended the strong and rugged passes of the Cordilleras, had reached the great level land, the seat of the Mexican and Tezucan empires. The Tlascalans, the most obstinate and formidable enemies of the Mexican empire, under a most skilful leader, and with the most determined valor, had in vain attempted to arrest their march. They had been ridden over by the gigantic animals which bore the iron men to battle; had been mowed down by thousands with their thunders and lightnings; and had at length been compelled to submission. The conqueror had entered Tlascala, and, by the more than human power which he seemed to exercise over the minds of men, he had changed these deadly enemies into faithful allies—all Tlascala was following the stranger in arms, to assist in the conquest of Mexico! But, more astonishing still, the dark and deep-laid conspiracy to cut them off in Cholula, devised with so much craft, and conducted with so much secrecy—had been detected by these strangers, who knew nothing of their language, who communicated with them, and but imperfectly, through one of their countrymen and one female native interpreter—detected at the moment that it was ripe—by what means, unless by the gift of reading the heart of man, or by some divine communication, they could not conjecture. The terrible and remorseless vengeance had burst upon them at the moment when they expected themselves to crush their unheeding adversaries. Cholula had paid the dreadful penalty of the meditated crime by a massacre which might appal the stoutest heart. "So far," in Mr. Prescott's words, "the prowess of the Spaniards, 'the white gods,' as they were often called, made them to be thought invincible. But it was not till their arrival at Cholula that the natives learned how terrible was their vengeance—and they trembled!"—(Vol. II., p. 33.) From this time, as far as Montezuma was concerned, the conduct of the Mexicans towards the Spaniards was deprecatory and submissive, as towards beings of another nature; their presents were like lavish offerings to deities whose power they wished to propitiate, or at least to avert their anger. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of his bolder councillors, the emperor had abandoned all thoughts of resistance, and seemed prepared to await his destiny with a kind of fearful curiosity.

The sagacious mind of Cortes had no doubt, some notion of the preternatural character in which the Spaniards appeared to the Indians. He took every opportunity of impressing those terrors more deeply on the minds of the people.

His soldiers, probably himself, were not without their apprehensions; and the expanding view of the magnificence, power, wealth, populousness of the cities which one after another rose upon their view, could not but contrast with their own narrow files and small company of fifteen horse, and less than four hundred men—accompanied indeed by numerous allies—but allies on whose fidelity it might well seem presumption to reckon implicitly. Honest Bernal Diaz is too brave not to own his fears:—"We continued our march. As our allies had informed us that Montezuma intended to put us all to death after our entry into his city, we were filled with melancholy reflections on our hazardous situation; recommending our souls, therefore, to the Lord Jesus Christ, who had brought us in safety through so many imminent dangers, and resolving to sell our lives at a dear rate, we proceeded on our march." We cannot find room for Mr. Prescott's picturesque description of the first opening of the great valley upon the astonished sight of the Spaniards; nor of the grandeur and extent of the city. But there are two more touches in Bernal Diaz, so simple, yet which convey so much in a few words, that we must allow them to stand in place of our author's longer description:—"When," says the adventurer, "I beheld the delicious scenery around me, I thought we had been transported by magic to the terrestrial paradise." As he surveyed the city from the height of one of the teocallis or temples, he says:—"The noise and bustle of the market in the great square just below was so great, that it might easily have been heard almost at the distance of a league; and some of our companions, who had seen both Rome and Constantinople, declared that they had not seen any thing comparable in those cities for convenient and regular distribution, or numbers of people."

We proceed at once to the peaceful entrance of the Spaniards into the city, and the first interview of Cortes with Montezuma. Our contempt for the pusillanimity of Montezuma, from the first moment of this meeting with Cortes, melts into respect for the dignified courtesy of his demeanor and language; the weak and superstitious barbarian becomes a noble gentleman, bowed by the weight of inevitable calamity, and enduring affliction after affliction, insult after insult, with deep but suppressed feeling, with an outward lofty patience, yet with an inward agony of wounded pride which strives not to betray itself. It is, in the favorite phrase of our neighbors, an august misfortune. With tranquil dignity he puts by the summary and, no doubt, utterly unintelligible proposal of Cortes at their first conference, that he should change his religion; and assumes the affable tone and language of a royal host. Mr. Prescott tells it well:—

"He listened, however, with silent attention, until the general had concluded his homily. He then replied, that he knew the Spaniards had held this discourse wherever they had been. He doubted not their God was, as they said, a good Being. His gods, also, were good to him. Yet what his visitor said of the creation of the world was like what he had been taught to believe. It was not worth while to discourse further of the matter. His ancestors, he said, were not the original proprietors of the land. They had occupied it but a few ages, and had been led there by a great Being, who, after giving them laws and ruling over the nation for a time, had withdrawn to the regions where the sun rises. He had declared, on his departure, that he or his descendants would again visit them and resume his empire. The wonderful deeds of the Spaniards, their fair complexions, and the quarter whence they came, all showed they were his descendants. If Montezuma had resisted their visit to his capital, it was because he had heard such accounts of their cruelties—that they sent the lightning to consume his people, or crushed them to pieces under the hard feet of the ferocious animals on which they rode. He was now convinced that these were idle tales; that the Spaniards were kind and generous in their natures; they were mortals of a different race, indeed, from the Aztecs, wiser, and more valiant—and for this he honored them.

“‘You, too,’ he added, with a smile, ‘have been told, perhaps, that I am a god, and dwell in palaces of gold and silver. But you see it is false. My houses, though large, are of stone and wood like those of others; and as to my body,’ he said, baring his tawny arm, ‘you see it is flesh and bone like yours. It is true I have a great empire, inherited from my ancestors; lands, and gold, and silver. But your sovereign beyond the waters is, I know, the rightful lord of all. I rule in his name. You, Malintzin, are his ambassador; you and your brethren shall share these things with me. Rest now from your labors. You are here in your own dwellings, and every thing shall be provided for your subsistence. I will see that your wishes shall be obeyed in the same way as my own.’ As the monarch concluded these words, a few natural tears suffused his eyes, while the image of ancient independence perhaps, flitted across his mind. *****

“The iron hearts of the Spaniards were touched with the emotion displayed by Montezuma, as well as by his princely spirit of liberality. As they passed him, the cavaliers, with bonnet in hand, made him the most profound obeisance, and ‘on the way home,’ continues the same chronicler, ‘we could discourse of nothing but the gentle breeding and courtesy of the Indian monarch, and of the respect we entertained for him.’”—Vol. ii., pp. 82-84.

Yet, in all the astonishment which Cortes felt, at seeing that mighty emperor thus, as it were, offering allegiance to his master, and heaping the most costly presents on the soldiery with imperial munificence, he never for an instant forgets any precaution which may tend to security in his hazardous position, nor any measure which may deepen the awe of his power. That very night Mexico is startled with the terrific thunder of these new gods. The whole artillery is fired, as if for a salute of rejoicing, that while its booming sounds were heard, and its sulphurous exhalations clouded over the city, Mexico might cease to wonder at the submission of her emperor to beings who thus wielded the arms of Heaven. Natural curiosity might lead Cortes almost immediately to demand permission to survey the magnificence, the extent, and the wealth of the city; and even to enter the temples, to ascertain the real character of the gods they worshipped, and the religious ceremonies they practised. The effect, if not the object, of the former, would be to stimulate the insatiable avarice of his followers, to increase their hopes of plunder to such a height as to make them shrink from no danger, hesitate at no aggression; in the latter, the unspeakable horrors of the bloody altars, the remains of human sacrifices, the cannibal priests, might steel their hearts, and even his own, to the remorseless fulfilment of his designs. Men of less fanatic faith might have imagined themselves summoned by a divine impulse, moved as Cortes declares himself on one, and that a far less justifiable, occasion, by the Holy Ghost, to risk all to rid the world of such enormities. On this subject we will only say further, that it was here that the Spanish soldiers counted the 136,000 skulls of human victims, laid up as memorials of the devotion of the Mexican people.

We turn to the darkening tragedy of Montezuma. His courteous reception of the Spaniards, his submissive acknowledgment of the superiority of the Emperor Charles, above all the liberality of his gifts, embarrassed Cortes more than open hostility; it had whetted the appetites of the soldiery for gold; it had encouraged the resolution of Cortes to effect a complete conquest of the country, yet seemed to have cut off all justification for further aggression. Yet Cortes had only been six days in the city when he determined on the seizure of the emperor in his own palace. Ambition can always find pretexts; and an event which had happened when Cortes was at Cholula had been, perhaps, treasured in his recollection for such an occasion. Two Spaniards had been murdered on their way from Vera Cruz, where Cortes had left 150 men to guard his infant settlement, to Almeria, the cacique of which city had tendered his allegiance. In a battle which followed to revenge the death of these Spaniards, the Indians had been totally defeated, but the captain, Escalante, and several other Spaniards slain. It was convenient to charge this on the secret hostility of Montezuma: no doubt, therefore, could be allowed to exist of his guilt; yet Cortes, as if he was secure against any high moral indignation on the part of his master, in his despatch to Charles V., fairly owns that he had fully resolved on the seizure of Montezuma, before he called to mind this event. There is a frankness in his avowal, that he thought all means lawful to advance what he considered his sovereign's interest, so characteristic of the times and of the man, as to make his own words worthy of quotation:—

“Judging from these things, and from what I had observed of the country, that it would subserve

the interests of your Majesty and our own security, if Moteczuma was in my power, and not wholly free from restraint; in order that he might not be diverted from the resolution and willing spirit which he showed in the service of your Majesty, especially as we Spaniards were somewhat troublesome and difficult to please; lest feeling annoyed on any occasion, he should do us some serious injury, and even might cause all memory of us to perish, in the exercise of his great power. It also appeared to me, that if he was under my control, all the other countries that were subject to him would be more easily brought to the knowledge and service of your Majesty, as afterwards actually happened. I resolved, therefore, to take him and place him in my quarters, which were of great strength."

The manner in which he fulfilled this virtuous resolution, he relates with the same quiet coolness:—

"Having used the precaution to station guards at the corner of the streets, I went to the palace of Moteczuma, as I had before often done, to visit him; and after conversing with him in a sportive manner on agreeable topics, and receiving at his hands some jewels of gold, and one of his own daughters, together with several daughters of his nobles for some of my company, I then said unto him"—(Despatches of Cortes, p. 92.)

The speech, uttered no doubt in stately Spanish by Cortes, and rendered into elegant Mexican by Marina, amounted in plain English to this—

"that he was a prisoner—that he was accused of being an accomplice in the hostilities of the cacique of Almeria—that Cortes could not believe him guilty of such unfriendly treachery, but nevertheless he must march away to the Spanish quarters."

"Montezuma listened to this proposal, and the flimsy reasoning with which it was covered, with looks of profound amazement. He became pale as death; but in a moment, his face flushed with resentment, as, with the pride of offended dignity, he exclaimed, 'When was it ever heard that a great prince, like myself, voluntarily left his own palace to become a prisoner in the hands of strangers?'

"Cortes assured him he would not go as a prisoner. He would experience nothing but respectful treatment from the Spaniards; would be surrounded by his own household, and hold intercourse with his people as usual. In short, it would be but a change of residence, from one of his palaces to another, a circumstance of frequent occurrence with him.—It was in vain. 'If I should consent to such a degradation,' he answered, 'my subjects never would!' When further pressed, he offered to give up one of his sons and of his daughters, to remain as hostages with the Spaniards, so that he might be spared this disgrace.

"Two hours passed in this fruitless discussion, till a high-mettled cavalier, Velasquez de Leon, impatient of the long delay, and seeing that the attempt, if not the deed, must ruin them, cried out, 'Why do we waste words on this barbarian? We have gone too far to recede now. Let us seize him, and, if he resists, plunge our swords into his body!' The fierce tone and menacing gestures with which this was uttered, alarmed the monarch, who inquired of Marina what the angry Spaniard said. The interpreter explained it in as gentle a manner as she could, beseeching him 'to accompany the white men to their quarters, where he would be treated with all respect and kindness, while to refuse them would but expose himself to violence, perhaps to death.' Marina, doubtless, spoke to her sovereign as she thought, and no one had better opportunity of knowing the truth than herself.

"This last appeal shook the resolution of Montezuma. It was in vain that the unhappy prince looked around for sympathy or support. As his eyes wandered over the stern visages and iron forms of the Spaniards, he felt that his hour was indeed come; and, with a voice scarcely audible from emotion, he consented to accompany the strangers,—to quit the palace, whither he was never more to return. Had he possessed the spirit of the first Montezuma, he would have called his guards around him, and left his life-blood on the threshold, sooner than have been dragged a dishonored captive across it. But his courage sank under the circumstances. He felt he was the instrument of an irresistible Fate!"—Vol. ii., pp. 153–155.

But what was this degradation to that which followed in a few days! At first he was treated with the utmost courtesy. He had full enjoyment of all the luxuries, the splendor of his state. He could command the presence of his wives and of his courtiers. He gave public audience, though every avenue was strongly guarded by the Spanish soldiery. Even the Spaniards treated him with the mockery of respect. But when the cacique arrived who had been engaged in the battle with the Spaniards, the emperor was compelled to ratify the sentence of death upon his own subjects, who, when the sentence was passed, pleaded his imperial orders. He was compelled to witness their execution with fetters on his own limbs. The criminals were burned alive—a kind of execution apparently unknown in Mexico. To us it may awaken revolting reminiscences of scenes enough in Europe, from which Cortes and his soldiers may have learned the terrible impressiveness of this kind of death. Cortes, ever mingling policy with his most atrocious acts, ordered the pyres to be constructed of the arrows, javelins, and other weapons from the arsenals around the great temple; thus craftily depriving the people of the arms which they might seize at any time, and turn against their oppressors.

"Montezuma was speechless under the infliction of this last insult. He was like one struck down by a heavy blow, that deprives him of all his faculties. He offered no resistance; but, though he spoke not a word, low, ill-suppressed moans, from time to time, intimated the anguish of his spirit. His attendants, bathed in tears, offered him their consolations. They tenderly held his feet in their arms, and endeavored, by inserting their shawls and mantles, to relieve them from the pressure of the iron. But they could not reach the iron which had penetrated into his soul. He felt that he was no more a king."—Vol. ii., p. 159.

This aggravation of insult might appear doubtful policy, but its success seemed to justify its wisdom, and of its cruelty no one took account. Cortes with his own hand, and with a solemn mockery of reverence, loosened the fetters, and then offered Montezuma his freedom; but he had read the heart of the humbled monarch, who, from fear or from shame, could no longer face his indignant subjects: the emperor remained a willing prisoner. He even seems to have subdued his mind to his fortunes. He won the hearts of the Spaniards by his dignified familiarity. He seemed to revive to the power of enjoyment. Under Spanish custody he practised his devotions in the temple; under Spanish custody he indulged in the pleasures of the chase. With consummate address, Cortes persuaded him that it was for his amusement that some brigantines were built, to exhibit to the wondering Mexicans the manner in which the Spaniards commanded the winds of heaven to impel their large vessels as they pleased. Cortes, meantime, was thus securing the mastery of the lake, either as a means of defence or of retreat.

Before long, Cortes ventured to suggest to the obsequious emperor the formal recognition of his master's supremacy. The caciques were summoned to a great public assembly. Montezuma, not without tears, took his own oath of fealty to the sovereign of the white men; and not without tears did his subjects assent to their abasement, and prove their loyal attachment by humbly following the example of their monarch. Even the hard Spaniards were moved at this touching scene. As a tangible acknowledgment of their fealty, the treasures of the land were brought in from all quarters as a tribute to the white man. Had Montezuma known the difficulties of Cortes in dividing this spoil, and the severe trial to which it subjected his authority over his army, the tribute would have appeared a politic measure; yet, thus steeped in degradation to the lips, Montezuma, as if spell-bound, retained his fidelity. He consented to degrade the sovereign of Tezcuco, (Cacumatzin,) who was hostile to the Spaniards, and to invest his brother, who was more flexible to Spanish influence, with the royal dignity.

When Cortes demanded possession of one of the temples, cleansed it from all its defilements, and insulted the religious feelings of the whole nation by the solemn and public performance of the Christian ritual in one of their own most stately sanctuaries, it was Montezuma who warned him of the danger of thus provoking to the utmost his priests and priest-led people, betrayed the growing disaffection, and made Cortes aware that the fires of the volcano were brooding, and ready to burst, beneath him. According to Bernal Diaz, "Montezuma, at a solemn conference, declared to Cortes that he was extremely grieved at the manifestation of the will of his gods that we should all be put to death, or expelled from Mexico. He therefore, as our sincere friend, earnestly recommended that we should not run the risk of incuring the indignation of his subjects, but should save our lives by a retreat whilst that remained within our power." From this moment the Spaniards slept upon their arms, with their cannon pointed, and with every precaution against surprise. "We were full of terror of being attacked by the whole force of a numerous and warlike people, exasperated by the insults we had heaped on their sovereign and their religion."*

Cortes had sent the master shipbuilder, Lopez, with Aztec artificers, to the coast, to build vessels for their return to Spain—but it is said with secret instructions to delay their completion.

It was at this perilous juncture that he achieved the most wonderful of all his wonderful exploits. He received intelligence that a Spanish force had landed, under a leader of reputation, boldly announcing that they came, if not with an imperial commission, with superior authority, to supersede, to degrade, to lead him away from the scene of his conquests. The whole of this army seemed to be impregnated with the implacable hostility of his old enemy, Velasquez, the governor of Cuba, who had fitted out the expedition, and was eager to seize the golden prize from his grasp. This force was well appointed—in number three times as great as the whole of that under Cortes—perhaps four times, at least, as great as that which he could bring into the field against them. Yet, in an incredibly short time, Cortes is marching back to Mexico at the head of the troops who came to depose him, now mingled, if not altogether in cordial amity, yet with outward unanimity, among his own veteran soldiers; he has cajoled by smooth language—he has bribed, he has beaten his enemies into his own ranks; the general, Narvaez, is his prisoner; and he finds himself at the head of a much larger Spanish force, with artillery, ammunition, and all the necessities of war, returning to the capital, unhappily, not to support, but save, if possible, the feeble and ill-commanded garrison whom he had left in Mexico.

It is not the least testimony to the transcendent abilities of Cortes, that, unless perhaps where Sandoval was in command, wherever he was not personally present all went wrong. Alvarado, whom he had left at the head of the troops in Mexico, had no one quality of a captain but intrepid courage. The massacre of six hundred Aztec nobles, unarmed, during the peaceful celebration of a religious ceremony, had at length maddened the whole people to revolt. There is no direct information whether the cruelty or rapacity of Alvarado, or some secret intelligence of a conspiracy, (not improbable, when the Mexicans saw that their whole city was now held in check by but a handful of the Spaniards,) had prompted this ill-timed and ill-conducted mimicry of the great blow struck by Cortes at Cholula; but from this time the whole Aztec nation was leagued in implacable hostility to the Spaniards. Alvarado and his garrison were shut up in the fortress, in danger of perishing by famine, (for all the markets had ceased,) and still more by want of water. Cortes, now at the head of seventy horse, and five hundred foot, was advancing, not to the peaceful reoccupation of the capital, but to the rescue—he could scarcely hope the timely rescue—of his men. Through a silent and unpeopled country, over the silent and unpeopled lake, through the silent and unpeopled streets of Mexico, he arrives at the gates of the fortress, and unites his whole force to encounter the multiplying dangers.

* Not merely is Mr. Prescott's narrative in this part more full and circumstantial than that of De Solis, but the impression is entirely different. De Solis slurs over the daring insult to the religion of the country, and the scene of the Christian service in a part of one of the Mexican temples, so strikingly told by Mr. Prescott. According to his view, Montezuma grew impatient of the presence of the Spaniards, more than hinted that the purposes of their embassy had been fulfilled, and that it was now time for them to depart. He says little more on the profound religious excitement than "that the devil wearied Montezuma with horrible menaces, giving to his idols a voice, or what seemed a voice, to irritate him against the Spaniards." Robertson is more full and particular than De Solis; but Mr. Prescott has seized, we think, with as much accuracy as picturesqueness of description, the real turning point in the fortunes of the Spaniards.

Even Cortes himself allowed his Spanish pride to blind his cool and sagacious judgment. He treated Montezuma, who still protested his fidelity to the Spanish cause, with the most galling contempt. When he spurned “the dog of a king” from his presence, he not only utterly broke the spirit of the unhappy monarch, but by violating that divinity which, according to the Aztec feeling, “still hedged the king,” he abandoned all the advantage which he had hitherto gained by the possession of the royal person. By a still more fatal and unaccountable error he released at that moment the brother of Montezuma, a bold warrior, who no doubt spread abroad the intelligence of this last insult to the emperor, and set himself at once at the head of the insurrection. Cortes had yet to learn the terrible energy of a nation's despair; the tame submission with which the Aztecs had up to this time borne the foreign yoke, and endured plunder, insult, the injury to their king, the occupation of their capital, the contemptuous outrage on their religion, had led him to a false estimate of his own immeasurable superiority: the conquest, instead of being achieved, was hardly begun.

No passage in the Spanish conquest of Mexico is so well known, or had been told so well, as the conflict within the city, the death of Montezuma, the storming of the temple; the retreat of the Spaniards over the broken causeways and the chasms where the bridges had been destroyed;—all the awful adventures of the Noche Triste, the melancholy night. Mr. Prescott (and it is saying much in his favor) does not fail in this great trial of his strength; he maintains throughout the clearness and animation of his narrative. We pass reluctantly over the death of Montezuma. Faithful, it should seem, to the last, he desired to be taken to the battlements, and endeavored to repress the furious onset of his people. At first the sight of the emperor commanded awe; but the silence soon gave place to the language of contempt and indignity. They taunted him as a woman; they heaped contumely upon his head. At length, probably supposing that he had withdrawn, they discharged a volley of arrows and of stones against the spot where he had stood. A stone struck him on the head, and he fell senseless: he recovered, but his heart was broken; he obstinately refused all remedies, pined away and died. We must make room for Mr. Prescott's storming of the temple:—

“Cortes, having cleared a way for the assault, sprang up the lower stairway, followed by Alvarado, Sandoval, Ordaz, and the other gallant cavaliers of his little band, leaving a file of arquebusiers and a strong corps of Indian allies to hold the enemy in check at the foot of the monument. On the first landing, as well as on the several galleries above, and on the summit, the Aztec warriors were drawn up to dispute his passage. From their elevated position they showered down volleys of lighter missiles, together with heavy stones, beams, and burning rafters, which, thundering along the stairway, overturned the ascending Spaniards, and carried desolation through their ranks. The more fortunate, eluding or springing over these obstacles, succeeded in gaining the first terrace, where, throwing themselves on their enemies, they compelled them, after a short resistance, to fall back. The assailants pressed on, effectually supported by a brisk fire of the musketeers from below, which so much galled the Mexicans in their exposed situation that they were glad to take shelter on the broad summit of the teocalli.

“Cortes and his comrades were close upon their rear, and the two parties soon found themselves face to face on this aerial battle-field, engaged in mortal combat in presence of the whole city, as well as of the troops in the court-yard, who paused, as if by mutual consent, from their own hostilities, gazing in silent expectation on the issue of those above. The area, though somewhat smaller than the base of the teocalli, was large enough to afford a fair field of fight for a thousand combatants. It was paved with broad, flat stones. No impediment occurred over its surface, except the huge sacrificial block, and the temples of stone which rose to the height of forty feet, at the further extremity of the arena. One of these had been consecrated to the cross; the other was still occupied by the Mexican war-god. The Christian and the Aztec contended for their religions under the very shadow of their respective shrines; while the Indian priests, running to and fro, with their hair wildly streaming over their sable mantles, seemed hovering in mid-air, like so many demons of darkness urging on the work of slaughter.

“The parties closed with the desperate fury of men who had no hope but in victory. Quarter was neither asked nor given; and to fly was impossible. The edge of the area was unprotected by parapet or battlement. The least slip would be fatal; and the combatants, as they struggled in mortal agony, were sometimes seen to roll over the sheer sides of the precipice together. Cortes himself is said to have had a narrow escape from this dreadful fate. Two warriors, of strong muscular frames, seized on him, and were dragging him violently towards the brink of the pyramid.

Aware of their intention, he struggled with all his force, and, before they could accomplish their purpose, succeeded in tearing himself from their grasp, and hurling one of them over the walls with his own arm. The story is not improbable in itself, for Cortes was a man of uncommon agility and strength. It has been often repeated; but not by contemporary history.

"The battle lasted with unintermitting fury for three hours. The number of the enemy was double that of the Christians; and it seemed as if it were a contest which must be determined by numbers and brute force, rather than by superior science. But it was not so. The invulnerable armor of the Spaniard, his sword of matchless temper, and his skill in the use of it, gave him advantages which far outweighed the odds of physical strength and numbers. After doing all that the courage of despair could enable men to do, resistance grew fainter and fainter on the side of the Aztecs. One after another they had fallen. Two or three priests only survived to be led away in triumph by the victors. Every other combatant was stretched a corpse on the bloody arena, or had been hurled from the giddy heights. Yet the loss of the Spaniards was not inconsiderable: it amounted to forty-five of their best men; and nearly all of the remainder were more or less injured in the desperate conflict.

"The victorious cavaliers now rushed towards the sanctuaries. The lower story was of stone, the two upper were of wood. Penetrating into their recesses, they had the mortification to find the image of the Virgin and Cross removed. But in the other edifice they still beheld the grim figure of Huitzilopochtli, with his censor of smoking hearts, and the walls of his oratory reeking with gore—not improbably of their own countrymen. With shouts of triumph the Christians tore the uncouth monster from his niche, and tumbled him, in the presence of the horror-struck Aztecs, down the steps of the teocalli. They then set fire to the accursed building. The flame speedily ran up the slender towers, sending forth an ominous light over city, lake, and valley, to the remotest hut among the mountains. It was the funeral pyre of paganism, and proclaimed the fall of that sanguinary religion which had so long hung like a dark cloud over the fair regions of Anahuac."—Vol. ii., p. 297.

There is a fine epic interest in the midnight retreat along the causeways. The battle, from its local circumstances, is perfectly distinct and intelligible; while, on the Spanish side, the individual feats of valor, the personal exploits of Alvarado, Velasquez, Sandoval, and above all of Cortes himself, awaken breathless sympathy. We watch for the emerging of the survivors of that gallant band, out of the wild confusion and darkness, over the chasms of the broken bridges, over the lost artillery, the treasure thrown away in the last agony of flight, over the bodies of their own men and horses mingled with the heaps of slaughtered Mexicans, as for the winding up of a romance: and how touching is the close:—

"The Spanish commander dismounted from his jaded steed, and, sitting down on the steps of an Indian temple, gazed mournfully on the broken files as they passed before him. What a spectacle did they present! The cavalry, most of them dismounted, were mingled with the infantry, who dragged their feeble limbs along with difficulty; their shattered mail and tattered garments dripping with the salt ooze, showing through their rents many a bruise and ghastly wound; their bright arms soiled, their proud crests and banners gone, the baggage, artillery—all, in short, that constitutes the pride and panoply of glorious war, forever lost. Cortes, as he looked wistfully on their thinned and disordered ranks, sought in vain for many a familiar face, and missed more than one dear companion who had stood side by side with him through all the perils of the conquest. Though accustomed to control his emotions, or, at least, to conceal them, the sight was too much for him. He covered his face with his hands, and the tears, which trickled down, revealed too plainly the anguish of his soul."—Vol. ii., p. 340.

But if the mind of Cortes was once bewildered by the pride of success, how did it rise to meet adversity? In one week after the retreat along the causeway, with his diminished and broken force, without his artillery, with almost all his crossbows gone, with but few of his horses, with many of his men and himself severely wounded, he fights the great battle of Otumba against the whole force of the Mexican empire; he wins it by his own personal prowess in killing the commander of the hostile army. Yet this wonderful man, to whom all the other contemporary writers assign this crowning exploit, in his despatch to the emperor, notices it in these words:—"We were engaged during the greater part of the day, until it pleased God that one should fall, who must have been a leading personage amongst them, as at his death the battle ceased." It was the quick eye of Cortes which saw the importance of the death of this cacique, as well as his strong arm which struck him down. Well may Mr. Prescott say that these modest words form a beautiful contrast to the style of panegyric in others.

In the hour of his darkest disaster, Cortes never despaired of the final subjugation of Mexico. The battle of Otumba secured the fidelity of the Tlascalans.* There was still a powerful party in that city, headed by Xicotencatl, who urged the abandonment of the Spaniards to their fate; wisely foreseeing that the only security for their own freedom, as well as that of Mexico, was the expulsion of the stranger from the land. But either the old hatred of Mexico, and the dread of her vengeance, or awe of the Spaniards, and the involuntary respect extorted by their valor under these trials, and their unexpected victory, secured the ascendancy of the Spanish party in the senate of Tlascala. The Mexican envoys, who had been sent to organize a general league against the invaders, were dismissed with a stern rejection of their offers. What was still more extraordinary, Cortes at last shamed the dispirited followers of Narvaez, who had shared all the disasters, and tasted nothing of the glory or the gain of his own veterans, into something of the general enthusiasm. Unexpected supplies arrived on the coast, guns and ammunition, and men and horses; and some spell of magic might seem to gather them all, in unhesitating obedience, under his banner.

*De Solis gives an account of the Tlascalcan senate assembling all their best physicians to attend on Cortes; and attributes the cure of his serious wound on the head entirely to their skilful treatment. If Gil Blas is good authority for Spanish medical science, even at a later period, Cortes may have been fortunate in his Indian doctors.

An unexpected ally impeded, for a time at least, the preparations of the Mexicans. The communication of diseases seems an inevitable evil, which attends the contact of different races, and partly from ignorance of their treatment, partly from the new force which they seem to acquire by being imparted to fresh constitutions, they in general become more than usually destructive. The small-pox had been brought to the shores of Mexico, it is supposed, by a negro, on board of one of the ships, and spread with frightful fatality. The new emperor, Cuiclahuac, was among its victims. Yet eventually the accession of Guatemozin to the throne, gave new vigor and obstinacy to the resistance. The noble valor of Guatemozin retrieved the royal race from the pusillanimity of Montezuma. Numancia or Saragossa were not defended with greater intrepidity or more unshaken endurance than Mexico. We cannot follow the siege in all its strange vicissitudes and romantic adventures; but unless famine and pestilence had assisted in the work of destruction, the issue, notwithstanding the multiplying thousands of Indians, whose aid Cortes was now glad to accept, might have been more doubtful.* Once, it is well known that the Spaniards who had penetrated into the city were driven out of it, and took refuge in their own quarters. It was then that the appalling scene took place, with which we shall close our extracts from Mr. Prescott:—

“It was late in the afternoon when he reached them; but the sun was still lingering above the western hills, and poured its beams wide over the valley, lighting up the old towers and temples of Tenochtitlan with a mellow radiance, that little harmonized with the dark scenes of strife in which the city had so lately been involved. The tranquillity of the hour, however, was on a sudden broken by the strange sounds of the great drum in the temple of the war-god,—sounds which recalled the noche triste, with all its terrible images, to the minds of the Spaniards, for that was the only occasion on which they had ever heard them. They intimated some solemn act of religion within the unhallowed precincts of the teocalli; and the soldiers, startled by the mournful vibrations, which might be heard for leagues across the valley, turned their eyes to the quarter whence they proceeded. There they beheld a long procession winding up the huge sides of the pyramid; for the camp of Alvarado was pitched scarcely a mile from the city, and objects are distinctly visible, at a great distance, in the transparent atmosphere of the table-land.

“As the long file of priests and warriors reached the flat summit of the teocalli, the Spaniards saw the figures of several men stripped to their waists, some of whom, by the whiteness of their skins, they recognized as their own countrymen. They were the victims for sacrifice. Their heads were gaudily decorated with coronals of plumes, and they carried fans in their hands. They were urged along by blows, and compelled to take part in the dances in honor of the Aztec war-god. The unfortunate captives, then stripped of their sad finery, were stretched, one after another, on the great stone of sacrifice. On its convex surface, their breasts were heaved up conveniently for the diabolical purpose of the priestly executioner, who cut asunder the ribs by a strong blow with his sharp razor of itztli, and thrusting his hand into the wound, tore away the heart, which, hot and reeking, was deposited on the golden censer before the idol. The body of the slaughtered victim was then hurled down the steep stairs of the pyramid, which, it may be remembered, were placed at the same angle of the pile, one flight below another; and the mutilated remains were gathered up by the savages beneath, who soon prepared with them the cannibal repast which completed the work of abomination.

“We may imagine with what sensations the stupified Spaniards must have gazed on this horrid spectacle, so near that they could almost recognize the persons of their unfortunate friends, see the struggles and writhing of their bodies, hear—or fancy that they heard—their screams of agony; yet so far removed, that they could render them no assistance. Their limbs trembled beneath them, as they thought what might one day be their own fate; and the bravest among them, who had hitherto gone to battle as careless and light-hearted as to the banquet or the ball-room, were unable, from this time forward, to encounter their ferocious enemy without a sickening feeling, much akin to fear, coming over them.”—Vol. iii., pp. 135–137.

Cortes himself acknowledges the peril and the desperation of his troops. The following extract from the despatches shows the extremity to which they were reduced:—

“God knows the dangers which they encountered in this expedition, (against Matalcingo,) and also to which we who remained behind were exposed; but as it was the best policy for us to exhibit greater courage and resolution than ever, and even to die in arms, we concealed our weakness as well from our allies as from the enemy; and often, very often, have I heard the Spanish soldiers declare that they only wished it would please God to spare their lives, and make them conquerors of the city, although they should derive no interest nor advantage from it; from which it will be seen to what extremity we were reduced, and on what a slender chance we held our persons and lives."—Despatches, p. 304.

* These numbers evidently increased beyond the control of Cortes. Cortes, in one place, speaks of one hundred and fifty thousand men to nine hundred Spaniards. He was obliged to allow them to plunder on their own account, and thus to snatch a large part of the rewards of their victories from the hands of the Spaniards. There is a still more extraordinary proof of their independent adherence to their old habits—“And that night (the night of a battle in which one thousand five hundred of the most distinguished Mexicans had been slain) our allies were well supplied for their supper, as they took the bodies of the slain and cut them up for food!!”—(Despatches, p. 313.) We hope that these were not among the Christian converts.

Whether their prayers were sincere or not, these were the only terms on which they at length obtained possession of the city. They were literally forced to burn as they went along. All the buildings for splendor or for luxury, for the gorgeous pleasures of the king, or the worship of the idols, went down one by one; and the line of the progress of the Spaniards was marked by the total demolition of the city. They won it, street by street, square by square, and as they won destroyed on either side. The palaces, the aviary, the gardens sunk in the flames, and by their rubbish formed an open and unexposed road for the conquerors. Even the stern heart of Cortes* was touched; he was moved, we may believe, with more generous feelings than the disappointment of his rapacity, as the Queen of the Valley, with all her wealth and splendor, gradually smouldered in ashes, or sunk into the lake. He was master of the beautiful site of Mexico, but Mexico had perished. The state of misery to which the few gallant survivors were reduced is strangely shown in their characteristic language to Cortes, when summoned to surrender:—

"They said to me, that since they regarded me as the offspring of the sun, and the sun in so short a space of time as one day and one night revolved around the whole world, I ought therefore to despatch them out of life in as brief a space as possible; and thus deliver them from their troubles: for they desired to go to heaven to their Orchilobus, (qu.) who was waiting to receive them into a state of peaceful repose."—Despatches, p. 322.

They fought till they had no way to fight but over the bodies of the slain. The siege lasted for seventy-five days; of the amount of carnage, it is impossible to form any conjecture. Cortes, on one occasion, speaks of 12,000—in others of 50,000—killed in one conflict. And this warfare was carried on in the name and under the Cross of Christ!

De Solis, like a skilful dramatist, closes his book with the catastrophe of the capture of Guatemozin. Mr. Prescott carries us on through the shifting vicissitudes of the life of Cortes, his popularity in Spain, his favor at the court, his later disastrous adventures in other parts of the American continent. De Solis, no doubt, broke off where he did, not only to heighten the effect of his work, but lest he should be constrained to darken the brilliant panegyric of his hero, Cortes. Cortes could restrain his soldiers during the war by his severe discipline; he could support their courage under reverses; but he wanted either the power or the will to restrain the excesses of their rapacity when conquerors. Nor was this in the heat and flush of victory. The foul stain on the Spanish character of Cortes, who, at least, did not set his face, as a flint, against such barbarity, was the treatment of the captive Guatemozin. The emperor, the gallant foe, was cruelly tortured, in order to make him reveal the hiding-place of imaginary treasures. And this was the man whose language Humboldt justly compares to the noblest passages in Greek or Roman story. "When brought before Cortes on his first capture,"—let Mr. Prescott tell the tale:—

* "Considering that the inhabitants of the city were rebels, and that they discovered so strong a determination to defend themselves or perish, I inferred two things; first, that we should recover little or nothing of the wealth of which they had deprived us; and second, that they had given us occasion and compelled us utterly to exterminate them. On this last consideration I dwelt with most feeling, and it weighed heavily on my mind." After describing the more "noble" and more "gay and elegant" buildings, he adds, "Although it grieved me much, yet as it grieved the enemy more, I determined to burn these palaces."—Despatches, p. 280.

"Cortes came forward with a dignified and studied courtesy to receive him. The Aztec monarch probably knew the person of his conqueror, for he first broke silence by saying: 'I have done all that I could to defend myself and my people. I am now reduced to this state. You will deal with me, Malintzin, as you list.' Then laying his hand on the hilt of a poniard, stuck in the general's belt, he added with vehemence, 'Better despatch me with this, and rid me of life at once.' Cortes was filled with admiration at the proud bearing of the young barbarian, showing in his reverses a spirit worthy of an ancient Roman. 'Fear not,' he replied, 'you shall be treated with all honor. You have defended your capital like a brave warrior. A Spaniard knows how to respect valor even in an enemy.'"—Vol. iii., pp. 182, 183.

A darker story is behind; at a later period Guatemozin, for what seems an imaginary, or at least unproved conspiracy, was actually hanged by the command of Cortes.

Thus Mexico became a province of Spain, and a part of Christendom, with what results we can but briefly inquire. History seems to speak, significantly enough, as to the extent of advantage acquired by Spain from these conquests, purchased at the price of so much blood and crime. It is a whimsical notion of the author of the "True-born Englishman," that the devil luckily enabled the Spaniards to discover South America, because the wealth of those provinces, in the hands of any but that proud nation, would have been fatal to the liberties of mankind: thus, by the way, representing the devil as rather more favorable to the liberties of man than might be expected.

"The subtle Prince thought fittest to bestow
On them the golden mines of Mexico,
With all the silver mountains of Peru;
Wealth which would in wise hands the world undo."

For Mexico, we are not without our fears lest Mr. Prescott's glowing description of the reign of Prince Nezahualcoyotl might, under the older Spanish rule, have awakened some fond regret for the departure of his golden age ; and in the present day might contrast not too favorably with the state of the Independent Republic. Mr. Stephen's lively account of his vain search for the government to which he was accredited,* and Madame Calderon de la Barca's very pleasing volumes, do not represent the social order or present condition of things in a very enviable light. We do not quite recollect how many revolutions Madame Calderon witnessed during a residence of a year and a quarter in the capital ; not orderly and peaceful revolutions, but such changes as made the shots fly about in all directions, with little discrimination between friend and foe, native or stranger, peaceful inhabitant or exalted partisan. Nature alone in her prodigality is faithful to this favored region. There seems much which is amiable and hospitable in the old Spanish society, and the Indians, though utterly sunk and degraded in their intellectual faculties, seem a gentle race. Yet where God has made such a paradise, we cannot but wish that man were better disposed to cultivate and adorn it. What were a golden age without its peace and happiness ?

Christianity here began to add a new world to her conquests. Yet as we cannot but lament that it was not propagated by other means, and presented in a purer form, and has not produced more of its blessed results, it is but just, it is absolutely incumbent upon us, to call to mind the hideous and bloody superstition which it erased from the land. The first conversions to Christianity, it must be acknowledged, were rather summary and expeditious. Even during the conquest, many of the greater caciques in Tlascala, in Mezcucuo, and among the other allies, received baptism. Considering that good father Olmedo was altogether ignorant of the language ; that all the work of interpretation, in the religious as well as the civil intercourse, was carried on by Aguilar and Donna Marina, with the assistance, at last, of Orteguilla, a young page of Cortes', who acquired some knowledge of the language, the preparatory instruction must have been tolerably compendious. But there was one unanswerable argument : the God of the conqueror—(we fear that we must write, considering the share that the Virgin and the Saints took in the conquest)—the Gods of the white men were the strongest ; and if the deities of the Indians allowed themselves to be tumbled headlong from their pedestals, it was a sure sign that their reign was over, and a full justification for the desertion of their altars. It would have been vain, perhaps, to have offered to such converts a more pure and spiritual Christianity. There is, however, an exceedingly curious passage in the despatches of Cortes, relating to the propagation of Christianity, both as characteristic of the conqueror, and as a remarkable testimony to the sentiments of men like Cortes, on the overgrown pride, wealth, and power of the church in Spain. Cortes strongly urges on his master to keep the tenths in the hands of the government ; to prosecute the conversion of the natives by the regular clergy, the monks and friars of the different orders, who should reside in their own monastic communities :—

“ For if bishops and other prelates are sent, they will follow the custom practised by them for our sins at the present day, by disposing of the estates of the church, and expending them in pageants and other foolish matters, and bestowing rights of inheritance on their sons or relatives. A still greater evil would result from this state of things : the natives of this country formerly had their priests, who were engaged in conducting the rites and ceremonies of their religion ; and so strict were they in the practice of honesty and chastity, that any deviation therefrom was punished with death ; now, if they saw the affairs of the church and what related to the service of God were entrusted to canons and other dignitaries, and if they understood that these were the ministers of God, whom they beheld indulging in vicious habits and profaneness, as is the case in these days in Spain, it would lead them to undervalue our faith and treat it with derision, and all the preaching in the world would not be able to counteract the mischief arising from this source.”—Despatches, p. 426.

The blind and obstinate hostility of Fonseca, bishop of Burgos, may no doubt have rankled in the mind of Cortes, and made him look upon the higher churchmen with darkening prejudice ; but Charles V. must have been astonished at receiving from the New World language so strangely in accordance with the loud cry for the reformation of the church in Germany and throughout Europe. So far Cortes and Luther might seem embarked in one cause ; yet, as his precautionary advice was not followed, so we trust his vaticinations were at least not completely fulfilled. If there was more than one Las Casas, such prelates might redeem their order, and propagate Christianity in the hearts of the Indians by the stronger persuasion of veneration and love.

But we must not pursue this subject. We conclude with expressing our satisfaction that Mr. Prescott has given us an opportunity at this time of showing our deep sympathy, the sympathy of kindred and of blood, with Americans who, like himself, do honor to our common literature. Mr. Prescott may take his place among the really good English writers of history in modern times ; and will be received, we are persuaded, into that small community, with every feeling of friendly and fraternal respect.

* We have seen some specimens of engravings from Mr. Catherwood's drawings, illustrative of Mr. Stephens' work, on a much larger scale, and giving therefore a much better notion of the extraordinary ruins in Mexico and Yucatan. The whole series promises to be of great interest and importance.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

LETTER FROM CHARLES EDWARDS, ESQ.

MEDHURST, 1816.

THANKS for your congratulations; and take mine in return, on your having escaped free with life, and, what is more important still, without disfigurement. Really, to see a man, in these times, go through ten years' service untouched—Talavera, Busaco, Salamanca, and Waterloo; besides duels, by-skirmishes, and occasional leaps out of windows; might almost make one a believer in "The Special Grace," or the Mussulman doctrine of predestination.

Your kind papers met me at Falmouth, where I landed, from a pilot-boat, on the 14th, after contending thirty hours with such a gale as the very spirit of larceny might have given itself up for lost in. One whole night we had of it, and best part of two days, with top masts struck, top-gallant masts rolled away, hatches battened down, dead-lights shut in, boats gone, spars washed off, (except a few that we lashed across the deck, to avoid being washed off ourselves,) and lower masts groaning, and creaking and straining, as if well inclined, if the hubbub lasted, to make away after their companions.

Never was I so frightened before in all my life—which I attribute entirely to my having lately become "monied." In the onset of the affair, a trifle of a sea took us; beat in all the quarter boards on our weather side; and carried away six water casks, and four pigs, besides the cook-house, the cook in it, and the binnacle. It was night, dark as pitch, and raining. So black, that the man at the helm could not have seen shore if his bowsprit-end had run against it. And then, on a sudden, by the flashes of lightning half a minute long—the whole hopeless, interminable prospect of white foaming water opened before you; with the pigs, and the casks, and the hen-coops, each riding off upon a separate wave as big as Westminster Abbey.

Beggary, time out of mind, has been valiant. He must be brave (perforce) who has no breeches; but the holder of exchequer bills hates instinctively to find himself one moment trespassing upon the moon—flying upwards to impugn the dog-star, as if out of a swing, nine times as high as the gibbet Haman was hanged upon; and, the next, to be sunk down into a cursed bottomless black chasm, with the water, on three sides at least of him, above the pitch of his top-gallant yard, the whole bed of sea, in the ordinary course of fluids coming to their level, being to close fifty feet over his head within the next half second.

And then, in the midst of the provoking darkness, which hides the extent of your danger, and enables you to add just two hundred per cent. to it, arises a vast array of multifarious clatters, to terrify those who don't know their import, and those who do. First, your jeopardy is suggested by the lively rattling of the thunder, the pelting of the rain, and the hoarse roar of the wind in the rigging. Next, you become interested in the rending and shivering of sails, the rocking and squeaking of yards and masts, the choking and hickuping of pumps, and the frequent crashes of "something gone!"—expecting the next thing that "goes" to be yourself. The lighter accompaniments consisting, chiefly, in a perpetual rush of boiling water under your bow, and the blowing of a score of gram-puses (who are evidently waiting for you) in it: these last performers (doubtless the original tritons) spouting, and committing all kinds of singeries, in their hilarity; obviously esteeming it a mistake of Providence that it should not be a tempest always!

A man may be as stout as Hercules, and yet not care to be eaten by cetaceous fishes. Did you never observe that the people who bring themselves to subaqueous terminations in and about London, almost always choose to conclude in something like smooth water? Nursery maids take the New River and the Paddington Canal;—lovers, the "Serpentine," and the "Bason" in Hyde Park;—stock-jobbers go to Westminster Bridge and Blackfriars;—whipped school-boys, and desperate 'prentices, into water butts and fish ponds; but no adventurers (at least I don't recollect any) ever jump off London Bridge, where the flood has an angry, threatening appearance. Man, even where he is to be a slave and a fool, finds a satisfaction in being a slave and a fool in his own way. One gentleman conceits to die in battle; another has a fancy to pass in his bed. Many part by corrosive sublimate and laudanum, who would live on if they were bound to use the knife. There are obstacles to the application of the "bare bodkin" more than the high-souled Hamlet could descend to think of; and, for myself, if I were going to drown, I confess I should like to meet my end in quiet water.

But here I am, my friend, on shore; every thought of danger (and of water) over; master of myself, ten years of life and youth, and a hundred thousand pounds of fortune that I never hoped for. Your letter is most welcome. For excuses, let them trouble neither of us. A lapse of intercourse is not necessarily a breach of friendship; and, if it were, the act that made the lapse was mine. "Man proposes," as somebody says, "and God disposes;"—few sublunary resolves can stand against the force of circumstances. I took my course seven years since—at least I think so—not as a man who was without friends, but like a man who wished to keep them. When the sheet-anchor could not hold my vessel, it was as well to drive, and keep the kege on board. Fools "try" their friends, and lose them—pressing on a toy of glass, as though it were a rock of adamant. They forget the very first condition upon which they hold the feeling they are trusting to; void the lease, and yet marvel when the lord enters for breach of covenant. A man must perish—this is an arrangement in nature—before he can be regretted. The tragic poet dares not, for all Parnassus, save his hero in the last scene. You are mistaken, and you do me injustice, when you say, that I had no "friend" (at the time you refer to) but yourself. I tell you, that at the very moment when, upon deliberation, I "took service" as a private soldier—an act of which I am more proud than of any I ever performed in my whole life!—at that very moment I had a letter in my hand from a woman—God bless her! She was the widow of an officer whom I had once served, and she suspected my condition—entreating me, in terms which I can never forget, though I will not quote them, to share her means (and they were slight ones) till my embarrassments were over. If friendship could have helped me, Heaven knows! here it was in its most agreeable form. But there is a principle of reaction, among the first ordinances of nature, which makes it impossible to profit by such an offer. It seemed a jewel, the thing that was held out to me; but, had I grasped, it would have turned to ashes in my hand. I was famishing, and cool water stood at my lips; but it would have fled and mocked me, had I sought to taste it. Here lies no failure; for, on the point, there is no power in the will of the proposing individual; the obstacle, which is insurmountable, is a parcel of the very system under which we breathe. The precise qualities which procure a man offers of assistance, are those (nine times in ten) he would sacrifice by accepting it.

Few people will give away, even their money, to a crouching coward—a dependant—a hanger-on; and yet what else than these can he be who consents to live upon the bounty of another! The romantic generosity of Mrs. —'s character was excited by what she took to be a corresponding principle of chivalry in mine. She would have saved a man, (she guessed from death,) whom certain qualities, which she liked, went to endanger; and forgot to think of the folly which had brought him into peril, in surprise at the unshrinking obduracy with which he stood to meet it. Why, you see, a man's very vanity, in a situation like this, leaves him no choice but to be cut up and devoured. From the moment that I listened to a thought of safety, I ceased to be the hero that the lady took me for. I should have been absolutely an impostor if I had accepted her offer; for, the very instant that I even paused upon it, it became the property of somebody else. You must be burned—there is no help for it—if you wish to be a martyr. You must die (though it is unpleasant) before your name can be emblazoned on your tomb. I desire to wrong no man's feeling; but the course you complain of is the course which I should take again. Assistance from "friendship" is always bought dearly, and turns out generally to be good for nothing when you have it. You part, in a sad state of the market, with, perhaps, a good character; and, after the bargain is concluded, find that you have got in payment a bad shilling.

But a truce to past troubles, unless it be to laugh at them. Did I not tell you, even when I was falling—did I not tell you that I should rise again? It is but yesterday that I stood in the world alone, without rank, reckoning, or respect; that I was a nameless creature, without rights, without possessions, without even personal liberty; and to-day, I, the same "Charles Edwards"—helped by no man—thanking none—I breathe my horse on ground that is mine own, and am a "lord" and a gentleman of worship! I went forth as a sold and purchased slave; and, Mameluke like, I have returned as a chief and a conqueror. Charles Edwards—"rogue Wellborn!"—"Lord" of the manor of Medhurst! and the "lanceprisade" hath two bankers;—the "rough-rider" knows when it shall be "quarter-day!" Yesterday my estate was an empty stomach, and Chelsea was my inheritance! and to-day, there is a gentleman who cannot stand straight in my presence, shows the rentroll of my "landed property;" and talks of "rents," "farms," "feoffments," "fisheries," "waifs," "strays," and "commonable rights!"—

Come to me, if possible, for I am full of business; and my head might be in a better condition for transacting it. People who inherit fortunes from their fathers, never guess even at the real advantages of wealth. You never got a true feeling of the deliciousness of having money—no, not even from seeing half your acquaintances go without it. But, for me! I am just bursting as from darkness into the broad blaze of sunshine—from bondage into freedom uncontrolled—from childish helplessness, into the strength and power of a giant! My quarrel always with life was, that a man could not work his way into a house in Grosvenor Square, until a narrower house might serve his desires, and be more than sufficient for his necessities. There was no path by which a man could make a fortune to himself, and sit down to dissipate it in profusion, even at thirty. I had a thought once of going to the bar—I scarcely know how or why. But, when I peeped into a court of law, and saw the bare results of years of puzzlement!—the "damned Hebrew, or parchment as thick as a board," what was the net product of eyes poured out, and brains distracted! and the Chancellor himself, the enfant gaté of forensic fortune—suffering arguments, and reconciling absurdities, for eight or ten hours every day—even if he got off for that!—I found myself, (with the power of locomotion, and two shirts,) incomparably the richer man of the two! His lordship had the peerage; but I could walk "i' the sweet air." He held the seat of honor; but I was at liberty to "depart the court." Like the Frenchman in Montaigne's tale, who had his choice to be hanged or married, I cried, "Drive on the cart!"—it was cheaper to starve than, (on such terms,) to earn the money! But now—when I have the money, Robert—and have it—as only it becomes worth having—without the earning!—when I have it honorably too, and conscientiously—in my own undoubted right! no kidnapped prodigy of ninety to break in upon my graceful leisure, with fables of cajolement, plunder, and desertion! no heiress wife, even though young and beautiful, made bold by an unreasonable settlement, to hint that my extravagances, or infidelities, are committed, in all senses, at her cost!—the luxury—the splendor—the free agency—that all my life I have been thirsting for, are mine! Not a wild scheme that I have dreamed of but takes a “local habitation,” and a show of accomplishment! Not a light wish but now seems feasible, fitting—only unpossessed, because I may possess it when I will. How many a woman have I adored—and fled from—lest I might make her estate as desperate as my own! How many a man, whom I could have trampled, have I suffered to insult over me, when those I loved might have been injured by my triumph! I was prudent, and forbearing, and humble, where the tempers of some would have given way. I was modest, and shunned collision, where I felt myself the weaker vessel. I did not care even to be fought with, where the contest would have been felt a matter of hardship by my antagonist. I “abode my time” in suffering and in silence—but that time is come at last! and what I owe in the world, both of good and ill, please Heaven! shall now be paid to the utmost farthing. If it was sport while the poor bear was chained, the scene may change now he has broke free. I have never complained of the abuse of strength by others; let none complain of its reasonable exercise by me. I will ask no account for what has been done in the past, but the right shall be mine to do now for the future. I will seek for no combat with any man alive; but it shall go hard, if, with some, I have not the benefit of a victory.

And this seems very heroic, all of it, and very foolish, when I meant to be in the best humor in the world. But the fact is, I have had a touch or two of the piquant here—my recollection just a little stirred up—since my arrival. I came to England, prepared to be pleased at all points. Home shows delightfully, to the imagination at least, after six years' absence. And then there was the white bread in the hotels of Falmouth, and its blue-eyed Saxon beauties—and the incomparable fresh butter—and the cream!—I felt my heart cleave to my country the moment I sat down to breakfast. So I saddled at once, finding my cavalry sein et sauf, (which I had shipped from Figuera a week before me,) and rode at a round rate through Cornwall, Devonshire, and Somerset, purposing, as “greatness” was “thrust upon me,” to lose no time in taking possession of it; but, when I got to Bath, an idea struck me—it was for the first time—that Sir Walter Beauvoir—(my grandfather's executor)—that it might not be pleasant, under all “existing circumstances,” for me to have to introduce myself to the worthy baronet.

We had not been always strangers, in times past, the Beauvoir family and your very devoted servant; and there had been a cessation of usual attention to him, at a certain time when perhaps he was not acting so cautiously as he might have done. Whether I distrusted my own merits, or their “friendship,” I wrote a formal letter of announcement, covered all over with family arms and black wax, and sent it forward by a courier, addressed to Sir Walter; which done, I again put on, with as much speed as I could muster, wishing to get a peep, if possible, at my property, without being recognized as the owner of it.

I got to Medhurst before my messenger; but found myself already cried at the very Market-cross! I had been hatching devices all the way, to know what people thought about me. I might have spared myself the pains. Most of my grandfather's tenants held beneficial leases; and their “prophetic souls” were on the qui vive. My “listing for a horse soldier,” and “going off with the Major's lady”—the whole history was afield, with additions, alterations, and exaggerations. I sent for a hair-dresser, and had it all (without asking) in five minutes. My father's unreasonable postponement gave some offence; my most-to-be-lamented succession still more. I was to make a seraglio of the manor-house in a fortnight; and to get rid of the last acre in a year.

Next day, I sent my own servant to Beauvoir, with a note, setting forth my arrival, and requesting an interview. Signor José wore his foreign livery, and red Montero cap; and departed, upon a very curious Spanish horse, that I have brought over with me, with half the population of Medhurst at his heels. In truth, the horse—you shall see him when we meet—was a monture fit for Murat in person! No whipped and curbed-up restive English jade, that you thrust spurs into, and, when he flinches, call it spirit; but a beast that will eat of his master's bread, and drink of his cup; never felt a spur in all his life, and knows switches and halters only by report. On my affirmation!—(my attorney shall make affidavit of it)—he is the very steed—the real Rabican—sung of by Ariosto—who cheats the sand of his shadow, and on the snow leaves no marks of his footsteps!—who was begotten of the flame, and of the wind!—who might pace dry-shod upon the sea; make his trottoir of a zephyr; and for speed!—I forget the rest of the poetry; but I know I bought the animal when he was a colt, and have pampered him ever since, till he is as fleet as a roebuck, and as fierce, in any hands but my own, as a three-days-taken tiger.

And noon brought this inestimable quadruped back, with an answer to my letter, and with so many clowns in admiration of his curvetting, that I was fain to command the locking of his stable door.

Sir Walter's communication was less offensive than I had expected; but my mind was made up as to how I should proceed. Fight always at once, if possible, where you desire to be quiet—you are sure of peace, after men know that there is nothing to be got by going to war with you. These Beauvoirs are of your gens de coterie—your people of the “real caste” and “tone”—(that is, your people who, singly, would be hunted down as owls and bedlamites; but who, as a “set,” have managed to make their joint-stock impudence imposing.) I suspected the reception that I should meet from them; and I waited upon good Sir Walter without my scabbard. There is a recipe in some old book—“How to avoid being tossed by a mad bull.” And the instruction given is—“Toss him!” Try the experiment upon the first coxcomb who fancies that you are his inferior;—charge first, and give him to understand roundly that you fancy he is yours. Be coldly supercilious with all “important” caitiffs, and most punctual be your attention to the matter in debate; but let no temptation prevail with you to touch on any earthly point beyond it. In business all men are equal. The casting of an account knows no distinction of persons. But remember, that he (whoever he is) stands a babbler, convict, who utters one word except to state the sum total of it. Get an observation about the weather, you reply with some—“Thirteen and ninepence!” and your interlocutor is dead. A syllable de trop will enable you to decline “general communication,” where no approach to such a state was ever intended. Poor Sir Walter came down, loaded to the very muzzle, to repress “familiarity” on my part; but I found him guilty of “familiarity” himself, and made him bear the penalty of it, before six sentences had been exchanged between us.

“The late gales”—there was no “Happy to see me at Beauvoir!”—“The late gales had rendered my passage from the continent difficult?”

“It had not been pleasant.”—This came after we were seated; and after a salutation such as might pass between the automaton chess-player and the ghost in Don Juan.

I had received letters, of course, from Mr. Dupuis!

“At Figuera, to the 30th ult.”—Followed by a long pause, which I did not move to interrupt.—Mr. Dupuis is my agent and attorney.

“The late Mr. Charlton Edwards,”—in a tone of condescension this and dignified feeling, which made me think that the Lord had delivered the speaker into my hands—“The late Mr. Charlton Edwards, I was perhaps aware, he (Sir W. B.) had much respected!” (I was aware, Robert, that it was very inconvenient for a gentleman to speak, and not to be answered; but, as this observation needed no reply, I made none, except a look of polite surprise.)

“That sentiment alone”—here a little hesitation, occasioned by my omitting such an opportunity to protest—“that sentiment alone had induced him to take upon himself the somewhat laborious duty of an executor. There was a legacy of five hundred pounds attached to the office; but,”—(this was the coup that was to annihilate me)—“that—remembrance—he should desire to be excused from accepting.”

As six cards at least more, in the potential way, were coming, I trumped the suit at once.—“In that case, the sum would pass to any charity which he (Sir Walter) might be disposed to favor; and I would endeavor to add something which should be worthy to accompany so munificent a donation.”—This reply, not even pointed with contempt at his thinking to overwhelm me by giving up five hundred pounds that I knew he did not want—(had it been ten thousand, with all the family consequence, I had trembled for my patrimony)—this reply, given without the movement of a single muscle, carried us straight to reading “the will;” during which operation, the Baronet’s temper was once or twice nearly overcome by the irreverent neighing of my Spanish steeds, who challenged all comers, from under the window. We did get through, however—temper, gravity, and all—and, Mr. Dupuis being summoned, Sir Walter and I formally took leave of each other;—I, on my part tolerably well satisfied that I had waived no dignity in our brief conference, but a little surprised why a man, who certainly disliked me, should have chosen to act as my executor; and he, as I thought, somewhat disconcerted (though I never guessed with what abundant cause) at the seeming change in my humor, and habits of acting and thinking.

My grandfather has left me every thing; and (with all his eccentricities he had spirit and taste,) his last order was, that Monckton Manor should be kept, to my arrival, just as he himself had lived in it. It would be nonsense to talk of feeling any deep regret for the death of a man whom I scarcely ever saw; but—I am not quite ungrateful—if half his money would bring him to life again, he should have it. As the case stands, however, I get a diamond, you see, not only ready polished, but ready set to my hand, and had nothing to do when I arrived here, but walk straight into the well ordered mansion of my forefathers—from the which imagine me writing, just now, to bid you welcome! So despotic, that not a mouse, if I list be silent, dare raise his voice within three stories of me! Conceive me, sole master, and disposing of all, in the very last house of all the world, in which I ever looked to dispose of any thing. Sitting in a small room, more stocked with roses than with books, which takes rank as “The Library.” Before a buhl-table, at a long narrow Gothic window—people did not care for too much light, even before there was a tax upon it—really extant, I believe, (the window,) since the days of Henry the VII. My great grandfather, I know, traced it back to Rufus, and had his doubts if it might not have been carried up to the Conqueror. With a great deal of nicknack furniture, and some good Flemish pictures; a most unnecessary list of servants, and an incomparable cellar of wine, to amuse me within; and, without—a strange, irregular, semi-barbarous kind of prospect to look at,—almost grotesque, but not displeasing—between the remote, and the immediate. Beyond my “ring fence,” a branch of the Wye—a real steeple (the church of Medhurst)—the village inn, with a rising sun (for a sign) that might warm all Lapland through a three months’ winter—and abundance, generally, of heath, and rivulet, and hill, and copse, and forest, part of mine own, and part belonging to the demesne of Beauvoir.

More at home, a great multiplication of flower-gardens, kitchen-gardens, and nurseries, shrubberies, zig-zag walks, and fish-ponds, with duck islands in the middle of them. The view total supplying a sort of index to the various tastes of the twelve last incumbents on the property; each of whom thought it a pity to undo any trifle that had been done by his predecessor; and all had such a horror of either rebuilding, or radical alteration, that a surveyor, caught even making a sketch upon the estate, would have found no more quarter from them than a beast of prey.

For my own part, I rather agree, I confess, in this opinion about the “surveyor.” I think, in strictness, he belongs to that class of artists—as the attorney—the house-painter—or the undertaker—in whose very callings there is something that men shudder at the recollection of. Certainly, if I were in trade myself, I would be a wine-merchant, or a confectioner, or of some craft, so that people should be able to look me in the face without abhorrence; and, for the present at least, I shall so far affirm my ancestral piety, as to let Monckton remain with all its inconveniences. But you lost much, I assure you, that—not meeting me on the coast—you missed the solemnity of my “taking possession.”

The “joyful tidings” of the “new lord’s” arrival had been promulgated as soon as I reached Beauvoir Castle; and, in the hall of that edifice, (on leaving it,) I found my steward, attended by a couple of keepers, waiting to “pay his duty.” I mounted my grey horse, who had collected all the domestics of Sir Walter’s stable department in criticism round him; and the unearthly immovableness which I preserved of feature, joined to a few words of Spanish, in which I now and then spoke to José, seemed to root the very thought of my ever having been an offending Adam out of men’s minds. As I rode through the village, “attended,” the landlord of the Rising Sun stood, in devotion, to bow to me. His wife and daughters were forthcoming too in their best clothes; and there was my barber, looking as though he wished, for once, he had been less communicative; although, as he told me afterwards, by way of excuse, “he had only said what every body else said.” So we moved forward—the bells ringing for my “happy return.” I, in the front, with Mr. Poundage a little to the rear on one side, and Mr.

Dupuis, wishing to be familiar, but not quite knowing how to compass it, on the other; José behind, and the two keepers taking long shots, (in the way of comprehension,) at his English; and the folks of the village taking off their hats as we passed—to the whole of which I returned a grave courtesy; but as though it disturbed my own reflections, rather than otherwise.

I shall be in the commission of the peace, Robert, within these six months, and set people in the stocks! The five hundred pound legacy goes to repair “the church,” as the joint gift of Sir Walter Beauvoir and myself. The parish-officers have already waited upon me in procession! I shall have a tablet put up for me of marble, and a vile verse inscribed on it in Latin—and “Charles Edwards, Esq.” gave—so much—to “beautify,”—“Anno MDCCCXVI.”—with an obit when I die, and a notice who was church-warden when I was buried.

On my arrival at “Home,” every thing—the short notice considered—was creditable to my friend Poundage’s taste. People, all very alarmed and anxious, as becometh those who have to get their own livelihood. At the lodge-gate I found my “porter” in deep black, and reverence, “deeper still.” My gardeners were scattered at different points about the grounds, that I might not, by any accident, go too far without having worship paid me. Before the grand entrance, (to which Mr. Poundage rode forward, with a bow for permission,) stood my serving-men, in full livery. My housekeeper, fat and oppressive, as an ancient lady ought to be, ready to welcome me. Half a dozen of my chief tenants, all “in mourning” (for the “beneficial leases;”) my maid servants peeping here and there, round corners, and out of upper windows. And then, not—Myself—Le Grand Homme vient!—Don’t you see me, Bob!—in my long dark pelisse, able to stand alone with lace and embroidery—upon my grey horse, full sixteen hands high, with his massy furniture, foreign saddle, holsters, pistols, &c., all complete. The whole cavalcade an extremely well got up and imposing affair, I assure you; and one which would have led me to think most puissantly of the chief personage concerned in it, if I had not (on certain previous occasions) enjoyed the advantage of his acquaintance.

My location completed, “domestic duties” commenced; and I could n’t find in my heart (though I shall economize) to discharge any of my people.

Audience to Mrs. Glasse—“Forty years in the family!”—“Hoped my Honor’s breakfast had given my Honor satisfaction.” She must die, I suppose, at Monckton, and be buried at my cost.

Audience to my steward—at breakfast—and told him I was satisfied with his way of doing things. He had a desire, I saw, to fall at my feet, but doubted whether it might not be taken as a liberty. Visit from Mr. Dupuis;—thought he seemed rather a scoundrel, and went through all his accounts at one sitting!—Cost me seven hours, but completely took down the gentleman's importance. Concluded by making him commit several valuable documents to my own iron chest; and ordered his bill (convinced he'd never live to make it out) for "the morning of the 27th."

Day following, day of business. Opened letters from all the tradesmen within ten miles, craving "orders." Before dinner, made a progress through my whole estate, and went through the ceremonies (legal) of taking possession. Rode my grey horse again, who neighed furiously, bringing every body out of doors at every fresh house or stable he came near. Going home—all the people about quite deafened with this outcry, met one of the junior Beauvoirs, on horseback, in a lane; at the sight of whom, le dit Rabican gave such a ferocious neigh, rearing and plunging at the same time, as if for battle, that the Captain's hunter bolted into the hedge, and had nearly overthrown him. I moved slightly, looking at Dupuis—who was riding in great bodily fear, as far as he might from me—and the compliment was (quite as slightly) returned.

But I had a hold all this while (of which I knew nothing) upon the heart of the Beauvoir family; and it procured me the unhopd-for honor of a visit from Sir Walter, almost before I became aware of its existence.

Dupuis let me into the fact first—as a last card against bringing in his bill, and giving up his agency. It was the borough of Medhurst, it seems, that formed the grand link between my late grandfather and the people at the castle.

He always gave up the parliamentary interests; but our property is suspected of carrying a majority. Major Beauvoir sits for Medhurst; Sir Walter is one of the members for the county. I was to have been played upon by these good folks as they pleased, and slighted as they pleased into the bargain. But my business-like movements have struck them with alarm. A general election approaches, and, though they are rich, they must not lose Medhurst. I am a beast, instead of (what they hoped to find me) a fool; but my "beneficial leases" are dangerous. And so—though the Beauvoirs are "select"—down came Sir Walter, to trim between his pride and his necessity.

It was really pitiful to see the poor old buzzard, who, you know, is high and mighty, compelled to communicate with a wretch, who would have no notion of any body's being high and mighty at all. First, he had a sort of hope left that I was an ass, and that he might cheat me out of what he wanted, instead of purchasing it. Then, got out of patience at my obstinate formality; but still was sure that any direct overture towards intimacy from him, would remove it. At last, in the midst of the creature's doubt whether he would be friends, he suddenly happened to doubt whether I would; on which the quibbling was dropped in alarm, and nothing thought of but carrying the point. And so, two hours after Mr. Dupuis had told me this long election story, "in confidence,"—a confidence to which I just trusted so far, as not to give him the slightest hint how I meant to act upon it in return—though I was a "rough rider," and had a horse that "neighed," I received a morning call from Sir Walter, which ended (sorely against his will) in an invitation to dine at Beauvoir Castle.

If I could make head against the world when I was naked and penniless, I can hardly fear to do so now. You know me, and know how I value the opinion of such people as these; but they are still members of a party, that in some way or other must be dealt with. I shall have to fight my passage, against something perhaps of prejudice, into certain circles to which a man of fortune should have admission. As the first goose might cackle, ten to one the whole flock would follow. This Beauvoir bidding was an opportunity to begin the struggle with advantage.

I rode to the castle on horseback, (this took place yesterday,) and arrived as nearly as possible at the last moment; having declined using one of Sir Walter's carriages, "until my own could be put in order." From the very entry of the avenue, I saw what was to be my reception—the evening was tempting, but the windows and balconies were deserted. The "having me" was evidently an "infliction."—I'll try if I can't teach some of the family what "infliction" is.

Dinner was instantaneous—(as I had hoped)—so sparing me an inconvenient preliminary ten minutes in the drawing-room. The party quite private, in order that the open avowal of me might still be got rid of, if possible. We had Sir Walter, pompous, but rather fidgety. We had Lady B., well-bred enough, and not very ill-natured. The two Misses Beauvoirs, looking most determinately—"nothing less than nobility approaches Kitty!" Major B., the gentleman who "sits;" Captain B., the gentleman whom I nearly overthrew; the gouvernante of the young ladies; and the parson of the parish.

This was the "bore" party—evidently premeditated; every thing was conducted "in a concatenation," as Goldsmith has it, "accordingly." I was meant—transparently—to be a "lost monster" within the first five minutes; and yet I never enjoyed an entertainment so much, I think, in my life. It is so delicious a role to play—and, withal, so easy—when a man is desirous only of being disagreeable! And when I reflected that these lunatic creatures, who really stood personally within the scope of my danger—these "splacknucks," into whose house I would have hired myself as their footman, and, in twelve months, have ruled it as their lord—that they, who were absolutely suitors to me for a boon, and over my prospects, or possessions, could have no breath of influence—that they should be so mad as to desire to distress me, and hope by exhibiting a few common grimaces to succeed!—the thing, so far from supplying a cause of annoyance, was, as you must perceive, unboundedly jocose and entertaining.

We had the stale farce of silent hauteur played off; and a few more modern airs in the peculiarities of eating and drinking. The Misses B. were prodigious in the arrangements of their salad. The Captain—he is of “the Guards”—ate fish with his fingers. But, for the ton, I had carte blanche, as being a foreigner; and, for the silence, you don’t very easily awe any man where he feels that circumstances make him your master. I talked, if no one else did; and he who talks pre-pense, may even “talk” with safety. With Sir Walter Beauvoir, I spoke of property and interests, in a way that made him very anxiously attend to me. The Captain I addressed once, (in reply,) and that in a tone just more steady, the twentieth part of a note, than I had been using with his father—a word more, and I would have apologized for his ill horsemanship on the preceding day. The Misses Beauvoir I took wine with, and would not see that they were fair and inexorable. To Lady B. I ventured a few words, just to show that I could behave decently, if it was my cue to do so. But it was with the Major—the member for Medhurst—(that has been)—the gentleman for whose immediate convenience my presence was submitted to; it was with him that my high fortune lay; and the gain was greater than I could have even hoped for.

The Major, I believe, is a person that you have no acquaintance with!—I knew something of him, and disliked him, when we both were lads. He had then—allowing for my prejudices—the qualities which compose a brute; but has now acquired cunning enough, in some degree, to conceal them. His early familiarities were with watch-houses; his exploits, the beating of hackney-coachmen, and dandy linen-draperies at Vauxhall. You may recollect the fact, perhaps, of his exchanging out of the Fusileers, at Cheltenham, for having put a tailor (who asked for money, I believe) into the fire!

The man either was troublesome, or his creditors wanted amusement; but he was ordered, I know, to come for payment to a house at which three or four gentlemen were dining; the whole party then made a very facetious assault upon him, in consequence of which Ensign B— had to quit his regiment; and the relatives of the other offenders paid near two thousand pounds to avoid the disgrace of the matter coming into court. Those times are over. Men grow more prudent, if not more honest, as they increase in age. And my friend the Major’s rank and associations have made him a man of fashion; but still he is one of those men, whom, at first sight, you would dislike. There are a description of persons, as we all find out sometimes, whom you can hardly meet, even in the stage-coach, without looking for a quarrel with them. The slightest degree of intercourse seems to make the event quite certain; and, feeling that, you desperately think that the sooner it happens, and is over, the better. I remember once sitting in the same coffee-room with a man whose deportment absolutely fascinated me. Not a word had passed between us; and yet I felt that I must either instantly insult him, or leave the apartment. Major Beauvoir’s manner yesterday, at our re-introduction, was a curious illustration of the ungovernableness of this particular faculty: it was decidedly repelling, (though not sufficiently so to call for notice,) while, from what followed, I have no doubt that it was meant to be conciliatory.

For he has the infirmity upon him, (this gentleman,) among others, of being easily affected by wine; and the spirit of play, which also constantly attends him, had caught a scent of my ready money. The exposure that followed was good enough to have been bought by encouragement; but his monstrous folly made even encouragement unnecessary. A wild extravagance keeps him constantly poor; and he has not brains enough to make him timid; for, take successful speculators, with the odds ten to one against them generally, and you will find them coarse-minded, obtuse men—acute intellect would see too clearly the chance of overthrow. In spite of all Sir Walter’s exertion, after the first eight glasses, my mere listening became sufficient to draw him out. First, he adverted to the circumstance of our former acquaintance, and drew on valiantly, though I made him pull me all the way. Then we talked of the country—of horses (his and my own) and hunting—my share in the discussion going little beyond monosyllables. From thence it came to arrangements for town, (whither the Major himself was forthwith returning;) and clubs—marbles—bets—introductions—all the circumstances of a currency which I wanted, (the command of,) I was enabled politely, but without the slightest acknowledgment, to decline. At length I rose to take my leave, accompanied to the last possible moment of conversation by Sir Walter, who saw his son’s failure with obvious horror, although the ingenious gentleman himself never suspected it. We descended the great staircase, with solemn deprecation on my part, and immense, though not very happily managed, conciliation on his. But just as the august personage was expressing his hope, under great ardent suffering, that he should early have the pleasure to see me again at Beauvoir Castle, when perhaps something might be suggested, with respect to certain political arrangements, which might operate to the mutual conveniences, and, indeed, advantage, of both our families—just as he got to this point, we reached the lower hall, and my grey horse, who was in waiting, uttered a most extra hyæna-like, and demoniacal neigh. This strange interruption—(which was produced, I believe, by the hearing my voice)—and at such a juncture too!—disconcerted him completely. He stopped—gulped—recollected himself—doubted whether to piece his discourse, or begin over again. In the end, the poor Baronet stammered out a parting compliment, even worse turned than that which Monsieur Rabican had broken in upon; and I returned home a personage decidedly more hateful to the Beauvoir family than ever, but completely relieved from all anxiety about my reception—as a potentate of the vicinity—in future; and as an object of detestation with the worthy folks, you know, of necessity, an object, if not of terror, of respect.

This, I think, is as it should be. I am fêted by these people, and will be farther so: and, when they have gone through the abomination of getting my interest, they shall find that they have lost it. But that they are clumsy impostors, and deserve no such lenity, I could end their anxiety in a word; for, if I really have a majority in the borough, I think I shall sit for it myself. You laugh—but I can't come back to the army, after six years' desertion, to face your Waterloo reputation upon a "lady-peace" establishment. And a seat in Parliament gives a man a semblance of pursuits in life, which (where no trouble attaches) is convenient. You will come over to my election, (if I find I can command the place,) and help to eat the bad dinners, and kiss the people's wives. Drop no word, however, I charge you, in the interim; because I must bamboozle these cockscombs, who meant to bamboozle me. The hook is in their mouths, and I shall be able to keep them on, without giving either a reasonable expectation. The moment they ask my decision, I shall give it against them; and yet, before then, I will have gained all they sought to withhold from me. This is not a world, Robert, in which a man can live by the use of candor, or of liberal principle; and he who is wise will fall into its spirit, and acquire a taste for hollow-heartedness and selfish feeling. To have one's "opinions" always flying out against those of every body else—one's heart pinned upon one's sleeve—is it not to fight too much at a disadvantage? And may there not be some whim in shaking hands with a man very cordially, when you know he means to do you a mortal injury, and when you have digged a countermine, (in the way of surprise,) which, in five minutes, is to blow him to the moon? When I was poor, who ever behaved even fairly to me? And is it not monstrous vanity to expect that I now should behave disinterestedly to those I love not?

Farewell till we meet, which I hope will not be many days; but I must (with the kind aid of Sir W. Beauvoir) stamp my credit in the right way, before I go—here—in Glostershire. I have got a touch, you see, of the true moneyed feeling already—letting policy detain me in one place, when inclination would carry me to another.

Fare you well once more, until we shake hands; which, with you, I would not do, unless I did it honestly. I shall be in town, I believe, by the 28th; and a lieutenant-colonel, I am sure, can leave a regiment at any time. As a proof that (for my part) we are still upon the same terms that we used to be—ask your father if he will "present" me. I could make old Sir Walter here, I have no doubt, submit to the duty, (and, in case I go to the continent, it may be convenient to me to get this done;) but I would not have him able to say that I ever hoaxed him out of any politeness worth a moment's consideration. Besides, I know enough of your father, to believe that he will feel no hesitation in obliging me; and I write to show you that I can ask a favor from a friend, when it is such a favor as may be conferred by one gentleman upon another.

---

TO M——

Oh, ask me not how long thy gentle love
Hath dwelt on me;
I only know 't is long enough to prove Thy constancy.

I cannot pause to number months, or days,
I know alone,
If to be faithful be Love's highest praise,
Thou wear'st the crown.

Oh, thou hast loved me long enough to show
Thou canst not range;
And long enough to bid experience know
How others change.

Oh, long enough for the upbraiding thought,
That ne'er till now
I prized thy love's rich treasure, as I ought,
My all below.

Yes, I have seen full many a dream depart
With faithless speed;
And some, who should have gently used my heart,
Have made it bleed.

And I have rued Affection's broken vow,
And felt the chill
Of Friendship's alter'd eye—but, dearest, thou Art faithful still.

---

ENIGMA.

Six Hilary charged at Agincourt,
Sooth! 't was an awful day!
And though, in that old age of sport,
The rufflers of the camp and court
Had little time to pray,
'T is said Sir Hilary muttered there
Two syllables by way of prayer.

My first to all the brave and proud
Who see to-morrow's sun;
My next, with her cold and quiet cloud,
To those who find their dewy shroud,
Before to-day's be done!
And both together to all blue eyes
That weep when a warrior nobly dies!

From the Foreign Quarterly Review.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, although he has written very little in this way, comes accredited to us by unmistakable manifestations of an original and poetical mind. He is the author of a volume of profound Essays, recently republished in England, under the editorship of Mr. Carlyle, who discovered in him a spiritual faculty congenial to his own. Mr. Emerson was formerly a Unitarian minister, but he embraced the Quaker interpretation of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and threw up his church. He is now the editor of a quarterly magazine in Boston. The same thoughtful spirit which pervades his prose writings is visible in his poetry, bathed in the "purple light" of a rich fancy. Unfortunately, he has written too little to ensure him a great reputation; but what he has written is quaint and peculiar, and native to his own genius. From a little poem addressed "To the Humble Bee," which, without being in the slightest degree an imitation, constantly reminds us of the gorgeous beauty of "l'Allegro," we extract two or three passages.

Fine humble-bee! fine humble-bee!
Where thou art is clime for me,
Let them sail for Porto Rique,
Far-off beats through seas to seek—
I will follow thee alone,
Thou animated torrid-zone!

When the south-wind, in May days,
With a net of shining haze,
Silters the horizon wall,
And with softness touching all,
Tints the human countenance
With a color of romance,
And infusing subtle heats
Turns the sod to violets—
Thou in sunny solitudes,
Rover of the underwoods,
The green silence dost displace
With thy mellow breezy bass.

Aught unsavory or unclean
Hath my insect never seen,
But violets, and bilberry bells,
Maple sap, and daffodils,
Clover, catchfly, adders-tongue,
And brier-roses dwelt among.
*All besides was unknown waste,
All was picture as he past.*

This is not merely beautiful, though "beauty is its own excuse for being." There is pleasant wisdom hived in the bag of the "yellow-breeched philosopher," who sees only what is fair and sips only what is sweet. Mr. Emerson evidently cares little about any reputation to be gained by writing verses; his intellect seeks other vents, where it is untrammelled by forms and conditions. But he cannot help his inspiration. He is a poet in his prose.

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK.

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK has acquired a wider celebrity, and won it well. He is the author, amongst other things, of a noble lyric, "Marco Bozzaris." Had he written nothing more he must have earned a high popularity; but he has written much more, equally distinguished by a refined taste and cultivated judgment. But the "Marco Bozzaris," containing not more than a hundred lines, or thereabouts, is his master-piece. It is consecrated to the Greek chief of that name who fell in an attack on the Turkish camp at Laspi, and is, as a whole, one of the most perfect specimens of versification we are acquainted with in American literature. We will not detract from its intrinsic claims by inquiring to what extent Mr. Halleck is indebted to the study of well-known models; for, although in this piece we catch that "stepping in music" of the rhythm which constitutes the secret charm of the "Hohenlinden," we are glad to recognize in all his productions, apart from incidental resemblances of this kind, a knowledge as complete, as it is rare amongst his contemporaries, of the musical mysteries of his art. It is in this Mr. Halleck excels, and it is for this melodiousness of structure that his lines are admired even where their real merit is least understood. We are too much pressed in space to afford room for the whole of this poem, and are unwilling to injure its effect by an isolated passage. The chrysolite must not be broken. But here is an extract from a poem called "Red Jacket," which will abundantly exhibit the freedom and airiness of Mr. Halleck's versification. Red Jacket was a famous Indian chief.

Is strength a monarch's merit? (like a whaler's)
Thou art as tall, as sinewy, and as strong
As earth's first kings—the Argo's gallant sailors,
Heroes in history, and gods in song.

Is eloquence? Her spell is thine that reaches
The heart, and makes the wisest head its sport;
And there's one rare, strange virtue in thy speeches,
The secret of their mastery—they are short.

Is beauty? Thine has with thy youth departed,
But the love-legends of thy manhood's years,
And she who perished, young and broken-hearted,
Are—but I rhyme for smiles and not tears.

The monarch mind—the mystery of commanding,
The god-like power, the art Napoleon,
Of winning, fettering, moulding, wielding, banding
The hearts of millions till they move as one;

Thou hast it. At thy bidding men have crowded
The road to death as to a festival;
And minstrel minds, without a blush, have shrouded
With banner-folds of glory their dark pall.

And underneath that face like summer's oceans,
 Its lip as moveless and its cheek as clear,
 Slumbers a whirlwind of the heart's emotions,
 Love, hatred, pride, hope, sorrow—all, save fear.

Love—for thy land, as if she were thy daughter,
 Her pipes in peace, her tomahawk in wars;
 Hatred—for missionaries and cold water;
 Pride—in thy rifle-trophies and thy scars;

Hope—that thy wrongs will be by the Great Spirit
 Remembered and revenged when thou art gone;
 Sorrow—that none are left thee to inherit
 Thy name, thy fame, thy passions, and thy throne.

The author of these stanzas, strange to say, is superintendent of the affairs of Mr. Astor, the capitalist, who built the great hotel in New York.

W. C. BRYANT.

We have been all along looking out for a purely American poet, who should be strictly national in the comprehensive sense of the term. The only man who approaches that character is William Cullen Bryant; but if Bryant were not a sound poet in all other aspects, his nationality would avail him nothing. Nature made him a poet, and the accident of birth has placed him amongst the forests of America. Out of this national inspiration he draws universal sympathies—not the less universal because their springs are ever close at hand, ever in view, and ever turned to with renewed affection. He does not thrust the American flag in our faces, and threaten the world with the terrors of a gory peace; he exults in the issues of freedom for nobler ends and larger interests. He is the only one of the American poets who ascends to "the height of this great argument," and lifts his theme above the earthly taint of bigotry and prejudice. In him, by virtue of the poetry that is in his heart, such themes grow up into dignity. His genius makes all men participators in them, seeking and developing the universality that lies at their core. The woods, prairies, mountains, tempests, the seasons, the life and destiny of man, are the subjects in which he delights. He treats them with religious solemnity, and brings to the contemplation of nature, in her grandest revelations, a pure and serious spirit.
 His poetry is reflective, but not sad; grave in its depths, but brightened in its flow by the sunshine of the imagination. His poems addressed to rivers, woods, and winds, all of which he has separately apostrophized, have the solemn grandeur of anthems, voicing remote and trackless solitudes.
 Their beauty is affecting, because it is true and full of reverence. Faithful to his inspiration, he never interrupts the profound ideal that has entered into his spirit to propitiate the genius loci—he is no middleman standing between his vernal glories and the enjoyment of the rest of mankind. He is wholly exempt from verbal prettiness, from flaunting imagery and New World conceits; he never paints on gauze; he is always in earnest, and always poetical. His manner is everywhere graceful and unaffected.

Two collections of Mr. Bryant's poems have been published in London, and the reader may be presumed to be already acquainted with nearly all he has written. The following passage, descriptive of the train of thoughts suggested by the shutting in of evening, has appeared only in the American editions:

The summer day has closed—the sun is set:
 We have they done their office, those bright hours
 The latest of whose train goes softly out.
 In the red west. The green blade of the ground
 Has risen, and herds have cropped it; the young twig
 Has spread its plaited tissues to the sun;
 Flowers of the garden and the waste have blown,
 And withered; seeds have fallen upon the soil
 From bursting cells, and in their graves await Their resurrection. Insects from the pools
 Have filled the air awhile with humming wings,
 That now are still forever; painted moths
 Have wandered the blue sky, and died again;
 The mother-bird hath broken for her brood
 Their prison-shells, or shoved them from the nest,
 Plumed for their earliest flight. In bright alcoves,
 In woodland cottages with earthy walls,
 In noisome cells of the tumultuous town,
 Mothers have clasped with joy the new-born babe.
 Graves, by the lonely forest, by the shore
 Of rivers and of ocean, by the ways
 Of the thronged city, have been hallowed out,
 And filled, and closed. This day hath parted friends,
 That ne'er before were parted; it hath knit
 New friendships; it hath seen the maiden plight
 Her faith, and trust her peace to him who long Hath wooed; and it hath heard, from lips which late
 Were eloquent of love, the first harsh word,
 That told the wedded one her peace was flown.
 Farewell to the sweet sunshine! one glad day
 Is added now to childhood's merry days,
 And one calm day to those of quiet age;
 Still the fleet hours run on; and as I lean
 Amid the thickening darkness, lamps are lit
 By those who watch the dead, and those who twine
 Flowers for the bride. The mother from the eyes
 Of her sick infant shades the painful light,
 And sadly listens to his quick-drawn breath.

When America shall have given birth to a few such poets as Bryant, she may begin to build up a national literature, to the recognition of which all the world will subscribe.

H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Only one name now remains, that of the most accomplished of the brotherhood, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. But we have some doubts whether he can be fairly considered an indigenous specimen. His mind was educated in Europe.
 At eighteen years of age he left America, and spent four years in travelling through Europe, lingering to study for a part of the time at Gottingen.

On his return he was appointed professor of modern languages in Bowdoin College; but at the end of a few years he went into Sweden and Denmark, to acquire a knowledge of the literature and languages of the Northern nations. When he again returned, he accepted the professorship of the French and Spanish languages in Harvard College, Cambridge, which he now holds. We must not be surprised to find his poetry deeply colored by these experiences, and cultivated by a height of refinement far above the taste of his countrymen. But America claims him, and is entitled to him; and has much reason to be proud of this ripe and elegant scholar. He is unquestionably the first of her poets, the most thoughtful and chaste; the most elaborate and finished. Taking leave of the others, with a just appreciation of the last mentioned two or three, and coming suddenly upon Longfellow's lyrics, is like passing out of a ragged country into a rich Eastern garden, with the music of birds and falling waters singing in our ears at every step. His poems are distinguished by severe intellectual beauty, by dulcet sweetness of expression, a wise and hopeful spirit, and complete command over every variety of rhythm. They are neither numerous nor long; but of that compact texture which will last for posterity. His translations from the continental languages are admirable; and in one of them, from the Swedish of Bishop Tegner, he has successfully rendered into English, the "inexorable hexameters" of the original.

We believe nearly all Mr. Longfellow's poems have been reprinted in England; and we hope they may be extensively diffused, and received with the honorable welcome they deserve. From the "Prelude to the Voices of the Night," we take a few stanzas of exquisite grace and tenderness.

Beneath some patriarchal tree
I lay upon the ground;
His hoary arms uplifted he,
And all the broad leaves over me
Clapped their little hands in glee,
With one continuous sound:

A slumberous sound—a sound that brings
The feelings of a dream—
As of innumerable wings,
As, when a bell no longer swings,
Faint the hollow murmur rings
O'er meadow, lake, and stream.

And dreams of that which cannot die,
Bright visions came to me,
As lapped in thought I used to lie,
And gaze into the summer sky,
When the sailing clouds went by,
Like ships upon the sea;

Dreams that the soul of youth engage
Ere Fancy has been quelled;
Old legends of the monkish page,
Traditions of the saint and sage,

Tales that have the rime of age,
And chronicles of Eld.

And loving still these quaint old themes,
Even in the city's throng
I feel the freshness of the streams,
That, crossed by shades and sunny gleams,
Water the green land of dreams,
The holy land of song.

Therefore, at Pentecost, which brings
The spring, clothed like a bird,
When nestling buds unfold their wings,
And bishop's-caps have golden rings,
Musing upon many things,
I sought the woodlands wide.

The green trees whispered low and mild;
It was a sound of joy!
They were my playmates when a child,
And rocked me in their arms so wild!
Still they looked at me and smiled,
As if I were a boy;

And ever whispered mild and low,
"Come, be a child once more!"
And waved their long arms to and fro,
And beckoned solemnly and slow;
Oh, I could not choose but go
Into the woodlands hoar.

Into the blithe and breathing air,
Into the solemn wood,
Solemn and silent everywhere!
Nature with folded hands seemed there,
Kneeling at her evening prayer!
Like one in prayer I stood.

The artful modulation of these lines is not less worthy of critical notice than the pathos of the emotion which literally gushes like tears through them.

THE SPRING SHOWER.

AWAY to that snug nook; for the thick shower Rushes on stridingly. Ay, now it comes,
Glancing about the leaves with its first drips,
Like snatches of faint music. Joyous thrush,
It mingles with thy song, and beats soft time
To thy bubbling shrillness. Now it louder falls,
Pattering, like the far voice of leaping rills;
And now it breaks upon the shrinking clumps
With a crash of many sounds—the thrush is still.
There are sweet scents about us; the violet hides
On that green bank; the primrose sparkles there:
The earth is grateful to the teeming clouds,
And yields a sudden freshness to their kisses.
But now the shower slopes to the warm west,
Leaving a dewy track; and see, the big drops,
Like falling pearls, glisten in the sunny mist.
The air is clear again, and the far woods
Shine out in their early green. Let's onward then,
For the first blossoms peep about our path,
The lambs are nibbling the short dripping grass,
And the birds are on the bushes.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

"THE MAUVAIS PAS." A SCENE IN THE ALPS.

ILLUSTRATING A PASSAGE IN THE NOVEL OF ANNE OF GEIERSTEIN.

Is there an individual, who has trod at all beyond the beaten track of life, who does not harbor within his mind the recollection of some incident or incidents of so eventful a nature, that it requires but the shade of an association to bring them forward from their resting-place, bright, clear, and distinct, as at the moment of their existence? We suspect there are many who, in their hours of solitude, might be seen to manifest symptoms of such reminiscences; and many who, in the busy world, and amidst the hum of men, might also be seen to start as if visions of things long gone by were again before them, and to shrink within themselves, as though spirits of olden times "were passing before their face, and causing the hair of their flesh to stand up."

It is now many years ago since an event of this character occurred to the writer of these pages. This event, however, such as it is, would, in all probability, never have been recorded on any other tablets than those of his own private thoughts, or have wandered beyond the limited circle of others, who, from natural causes, were interested in its details, had it not, within the last few days, been brought vividly before him, by a writer, whose unrivalled descriptive powers have so often given a semblance of truth to tales of fiction, and excited a thrill on the recital of perils and adventures, where no personal interests were called forth to give additional animation to the narrative. Long before they can peruse these lines, the readers of Blackwood's Magazine will, doubtless, have made themselves acquainted with Anne of Geierstein; and many a mountain traveller, accustomed to sojourn amidst the heights and depths of Alpine scenery, will have borne testimony to the splendid representation of Mont Pilate, arrayed in its gloomy panoply of "vapor, and clouds, and storms," and will have followed the daring Arthur Philipson, with breathless interest, as he wound his cautious way on the ledge of the granite precipice upreared before him: and such readers will scarcely be surprised, that a description like this should make no ordinary impression on one, who, without the slightest pretensions to the vigor and muscular activity of a hardy mountaineer of the fifteenth century, once found himself in a predicament somewhat similar, and oddly enough occasioned by a disaster akin to this, which so nearly proved fatal to the travellers from Lucerne. Believe me, Mr. Editor, when, in Sir Walter Scott's 34th page, I descended from the platform on which the adventurous son bade adieu to his father, and gained with him the narrow ledge, creeping along the very brink of the precipice, days, months, and years shrunk away, and once again did I feel myself tottering on the airy pathway of the very platform, on which I also was once doomed to gaze, with feelings which time can never efface from my recollection.

It was in the year 1818 that I arrived in the village of Martigny, a few days after that memorable catastrophe, when, by the bursting of its icy mounds, the extensive Lake of Mauvoisin was, in an instant, let loose, pouring forth six hundred millions of cubic feet of water over the peaceful and fruitful valleys of the Drance, with the irresistible velocity of sixteen miles an hour, carrying before its overwhelming torrent every vestige of civilized life which stood within its impetuous reach. The whole village and its environs exhibited a dreary scene of death and desolation. The landlord, with many others of his acquaintance and kinsfolk, had been swept from their dwelling-places, or perished in their ruins. The wreck of a well-built English carriage occupied part of the inner court-yard, while the body, torn from its springs, had grounded upon a thicket in the field adjacent. The plains through which the treacherous stream was now winding its wonted course, had all the appearance of a barren desert. Luxuriant meadows were converted into reservoirs of sand and gravel; and crops nearly ripe for the sickle, were beaten down into masses of corrupting vegetation. Here and there amorphous piles of trees, beams, carts, stacks, and remnants of every description of building, were hurled against some fragment of rock, or other natural obstacle, forming, in many cases, it was too evident, the grave-mound of human victims soddening beneath. On the door of the dilapidated inn, the following appeal was attached; but it required no document written by the hand of man to tell the tale of woe: "The floods had passed over it, and it was gone, and the place thereof was known no more."

"AMES GENEREUSES!"

"Un mouvement de la grande nature vient de changer une contrée fertile et riante en un theatre de désolation et de la misère, par l'irruption du lac de Getroz, arrivée le 16 Juin, 1818. Les victimes de cette catastrophe tendent leurs mains vers vous, images de la Divinité bienfaisante. Quelle occasion favorable d'exercer votre vertu favorite, et de verser des larmes de plaisir, en tarissant celles de malheur!"

It was impossible to contemplate effects consequent upon so awful a visitation, without a corresponding excitement of strong curiosity to follow the devastation to its source, and learn, from ocular inspection, the mode in which nature had carried on and completed her dreadful operations. Accordingly, having ascertained that although the regular roads, bridgeways, and pathways, were carried away, a circuitous course over the mountains was feasible to the very foot of the Glaciers of Mont Pleureur, which impended over the mouth of the lac de Getroz, a guide was secured, and with him, on the following morning, before sunrise, I found myself toiling through the pine-woods clothing the steep sides of the mountains to the east of Martigny. It is not, however, my intention to enter into details (though interesting enough in their way) unconnected with the one sole object, which, while I am now writing, hovers before me like Macbeth's dagger, to the exclusion of other things of minor import. Suffice it to say, that as the evening closed, I entered a desolate large scrambling sort of mansion, formerly, as I was given to understand, a convent belonging to some monks of La Trappe; a fact confirmed by sundry portraits of its late gloomy possessors, hung round the dark dismantled chamber in which I was to sleep. The village, of which this mansion had formed a part, had been saved almost by miracle. A strong stone bridge, with some natural embankments, gave a momentary check to the descending torrent, which instantly rose, and in another minute must have inevitably swept away all before it, when fortunately the earth on every side gave way, the ponderous buttresses of the bridge yielded, down it sunk, and gave immediate vent to the cataract. While I was looking towards the heights of Mont Pleureur, on whose crest the spires and pinnacles of the Glacier de Getroz were visible, a stranger joined the owner of the house in which I was lodged, and from their conversation I collected that he, with a companion, had that day visited the scene of action. "And you saw it," said the landlord. "I did," was the reply. "And your companion?"—"No, for we did not go the lower road," observed the traveller. "How so? did you take the upper?"—"We did," was the answer. "Comment donc? mais le Mauvais Pas?" "I crossed it," replied the traveller. "Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the landlord; "and your companion?"—"He saw what it was and returned." Having heard nothing of any extraordinary difficulties, I paid no great attention to this dialogue, particularly as I had the warranty of my guide that our course would be on the right bank of the river the whole way; and it was evident, that any thing like this Mauvais Pas of which the host and traveller spoke, was on the heights above the left bank. I therefore retired to rest, in high spirits, notwithstanding the sombre scowling looks of the monks which seemed to glance on me from their heavy black frames, ornamenting the panelled walls of the cheerless dormitory in which my pallet was stretched—quite sufficient, under other circumstances, to call up the recollection of every ghost and goblin slumbering in the mind, from the earliest traditions of nursery chronicles.

As the journey of the day promised, under the most favorable circumstances, to be not only long but fatiguing, and as some part of the road was represented to be passable for horses, by which much time and labor might be spared, a couple were hired, and another guide engaged to bring them back; and as we quitted the hostelry at early dawn, the beams of the rising sun were just glancing on the highest peaks of the Glaciers, at whose base our excursion was to terminate. For the first three or four hours, sometimes on the plains, at other times defiling over the heights, according to the obstacles interposed by the recent devastation, we pursued our course without any other interest, than that produced by a succession of striking objects, amidst the wildest exhibitions of mountain scenery I ever beheld. At length we descended into a valley of considerable extent, affording a flat platform, of what had been hitherto meadow land, though now a wide plain, on whose surface, in every direction, were scattered, in wild confusion, rocks and stones, and uprooted trees of all dimensions, deposited by the torrent, which had now returned to its original channel, through which it was roaring over a bed of broken granite, forming a sort of loose and coarse shingle. This valley, though unconfined towards the west, was apparently closed in towards the east, immediately in our route, by a stupendous barrier of precipitous rock, as if a mountain, impending over the river on our right, had shot forth one of its mighty arms for the purpose of arresting the waters in their progress. On drawing nearer, however, a fissure, extending from the summit to the base, through the very heart of the rock, was perceptible, through which the river rushed in a more confined channel. It naturally occurred to me, that, unless we could pass onwards through this fissure, we had nothing for it but to return; though having, in our morning's progress, more than once forded the stream,

I concluded that a similar attempt would be made in the forthcoming case, in which I was confirmed by the two guides. When, however, we drew a little nearer, I remarked, that they looked forward repeatedly with something like an anxious cast of countenance, examining here and there at the same time certain blocks of stone embedded in small pools, on which, although there was a communication with the river, the current had no effect, the communication being so far cut off, as to exclude even the slightest ripple. "The waters are higher than they were yesterday," said the one. "And are rising at this moment," replied the other, who was carefully watching the smooth side of one of these detached blocks, half filling the calm and unruffled surface of one of these diminutive lakes. And again, with scrutinizing eyes, they looked forward towards the fissure. "Shall we be able to stem the torrent in yonder spot?" I asked. "We hope so," they hastily answered; "but not a moment must be lost;" and, suiting the action to the word, the horses were spurred on to a full trot, the eyes of both being now intensely fixed on something evidently in or near the river. "Do you see a dark speck at the foot of the left hand precipice?" observed one of the guides to me. "I do."—"Monsieur," continued he, "the waters are rising rapidly, by the increased melting of the snows; and if that dark stone is covered when we reach the fissure, our passage through the torrent will be hazardous, if not impracticable." From that instant every eye was rivetted to the fragment, which, instead of becoming more marked and visible, as we shortened the intervening space, very sensibly diminished in size; and, in spite of every effort to urge the horses on, soon dwindled to a speck, and was almost immediately after, to our great mortification, entirely lost under a ripple of white foam which broke over its highest point. "Ce n'est plus nécessaire d'avancer; il faut s'arrêter." said the guides; "c'est fini." The horses were accordingly reined in. We alighted, and I sat down in despair to secure what I could by sketching the magnificent scene before me; demanding, in a tone of forlorn hope, if it was indeed impossible to proceed, either by scaling the opposing barrier, or by any other circuitous route. On saying this, they again examined the margin of the river; but it gave no encouraging sign. The white foam had even ceased to break over the hidden stone; a swift blue stream was hurrying over it, and not a token of its existence remained. While I continued my sketch, I observed that they were in earnest conversation, walking to and fro, now looking back on the road we had travelled, and then casting their eyes upwards to the right; the only words which I could distinctly hear, for they were more than once repeated, being "Mais il faut avoir bonne tête—a-t-il bonne tête?" At length, one of them came up, and said, "Monsieur, il y a un autre chemin, mais c'est dangereux—c'est un Mauvais Pas! Avez vous bonne tête." As the correctness of any answer to the conclusion of this address depended much upon divers particulars, and certain other data, which it behoved me to know, I begged him to describe a little more at large the precise nature of this Mauvais Pas, the ominous term recalling in an instant the words I had heard from the traveller the night before.

The result of my inquiry was very vague. That it was high amongst the mountains, and somewhat distant, there could be no doubt. That, in order to get to it, we must return, and cross the river below, where, being wider, it might still be forded, were also preliminary steps. The heights on the right were, in the next place, to be gained, and that by no very inviting path, as I could see; but these were not objections calculated to deter me from proceeding, and wherein the real difficulty consisted I could not distinctly discover. "Is, then, this Mauvais Pas much more steep and difficult than the ascent which you have pointed out amongst those rocks on the right?"—"Oh, no," was the reply; "it is not steep at all; it is on a dead level."—"Is it, then, very fatiguing?"—"Oh, no; it is by no means fatiguing; the ascent which you see before you, is by far the most fatiguing part of the whole route."—"Is it, then, dangerous, owing to broken fragments of rock, or slippery grass?" for I heard them mutter something about slipping. "Oh, no; it was on hard, solid rock; and, as for grass, there was not a blade upon it. It required but une bonne tête, car si on glisse, on est perdu!" This winding up was certainly neither encouraging nor satisfactory; but having so repeatedly heard the danger of these mountain passes magnified, and their difficulties exaggerated, and the vague information above mentioned, saving and except the definitive result, being by no means in itself appalling, I expressed my readiness to try this path, if they had made up their minds to guide me. To this they consented; and preparations were instantly made; "for," added they, "the day is waning, and you will find there is much to be done."

We remounted the horses, and hastened back about a mile to a wide part of the river, which we succeeded in fording without much inconvenience; and soon after left them at a spot from whence they could be sent for at leisure. We then turned again to the eastward, and soon reached the foot of the heights on the left bank of the river, forming the barrier which had checked us on the other side. Up there we proceeded to mount, pressing onwards through brake and brier, boughs and bushes, to the summit of the ridge. During this part of the task, I endeavored to pick up further particulars respecting the winding up of our adventure; but all I could learn was, that, in consequence of the suspension of all communication in the valleys below, by the destruction of the roads and bridges, a chamois-hunter had, since the catastrophe, passed over this path, and that some work-people, on their way to repair the bridges, finding it practicable, had done the same; but that it had never before been used as a regular communication, and certainly never would again, as none, but from sheer necessity, would ever think of taking advantage of it. But, by way of neutralizing any unfavorable conclusions I might draw from these representations, they both added, that, from what they then saw of my capabilities in the art of climbing—for the road, here and there, required some trifling exertion—they were sure I should do very well, and had no reason to fear. Thus encouraged, I proceeded with confidence; and, in the course of rather more than an hour's sharp ascent, we attained a more level surface in the bosom of a thick forest of pine and underwood, fronted, as far as I could guess from occasional glimpses through gaps and intervals, by a grey dull curtain of bare rock. "We are approaching the Mauvais Pas," said one of the guides.—"Is it as rough as this!" said I, floundering as I was through hollows of loose stones and bushes. "Oh, no; it is as smooth as a floor," was the reply.—"In a few minutes we shall be on the Pas," said the other, as we began to descend on the eastern declivity of the ridge we had been mounting for the last hour. And then, for the first time, I saw below me the valleys of the Drance spread forth like a map, and that it required but half-a-dozen steps at most to have cleared every impediment to my descending amongst them, in an infinitely shorter time than I had expended in mounting to the elevated spot from whence I looked down upon them. And then, too, for the first time, certain misgivings, as to the propriety of going further, and a shrewd guess as to the real nature of the Mauvais Pas, flashed across me, in one of those sudden heart-searching thrills, so perfectly defined in the single word crebling—a provincial term, expressing that creeping, paralyzing, twittering, palpitating sort of sensation, which a nervous person might be supposed to feel, if, in exploring a damp and dark dungeon, he placed his hand unadvisedly upon some cold and clammy substance, which his imagination might paint as something too horrible to look at.

But whatever were the force and power of these feelings, it was not now the time to let them get the mastership. It was too late to retract—I had gone too far to recede. It would have been unpardonable to have given two Swiss guides an opportunity of publishing throughout the cantons, that an Englishman had flinched, and feared to set his foot where a foreign traveller had trod the day before. On then I went, very uncomfortable, I will candidly confess, but aided and impelled, notwithstanding, by that instinctive sort of wish, common, I believe, to all people, to know the worst in extreme cases. Curiosity, too, had its share—not merely excited by the ultimate object for which I was about to venture myself in mid air, but a secret desire to see with my own eyes a pass which had so suddenly and unexpectedly assumed importance in my fate. And after all, though there were very unequivocal symptoms of something terrible in the immediate vicinage of the undefined grey skreen of rock before me, I had as yet no certainty of its appalling realities.

For a furlong or two no great change was perceptible; there was a plentiful supply of twigs and shrubs to hold by, and the path was not by any means alarming. In short, I began to shake off all uneasiness, and smile at my imaginary fears, when, on turning an angle, I came to an abrupt termination of every thing bordering on twig, bough, pathway, or greensward; and the Mauvais Pas, in all its fearfulness, glared upon me! For a foreground, (if that could be called a foreground, separated, as it was, by a gulf of some fathoms wide,) an unsightly facing of unbroken precipitous rock bearded me on the spot from whence I was to take my departure, jutting out sufficiently to conceal whatever might be the state of affairs on the other side, round which it was necessary to pass by a narrow ledge like a mantel-piece, on which the first guide had now placed his foot. The distance, however, was inconsiderable, at most a few yards, after which, I fondly conjectured we might rejoin a pathway similar to that we were now quitting, and that, in fact, this short but fearful trajet constituted the substance and sum-total of what so richly deserved the title of the Mauvais Pas. "Be firm; hold fast, and keep your eye on the rock," said the guide, as I, with my heart in my mouth, stepped out—"Is my foot steadily fixed?"—"It is," was the answer; and, with my eyes fixed upon the rock, as if it would have opened under my gaze, and my hands hooked like claws on the slight protuberances within reach, I stole silently and slowly towards the projection, almost without drawing a breath. Having turned this point, and still found myself proceeding, but to what degree, and whether for better or worse, I could not exactly ascertain, as I most pertinaciously continued to look upon the rock, mechanically moving foot after foot with a sort of dogged perseverance, leaving to the leading guide the pleasing task, which I most anxiously expected every moment, of assuring me that the deed was done, and congratulating me on having passed the Mauvais Pas. But he was silent as the grave—not a word escaped his lips; and on, and on, and on did we tread, slowly, cautiously, and hesitatingly, for about ten minutes, when I became impatient to learn the extent of our progress, and inquired whether we had nearly reached the other end. "Pas encore."—"Are we half way?"—"A peu près," were the replies. Gathering up my whole stock of presence of mind, I requested that we might pause awhile, and then, as I deliberately turned my head, the whole of this extraordinary and frightful scenery revealed itself at a glance. Conceive an amphitheatre of rock forming, throughout, a bare, barren, perpendicular precipice, of I knew not how many hundred feet in height, the two extremities diminishing in altitude as they approached the Drance, which formed the chord of this arc; that on our left constituting the barrier which had impeded our progress, and which we had just ascended. From the point where we had stepped upon the ledge, quitting the forest and underwood, this circular face of precipice commenced, continuing, without intermission, till it united itself with its corresponding headland on the right. The only communication between the two being along a ledge in the face of the precipice, varying in width from about a foot to a few inches; the surface of the said ledge, moreover, assuming the form of an inclined plane, owing to an accumulation of small particles of rock, which had, from time immemorial shaled from the heights above, and lodged on this slightly projecting shelf. The distance, from the time taken to pass it, I guessed to be not far short of a quarter of a mile. At my foot, literally speaking, (for it required but a semiquaver of the body, or the loosening of my hold, to throw the centre of gravitation over the abyss,) were spread the valleys of the Drance, through which I could perceive the river meandering like a silver thread; but, from the height at which I looked down, its rapidity was invisible, and its hoarse brawling unheard. The silence was absolute and solemn; for, fortunately, not a zephyr fanned the air, to interfere with my precarious equilibrium.

There was no inducement for the lesser birds of the fields to warble where we were, and the lammer-geyers and the eagles, if any had their eyries amidst these crags, were revelling in the banquet of desolation below. As I looked upon this awfully magnificent scene, a rapid train of thoughts succeeded each other. I felt as if I was contemplating a world I had left, and which I was never again to revisit; for it was impossible not to be keenly impressed with the idea, that something fatal might occur within the space of the next few minutes, effectually preventing my return thither as a living being. Then, again, I saw before me the forms and figures of many I had left—some a few hours, some a few weeks before. Was I to see them again or not? The question again and again repeated itself, and the oftener, perhaps, from a feeling of presumption I experienced in even whispering to myself that I decidedly should. "Si on glisse, on est perdu!" how horribly forcible and true did these words now appear,—on what a slender thread was life held! A trifling deviation in the position of a foot, and it was over. I had but to make one single step in advance, and I was in another state of existence. Such were a few of the mental feelings which suggested themselves, but others of a physical nature occurred. I had eat nothing since leaving the old convent, and the keen air on the mountains had so sharpened my appetite, that by the time I had reached the summit we had just quitted, I felt not only a good deal exhausted, but extremely hungry. But hunger, thirst, and fatigue, followed me not on the ledge. A feast would have had no charm, and miles upon a level road would have been as nothing. Every sense seemed absorbed in getting to the end; and yet, in the midst of this unenviable position, a trifling incident occurred, which actually, for the time, gave rise to something of a pleasurable sensation. About midway I espied, in a chink of the ledge, the beautiful and dazzling blossom of the little gentiana nivalis, and stopping the guides while I gathered it, I expressed great satisfaction in meeting with this lovely little flower on such a lonely spot. And I could scarcely help smiling at the simplicity of these honest people, who, from that moment, whenever the difficulties increased, endeavored to divert my attention, by pointing out or looking for another specimen. We had proceeded good part of the way, when, to my dismay, the ledge, narrow as it was, became perceptibly narrower, and, at the distance of a yard or two in advance, I observed a point where it seemed to run to nothing, interrupted by a protuberant rock. I said nothing, waiting the result in silence. The guide before me, when he reached the point, threw one foot round the projection, till it was firmly placed, and holding on the rock, then brought up the other.—What was I to do? Like Arthur Philipson's guide, Antonia, I could only say, "I was no goat-hunter, and had no wings to transport me from cliff to cliff like a raven."—"I cannot perform that feat," said I to the guide; "I shall miss the invisible footing on the other side, and—then!"—They were prepared for the case; one of them happened to have a short staff; this was handed forward, and formed a slight rail, while the other, stooping down, seized my foot, and placing it in his hand, answered, "Tread without apprehension, it will support you firmly as the rock itself; be steady—go on." I did so, and regained the ledge once more in safety. The possible repetition of such an exploit was not by any means to my taste, and I ventured to question the foremost guide as to the chance of its recurrence, and the difficulties yet in store. Without pretending to disguise them, he proceeded to dilate upon the portion of our peregrination still in reserve, when the other interrupted him impatiently, and in French instead of Patois, (forgetting, in his anxiety to enjoy silence, that I understood every word he uttered,) exclaimed, "Not a word more, I entreat you. Speak not to him of danger; this is not the place to excite alarm; it is our business to cheer and animate;" and in the true spirit of his advice, he immediately pointed to a bunch of little gentians, exclaiming, "Eh, donc, qu'elles sont jolies ! Regardez ces charmantes fleurs !" Long before I had accomplished half the distance, and had formed a correct opinion as to what remained in hand, the propriety of turning back had more than once suggested itself ; but on looking round, the narrowness of the shelf already passed presented so revolting an appearance, that what with the risk to be incurred in the very act of turning about, and forming any thing like a pirouette in my present position, added to an almost insurmountable unwillingness to recede, for the reasons above mentioned, and the chance that, as it could not well be worse, the remainder might possibly be better, I decided on going on, estimating every additional inch as a valuable accession of space, with a secret proviso, however, in my own mind, that nothing on earth should induce me to return the same way, notwithstanding the declaration of the guides that they knew of no other line, unless a bridge, which was impassable yesterday, had been made passable to-day ; and we knew the people were at work, for a man had gone before us with an axe over his shoulder.

Thus persevering with the speed of a tortoise or a sloth, the solemn slow movements of hand and foot forcibly reminding me of that cautious animal, we at last drew near to a more acute point in the curve of this gaunt amphitheatre, where it bent forward towards the river, and consequently we were more immediately fronted by the precipice forming the continuation of that on which we stood. By keeping my head obliquely turned inwards, I had hitherto in great measure avoided more visual communication than I wished with the bird's-eye prospect below ; but there was no possibility of excluding the smooth bare frontage of rock right ahead. There it reared itself from the clouds beneath to the clouds above, without outward or visible sign of fret or fissure, as far as I could judge, on which even a chamois could rest its tiny hoof ; for the width of whatever ledge it might have been diminished, by the perspective view we had of it, to Euclid's true definition of the mathematical line, namely, length without breadth. At this distance of time, I have no very clear recollection of the mode of our exit, and cannot speak positively as to whether we skirted any part of this perilous wall of the Titans, or crept up through the corner of the curve, by some fissure leading to the summit. I have, however, a very clear and agreeable recollection of the moment when I came in contact with a tough bough, which I welcomed and grasped as I would have welcomed and grasped the hand of the dearest friend I had upon earth, and by the help of which I, in a very few more seconds scrambled upwards, and set my foot once more, without fear of slips or sliding on a rough heathery surface, forming the bed of a ravine, which soon led us to an upland plateau, on which I stood as in the garden of paradise.

In talking over our adventure, one of the guides mentioned a curious circumstance that had occurred either to himself or a brother guide, I forget which, in the course of their practice. He was escorting a traveller over a rather dizzy height, when the unfortunate tourist's head failed, and he fainted on the spot. Whereupon the mountaineer, a strong muscular man, with great presence of mind ; took up his charge, threw him over his shoulder, and coolly walked away with him till he came to a place of safety, where he deposited his burden, and awaited the return of sense ; "but," added he, "had such a misfortune occurred on the Mauvais Pas, you must have submitted to your fate ; the ledge was too narrow for exertion,—we could have done nothing."

We were now not much more than a league from our original destination, a space of which, whether fair or foul, I cannot speak with much precision, so entirely was every thought and sense engrossed in the business which had occupied so large a portion of the last hour. It is merely necessary to inform the reader, that at the expiration of a given time, I stood before the ruins of a stupendous mound formed of condensed masses of snow and ice, hurled down from above by the imperceptible but gradual advancement of the great Glacier of Getroz, nursed in a gorge beneath the summit of Mont Pleureur. Not a moment passed without the fall of thundering avalanches, bounding from rock to rock, till their shattered fragments, floundering down the inclined plane of snow, finally precipitated themselves into the bed of the channel through which the emancipated Lac de Mauvoisin had, in the brief space of half an hour, rushed, after it had succeeded in corroding the excavated galleries, and blown up in an instant its icy barrier.

Seated on a knoll immediately fronting the stage on which this grand scenery was represented, we rested for some time, during which we were joined by one or two of the workmen employed in repairing the roads and bridge to which the guides had alluded ; and the first question asked was, "Peut-on le traverser ?" No direct answer followed ; it was evidently, therefore, a matter of doubt, requiring at least some discussion, during which, although the parties conversed in an under-tone, I again heard, more than once, the disagreeable repetition of "Mais, a-t-il bonne tête ?" and a reference was finally made to me. It seems the bridge had been completely destroyed, but some people had that morning availed themselves of the commencement of a temporary accommodation, then in a state of preparation, and had crossed the chasm ; and provided Monsieur had a bonne tête, there was no danger in following their example. Hesitation was out of the question ; for whatever might be the possible extent of risk, in duration and degree it clearly could bear no comparison with the Mauvais Pas, the discomfiting sensations of which were still too fresh in my recollection to indulge a thought of encountering them a second time in the same day. I therefore decided on the bridge without more ado, coute qui coute ; and as we descended towards the river, I had soon the pleasure of seeing it far below me, and plenty of time to make up my mind as to the best mode of ferrying myself over. Of the original arch not a vestige remained ; but across two buttresses of natural rock I could distinguish something like a tight rope, at the two extremities of which little moving things, no bigger than mites, were bustling about, and now and then I could perceive one or two of these diminutive monocules venturing upon this apparently frail line of communication. A nearer view afforded no additional encouragement. At a depth of ninety feet below roared the Drance, foaming and dashing with inconceivable violence against its two adamantine abutments, which here confined the channel within a space of about thirty or forty feet. From rock to rock, athwart the gulf, two pine poles had that morning been thrown, not yet rivetted together, but loosely resting side by side. It certainly was not half

"As full of peril, and advent'rous spirit,
As to o'erwalk a current, roaring loud,
On the unsteadfast footing of a spear;"

but it was, notwithstanding, a very comfortless piece of footing to contemplate. Ye mariners of England, who think nothing of laying out on a topsail yard to pass an earing* in a gale of wind, might have smiled at such a sight, and crossed merrily over, without the vibration of a nerve; but let it be recollected, as a balance for a landsman's fears, that these two spars were neither furnished with accommodating jack-stays, supporting foot-ropes, nor encircling gaskets, to which the outlayer might cling in case of emergence. There they rested, one edge on each projecting promontory of the chasm, in all their bare nakedness. In the morning, I might have paused to look before I leaped; but what were forty or fifty feet of pine vaulting, in comparison with the protracted misery of a quarter of a mile of the Mauvais Pas? So forthwith committing myself to their support, on hands and knees I crawled along, and in a few minutes trode again on terra firma, beyond the reach of further risk, rejoicing, and, I trust, not ungrateful for the perils I had escaped.

From the London Magazine.

ON THE COOKERY OF THE FRENCH.

Of Anthropophagi, and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders.—Othello.

To the Editor of the London Magazine.

SIR,—I am an alderman and button-maker in the city, and I have a taste for sea-coal fires, porter, roast-beef, and the LONDON MAGAZINE. My son Bob, and my daughter Fanny, on the contrary, used to dislike all these good things—the last excepted: and prevailed with me to go and spend a month or two in Paris in the spring of this year. I knew that my son loved me as well as French cookery—and my daughter nearly as well as a French gown: so I unfortunately and affectionately complied with their desire—and have repented it ever since. However, my journey has not been altogether thrown away, as it has reconverted Bob to beef, and as it gives me an opportunity of relating the wonders of French cookery—a matter which in all your articles upon the French you have unaccountably neglected. The subject strikes me as highly important in all points of view: and it is a favorite theory of mine that the manners and tastes of a nation may be known from their cookery even better than from the bumps on their heads. The French Revolution was no doubt brought about by the national fondness for necks of mutton and men à l'écarlate: and the national hatred to the English is still visible in their attempts to poison them with their dishes:—a consummation not at all to my taste, even with the prospect of being buried in Père la Chaise. As for me, I am a plain man, alderman and button-maker, and should prefer being interred in Aldermanbury.

It has long been the reproach of the French, and you are among those who have echoed it, that they are not a portical people. But at least their cooks are. Must not a cook, Mr. Editor, be inflamed with the double fires of the kitchen and poetry, when he conceives the idea of fountains of love, starry anniseed, capons' wings in the sun, and eggs blushing like Aurora—followed (alas! what a terrible declension!) by eggs à la Tripe? I consider their beef in scarlet, their sauce in half mourning, and their white virgin beans, as examples of the same warm and culinary fancy.*

Their ingenuity is sometimes shown in the invention of new dishes, as well as in the epithets they attach to them—another poetical symptom. Not to say any thing of the vulgar plates of frogs, nettles, and thistles, what genius there is in the conception of a dish of breeches in the royal fashion, with velvet sauce—tendons of veal in a peacock's tail—and a shoulder of mutton in a balloon or a bagpipe! Sometimes their names are so fanciful as to be totally incomprehensible, especially if you look for them in a dictionary: such as a palace of beef in Cracovia—strawberries of veal—the amorous smiles of a calf—a fleet with tomato sauce—and eggs in a looking-glass.†

But there are many of their dishes which are monstrous; and in my mind not only prove the French capability of eating poisons, but their strong tendency to cannibalism. Great and little asps—fowls done like lizards—hares like serpents—and pigeons like toads or basilisks—are all favorite dishes: as are also a hash of huntsmen, a stew of good Christians, a mouthful of ladies, thin Spanish women, and four beggars on a plate.—One of their most famous sauces is sauce Robert, which I remember to have read of in Fairy Tales as the sauce with which the Ogres used to eat children. My daughter found one dish on the carte which alarmed us all—Eglefin à la Hollandaise: and after trying a long time, she remembered it was something like the name of somebody of whom she had taken lessons of memory. I suppose they had taken the poor devil from his name to be a Dutchman, and had accordingly drest him à la Hollandaise.‡

They like liver of veal done to choke you, and pullets like ivory—so called, I suppose, from their * Puits d'amour.—Anis étoilé.—Ailes de poularde au Soleil.—Œufs à l'Aurore.—Bœuf à l'écarlate.—Sauce en petit deuil.—Haricots Vierges.

† Culotte à la Royale, sauce velouté.—Tendons de veau en queue de paon.—Epaule de mouton en ballon, en musette.—Palais de bœuf en Cracovie.—Fraises de veau.—Ris de veau en amourette.—Flotte, sauce Tomato.—Œufs au miroir.

‡ Grand et petit Aspic.—Poulet en lézard.—Lézard en serpent.—Pigeon à la Crapaudine, en basilic.—Salmi de Chasseurs.—Compote de bons Chrétiens.—Bouchée de Dames.—Espagnoles maigres.—Quatre incendians.

* The technical term for an operation necessary in reefing topsails.

toughness and hardness. Other dishes are, on the contrary, quite shadowy and unsubstantial: such as an embrace of a hare on the spit—partridge's shoe-soles—a dart and a leap of salmon—the breath of a rose—a whole jonquil—or biscuits that would have done honor to the Barmecide's feast.*

The French have a way of serving up their dishes which is as extraordinary as the rest. What should we think of whittings in turbans—smelts in dice boxes—a skate buckled to capers—gooseberries in their shifts, and potatoes in their shirts!—Should we not think any Englishman very filthy whose cook should send up cutlets in hair-papers—truffles in ashes—and squirted seed-cakes!—and whose dinner-bell should announce to us what they call a ding-dong in a daub †?

The military dispositions of the French are discoverable even in their cookery. They have large and small bullets—carbonadoes innumerable—syrup of grenades—and quails in laurels: and I have often heard dishes called for, which sounded to my ear very like “ramrods for strangling,” and “bayonets for the gendarmes.” ‡

But I may easily have been mistaken in French words, when I can't understand what they call English ones—some of which seem to have undergone as complete a change by crossing the Channel, as most of our country-women. Who could recognize, for example, in wouelche rabelle, hochepot, panequet, misies paës, plomboudine, or mache potelesse, the primal and delightful sounds of Welch rabbit, hotch-potch, pancake, mince-pies, plumb-pudding, and mashed potatoes? But the French seem fond of far-fetched dishes: they get their thistles from Spain, and their cabbages from Brussels, and their artichokes from Barbary in Turkish turbans. §

The French boast that their language is the clearest in the world. I should like to know what they mean by a skate fried raw, or big little peaches ||. I can easily comprehend mouton à la Gasconne, however: and an epigramme d'agneau is as insipid as a French epigram always is.

As I have got a corner of my paper still blank, my son Bob begs me to let him spoil it with a few verses which he says are German to French cookery: I therefore hasten to conclude my epistle with the expression of my best wishes, and the assurance that I am, with great esteem and respect, Sir, your very obedient humble servant,

TIMOTHY WALKINSHAW,

Button-maker and Alderman.

Aldermanbury.

LE CUISINIER FRANÇAIS verses DR. KITCHINER.

It has often been printed in books,

And I'm going to say it once more,
That the French are a nation of cooks,—

Though I never believed it before.

But now I can make it quite clear—

For who but the devil's own legion

Would stew down a virgin, as here,

And broil out a good Christian's religion!

They say that John Bull o'er his beef

And his beer is a terrible glutton:

Does he eat toads and asps, or the leaf

Or the roots of an oak with his mutton?

Do serpents or basilisks crawl

From his kitchen to lie on his table?

Or lizards or cats does he call

By all the lost nicknames of Babel †?

We like our Beef-eaters in scarlet,

Not our beef—nor the sauce in half-mourning:

We don't eat a Fanny or Charlotte,

Nor a mouthful of ladies each morning—

(This it shocks all my senses to utter,

Yet with Holy Writ truths you may rank it:)

And they eat a Ray fried in black butter,

And can make a meal on a fowl blanket. ‡

If we don't like our beef in balloons,

Or a shoulder of lamb in a bagpipe;

Sweet wolves' teeth, or twin macarons,

Or truffles which they with a rag wipe:

If we don't look for eggs of Aurora,

Nor sheeps' tails prepared in the sun;

And prefer a boil'd cod far before a

Tough skate which is only half done: §

If we don't want our veal done to choke us,

Nor ivory fowls on our dish:

If gendarmes in all shapes should provoke us,

* Bob calls cooks “the devil's own legion,” from the well-known fact of their being sent from even a hotter place than they occupy upon earth. He alludes in the last part of the verse to the kind of bean called vierge, which the French stew, and to the bon Chrétien grillé.

† Pigeons à la crapaudine.—Aspic de veau.—Feuilletage.—Tendons de mouton aux racines.—Lièvre en serpent.—Pigeon en basilic.—Poulet en lézard.—Civet de lièvre.

‡ Bœuf à l'écarlate.—Sauce en petit deuil.—Fanchonnnettes.—Charlotte de pommes.—Bouchée de Dames, a kind of cake.—Raie au beurre noir.—Blanquette de volaille.

§ Bœuf en ballon.—Epanche d'agneau en musette.—Dents de loup, a sort of biscuit.—Macarons jumeaux.—Truffes à la Serviette.—Œufs à l'Aurore.—Queues de mouton au Soleil.—Raie frite à cru.

* Veau à l'étouffade.—Poulets à l'ivoire.—Accolade de lièvre à la Broche.—Semelles de Perdrix.—Une darde et un sauté de Saumon.—Soufflé de rose.—Une jonquille entière.—Biscuits manqués.

† Merlans en turban.—Eperlans en Cornets.—Raie bouclée aux câpres.—Groseilles et pommes de terre en chemise.—Cotelettes en papillotes.—Truffes à la cendre.—Massepains seringués.—Dindon en daube.

‡ Gros et petits boulets.—Carbonades de mouton, &c.—Sirop de grenades.—Cailles aux lauriers. In the last two names our worthy correspondent probably alludes to Ramereaux à l'étouffade, and Beignets à la gendarmes.

§ Cardons d'Espagne.—Choux de Bruxelles.—Artichauts de Barbarie en bonnet de Turc.

|| Raie frite à cru.—Pêches grosses-mignones.

And we like Harvey's sauce with our fish :
 If mutton and airs à la Gasconne
 Don't agree with the stomachs at all
 Of Englishmen—O need I ask one?—
 Let us cut Monsieur Very's, and Gaul.*

From the Dublin University Magazine.

THE NILE.

THE NILE—ITS CREATION—ITS SOURCES—ITS IMPORTANCE—ITS INUNDATION—ITS STATISTICS—ITS BATTLE.

The Nile ! the Nile ! I hear its gathering roar,
 No vision now, no dream of ancient years—
 Throned on the rocks amid the watery war,
 The King of Floods, old Homer's Nile appears.
 With gentle smile, majestically sweet,
 Carbing the billowy steeds that vex them at his feet.

LORD LINDSAY.

The spirit of our fathers
 Shall start from every wave ;
 For the deck it was their field of fame,
 And ocean was their grave.

CAMPBELL.

"EGYPT is the gift of the Nile," said one† who was bewildered by its antiquity before our history was born—(at least he is called the father of it.) A bountiful gift it was, that the "strange, mysterious, solitary stream" bore down in its bosom from the luxuriant tropics to the desert. For many an hour have I stood upon the city-crowning citadel of Cairo, and gazed unweariedly on the scene of matchless beauty and wonder that lay stretched beneath my view. Cities and ruins of cities, palm-forests and green savannahs, gardens, and palaces, and groves of olive. On one side, the boundless desert, with its pyramids ; on the other, the land of Goshen, with its luxuriant plains, stretching far away to the horizon. Yet this is an exotic land ! That river, winding like a serpent through its paradise, has brought it from far regions, unknown to man. That strange and richly-varied panorama has had a long voyage of it ! Those quiet plains have tumbled down the cataracts ; those demure gardens have flirted with the Isle of Flowers,‡ five hundred miles away ; and those very pyramids have floated down the waves of the Nile. In short, to speak chemically, that river is a solution of Ethiopia's richest regions, and that vast country is merely a precipitate. At Pæstum one sees the remnant of a city elaborated from mountain streams ; the Temple of Neptune came down from the Calabrian Hills, by water ; and the Forum, like Demosthenes, prepared itself for its tumult-scorning destiny among the dash of torrents, and the crash of rocks ;§ but here we have a whole kingdom risen, like Aphrodite, from the wave.

The sources of the Nile are as much involved in mystery as every thing else connected with this strange country. The statue, under which it was represented, was carved out of black marble, to denote its Ethiopian origin, but crowned with thorns, to symbolize the difficulty of approaching its fountain-head. It reposed appropriately on a sphinx, the type of enigmas, and dolphins and crocodiles disported at its feet. In early ages, "caput querere Nili !" was equivalent to our expression of seeking the philosopher's stone, or interest on Pennsylvanian bonds. The pursuit has baffled the scrutiny and self-devotion of modern enterprise, as effectually as it did the inquisitiveness of ancient despots, and the theories of ancient philosophers. Alexander and Ptolemy sent expeditions in search of it. Herodotus gave it up ; Pomponius Mela brought it from the antipodes, Pliny from Mauritania, and Homer from heaven. This last theory, if not the most satisfactory, is, at least, the most incontrovertible, and sounds better than the Meadows of Geesh, where Bruce thought he had detected its infancy in the fountains of the Blue River. This was only a foundling, however,—a mere tributary stream ; the naiads of the Nile are as virgin as ever. I have conversed with slave-dealers who were familiar with Abyssinia, as far as the Galla country, and still their information was bounded by the vague word, south—still from the south gushed the great river.

This much is certain, that from the junction of the Taccaze or Astaboras, the Nile runs a course of upwards of twelve hundred miles, to the sea, without one tributary stream—"exemple," as Humboldt says, "unique dans l'histoire hydrographique du globe." During this career it is exposed to the evaporation of a burning sun, drawn off into a thousand canals, absorbed by porous and thirsty banks, drank by every living thing, from the crocodile to the pasha, from the papyrus to the palm-tree ; and yet, strange to say, it seems to pour into the sea a wider stream than it displays between the cataracts a thousand miles away. The Nile is all in all to the Egyptian : if it withheld its waters for a week, his country would become a desert ; it waters and manures his fields, it supplies his harvest, and then carries off their produce to the sea ; he drinks of it, he fishes in it, he travels on it ; it is his slave, and used to be his god. Egyptian mythology recognized in it the Creative Principle, and, very poetically, engaged it in eternal war with the desert, under the name of Typhon, or the destructive principle. Divine honors were paid to this aqueous deity ; and it is whispered among mythologists, that the heart's-blood of a virgin was yearly added to its stream,—not unlikely, in a country where they worshipped crocodiles, and were anxious to consult their feelings.

The Arab looks upon all men as aliens who * Veau à l'étouffade.—Poulets à l'ivoire.—Noix de veau à la gendarme.—Mouton à la Gasconne.

† Herodotus.

‡ Elephantine.

§ For an account of the formation of the travertine, of which Pæstum was built, see Sir Humphrey's beautiful and imaginative "Last Days of a Philosopher."

were not fortunate enough to be born beside the Nile; and the traveller is soon talked into a belief that it affords the most delicious water in the world. Ship-loads of it are annually sent to Constantinople, where it is in great request, not only on epicurean, but anti-Malthusian grounds. The natives dignify their beloved river with the title of "El Bahr," the sea, and pass one-third of their lives in watching the flow, and the remainder in watching the ebb of its mighty tide. The inundation begins in May, attains its full height in August, and thenceforth diminishes, until freshly swollen in the following year. The stream is economized within its channel until it reaches Egypt, when it spreads abroad over the vast valley. Then it is that the country presents the most striking of its Protean aspects: it becomes an archipelago, studded with green islands, and bounded only by the chain of the Lybian Hills and the purple range of the Mokattam Mountains. Every island is crowned with a village, or an antique temple, and shadowy with palm-trees, or acacia groves. Every city becomes a Venice, and the bazaars display their richest and gayest cloths and tapestries to the illuminations that are reflected from the streaming streets. The earth is sheltered from the burning sun under the cool, bright veil of waters; the labor of the husbandman is suspended: it is the season of universal festivity. Boatmen alone are busy; but it would seem to be pleasant business, for the sound of music is never silent beneath those large, white, wing-like sails, that now glitter in the moonlight, and now gleam ruddily, reflecting the fragrant watchfires on the deck. In one place you come upon a floating fair, held in boats, flushed with painted lanterns, and fluttering with gay flags. In another, a bridal procession is gliding by, as her friends convey some bride, with mirth and music, to her bridegroom. On one island you find a shawled and turbaned group of bearded men, smoking their chibouques and sipping coffee. On another a merry band of Arab girls is dancing to the music of their own wild song. And then, perhaps, with the lotus flower or the light garment, that scarce concealed their graceful forms, folded as a turban, they swim from grove to grove, the quiet lake scarce rippling round their dark bosoms.

"Wreathed in the midnight of their hair,"

Great part of this picture is of rare occurrence, however—the inundation seldom rising to a height greater than what is necessary for purposes of irrigation, and presenting, alas! rather the appearance of a swamp than of an archipelago.

As the waters retire, vegetation seems to exude from every pore. Previous to its bath, the country, like Pelias, looked shrivelled, and faded, and worn out: a few days after it, old Egypt looks as good as new, wrapped in a richly green mantle embroidered with flowers. As the Nile has every thing his own way throughout his wide domains, he is capricious in proportion, and gives spring in October, and autumn in February. Another curious freak of his is to make his bed in the highest part of the great valley through which he runs; this bed is a sort of savings-bank, by means of which the deposits of four thousand years have enabled it to rise in the world, and to run along a causeway of its own.

This sloping away from the river's edge materially facilitates the irrigation of the country, in which 50,000 oxen, and at least double that number of men are perpetually employed. As I shall have frequent occasions to return to the Nile, in speaking of the commerce, the agriculture, and the mode of travelling in Egypt, I shall only add here, the following statistics from the report of M. Linant, the pasha's chief engineer. At low water it pours into the sea, by the Rosetta mouth, 79,532,551,728—by the Damietta, 71,033,840,640 cubic metres, in every twenty-four hours, making a total of 150,566,392,368. At high water, by the Rosetta branch, 478,317,838,960—by the Damietta, 227,196,828,480—total, 705,514,667,440. The elevation of its waters below the first cataract, i. e. 250 leagues from its embouchure, is 543 French feet above the level of the Mediterranean; it runs at the rate of about three miles an hour during its flood, and two during its low water. The deposit of the river, of which the country is composed, yields by analysis, 3-5ths of alumina, 1-5th of carbonate of lime, 1-20th of oxyde of iron (which communicates the reddish color to its waters,) some carbonate of magnesia, and pure silex. The mean rate of accumulated soil seems to be about four inches in a century in Lower Egypt; and about forty feet depth of soil has thus been flung over the desert since the deluge. In the time of Meris the lands were sufficiently watered, if the Nile rose to the height of eight cubits; in the time of Herodotus, it required fifteen cubits; and now the river must rise to the height of twenty-two before the whole country is overflowed. Still, as the deposits increase the Delta, the river is proportionately dammed up, and thus the great watering machine is kept in order by Nature, with a little assistance from Mehemet Ali.

Formerly, when vexed by the armaments of a Sesostrius, or the priestly pageants of a Pharaoh, the Nile required seven mouths to vent its murmurs to the sea. In modern times it finds two sufficient: Damietta, of crusading memory, presides over one, and Rosetta, in Arabic, "el Rashid," the birth-place of our old friend Haroun, takes advantage of the other. The former is waited upon by Lake Menzaleh, where alone the real ibis and the papyrus are now found—the latter looks eastward on Lake Bourlos, and westward over Aboukir Bay, of glorious memory.

* * * * *

'Tis an old story now, that battle of the Nile;

but, as the traveller paces by these silent and deserted shores, that have twice seen England's flag "triumphant over wave and war," he lives again in the stirring days, when the scenery before him was the arena where France and England contended for the empire of the East. Let us rest from blazing sun and weary travel, in the cool shadow of this palm-tree. Our camels are kneeling round us, and our Arabs light their little fires in silence. They remember well the scenes we are recalling, though many a Briton has forgotten them; and the names of Nelson and of Abercrombie are already sounding faint through the long vista of departed times. We overlook the scene of both their battles, and envy not the Spartan his Thermopylæ, or the Athenian his Salamis. What Greece was to the Persian despot, England was to Napoleon; nation after nation shrank from staking its existence at issue for a mere principle, and England alone was at war with the congregated world, in defence of that world's freedom. Yet not quite alone: she had one faithful ally in the cause of liberty and Christianity, and that ally was—the Turk!

The bay is wide, but dangerous from shoals; the line of deep blue water, and the old castle of Aboukir, map out the position of the French fleet on the 1st of August, '98. Having landed Bonaparte and his army, Brueys lay moored in the form of a crescent, close along the shore. He had thirteen sail of the line, besides frigates and gun-boats, carrying twelve hundred guns, and about eleven thousand men, while the British fleet that was in search of him, only mustered eight thousand men, and one thousand guns. The French were protected towards the northward by dangerous shoals, and towards the west by the castle, and numerous batteries. Their position was considered impregnable by themselves; yet when Hood, in the Zealous, made signal that the enemy was in sight, a cheer of anticipated triumph burst from every ship in the British fleet—that fleet which had swept the seas with bursting sails for six long weeks in search of its formidable foe—and now pressed to the battle as eagerly as if nothing but a rich and easy prize awaited them. Nelson had long been sailing in battle-order, and he now only lay to in the offing till the rearward ships should come up. The soundings of that dangerous bay were unknown to him, but he knew that where there was room for a Frenchman to lie at anchor, there must be room for an English ship to lie along-side of him, and the closer the better. As his proud and fearless fleet came on, he hailed Hood, to ask his opinion as to whether he thought it would be advisable to commence the attack that night; and receiving the answer that he longed for, the signal for "close battle" flew from his mast-head. The delay thus caused to the Zealous, gave Foley the lead, who showed the example of leading inside the enemy's line, and anchored by the stern, along-side the second ship, thus leaving to Hood the first. The latter exclaimed to my informant—"Thank God, he has generously left to his old friend, still to lead the van." Slowly and majestically, as the evening fell, the remainder of the fleet came on, beneath a cloud of sail, receiving the fire of the castle and the batteries in portentous silence, only broken by the crash of spars, and the boatswain's whistle, as each ship furled her sails, calmly as a sea-bird might fold its wings, and glided tranquilly onward till she found her destined foe. Then her anchor dropped astern, and her fire opened with a vehemence that showed with what difficulty it had been repressed.

The leading ships passed between the enemy and the shore; but when the admiral came up, he led along the seaward side—thus doubling on the Frenchman's line, and placing it in a defile of fire. The sun went down just as Nelson anchored; and his rearward ships were only guided through the darkness and the dangers of that formidable bay, by the enemy's fire flashing fierce welcome as each arrived, and hovered along the line, coolly scrutinizing where he could draw most of that fire on himself. The Bellerophon, with gallant recklessness, fastened on the gigantic Orient, and was soon crushed and scorched into a wreck by the terrible artillery of batteries more than double the numbers of her own. But before she drifted helplessly to leeward, she had done her work—the French admiral's ship was on fire, and through the roar of battle, a whisper went that for a moment paralyzed every eager heart and hand. During the dread pause that followed, the fight was suspended—the very wounded ceased to groan—yet the burning ship continued to fire broadsides from her flaming decks—her gallant crew alone unawed by their approaching fate, and shouting their own brave requiem. At length, with the concentrated roar of a thousand battles, the explosion came; and the column of flame that shot upward into the very sky, for a moment rendered visible the whole surrounding scene, from the red flags aloft, to the reddened decks below—the wide shore, with all its swarthy crowds, and the far-off glittering sea, with the torn and dismantled fleets. Then darkness and silence came again, only broken by the shower of blazing fragments, in which that brave ship fell upon the waters.

Till that moment Nelson was ignorant how the battle went. He knew that every man was doing his duty, but he knew not how successfully;—he had been wounded in the forehead, and found his way unnoticed to the deck in the suspense of the coming explosion. Its light was a fitting lamp for eye like his to read by. He saw his own proud flag still floating everywhere; and at the same moment his crew recognized their wounded chief. The wild cheer with which they welcomed him was drowned in the renewed roar of the artillery, and the fight continued until near the dawn.

Morning rose upon an altered scene. The sun had set upon as proud a fleet as ever sailed from the gay shores of France: torn and blackened hulls now only marked the position they had then occupied; and where their admiral's ship had been, the blank sea sparkled in the sunshine, and the nautilus spread his tiny sail as if in mockery. * * Two ships of the line and two frigates escaped, to be captured soon afterwards; but within the bay, the tricolor was flying on board the Tonnant alone. As the Theseus approached to attack her, attempting to capitulate, she hoisted a flag of truce. "Your battle-flag or none," was the stern reply, as her enemy rounded to, and the matches glimmered over her line of guns. Slowly and reluctantly, like an expiring hope, that pale flag fluttered down from her lofty spars, and the next that floated there was the banner of Old England.

And now the battle was over—India was saved upon the shores of Egypt—the career of Bonaparte was checked,* and the navy of France was annihilated, though restored, seven years later, to perish utterly at Trafalgar—a fitting hecatomb for obsequies like those of Nelson, whose life seemed to terminate as his mission was then and thus accomplished.

MAHMOUDISH CANAL—BATTLE OF ABOUKIR—ATFE.

"And knows not if it be thunder, or a sound
Of scourge-driv'n labor, or the one deep cry
Of people perishing—then thinketh, 'I have found
New waters, but I die.'" ANON.

"The blue steel bit, thro' helmet split,
And red the harness painted;
The virgins long lamented it,
But the dogs were well contented
With the slaughter of that day."

SCANDINAVIAN RUNE.

ARRIVED at Alexandria, the traveller is yet far distant from the Nile. The Canopic mouth is long since closed up by the mud of Æthiopia, and the Arab conquerors of Egypt were obliged to form a canal to connect this seaport with the river. Under the Mamelukes this canal has also become choked up, and her communication with the great vivifying stream thus ceasing, Alexandria languished—while Rosetta, like a vampire, fed on her decay, and, notwithstanding her shallow waters, swelled suddenly to importance. When Mehemet Ali rose to power, his clear intellect at once comprehended the importance of the ancient emporium. Alexandria was then become a mere harbor for pirates—the desert and the sea were gradually encroaching on its boundaries—but the pasha ordered the desert to bring forth corn, and the sea to retire, and the mandate of this Albanian Canute was no idle word—it acted like an incantation to the old Egyptian spirit of great works. Up rose a stately city, containing 60,000 inhabitants, and as suddenly yawned the canal, which was to connect the new city with the Nile, and enable it to fulfil its destinies, of becoming the emporium of three quarters of the globe. In the greatness and the cruelty of its accomplishment, this canal may vie with the gigantic labors of the Pharaohs. Three hundred thousand people were swept from the villages of the Delta, and heaped like a ridge along the destined banks of that fatal canal. They had only provisions for one month, and implements they had few, or none; but the pasha's command was urgent—the men worked with all the energy of despair, and stabbed into the ground as if it was their enemy; children carried away the soil in little handfuls; nursing mothers laid their infants on the shelterless banks; the scourge kept them to the work, and mingled blood with their milk, if they attempted to nourish their offspring. Famine soon made its appearance, and they say it was a fearful sight, to see that great multitude convulsively working against time. As a dying horse bites the ground in his agony, they tore up that great grave—30,000 people perished, but the grim contract was completed, and in six weeks the waters of the Nile were led to Alexandria. The canal is forty-eight miles in length, ninety feet in breadth, and eighteen in depth; it was finished altogether in ten months, with the exception of the lock which should have connected it with the river; the bey who had charge of this department lost his contract and his head. * * * *

We embarked in a boat not unlike those that ply upon the Grand Canal, and, to say the truth, among the dreary wastes of swamp that surrounded us, we might also have fancied ourselves in the midst of the Bog of Allen. The boat was towed by four wild, scraggy-looking horses, ridden by four wilder, scaggier-looking men—their naked feet were stuck in shovel stirrups, with the sharp sides of which they scored their horses' flanks, after the fashion of crimped cod. It is true, these jockies wore tattered turbans instead of tattered hats, and loose blue gowns instead of grey frize. Yet, still there was something very dis-illusionizing in the whole turn-out—and the mud cabins that here and there encrusted the banks did not tend to obliterate Tipperary associations. But—hold! there is a palm-tree, refreshing to the cockney's eye; an ostrich is trotting along the towing-path; from a patch of firm ground a camel rears its melancholy head; and, by Jove! there goes a pelican! We must be in Africa, or else a menagerie has broken loose from Tullamore.

We pass, for some miles, along a causeway that separates the salt-water Lake Mædee from Lake Marcotis. Nothing can be more desolate than the aspects of these two lonely lakes, stretching, with their low swampy shores, away to the horizon. If Alastor, or the spirit of solitude, was fond of yachting, these waters would be the very place for him to cruise in, undisturbed, except by the myriads of wild fowl that kept wheeling, shrieking, and whistling round us. These lakes seem to have been born for one another; but the Pharaohs, like poor-law guardians, saw fit to separate them. Their object, however, the reverse of the said poor law, was to make Mareotis fruitful. A vast mound was raised, which kept the salt-lake at a respectful distance, and until the English invasion in 1801, or at least until the sixteenth century, the greater part of Mareotis was a fertile plain.

* Le principal but de l'expédition des Français d'Orient était d'abaisser la puissance Anglaise. C'est du Nil que devait partir l'armée qui allait donner de nouvelles destinées aux Indes. . . . Les Français une fois maîtres des port de Corfou, de Malte et d'Alexandrie, la Méditerranée devenait un lac Français.—Mémoires de Napoléon.

Bonaparte, after having defeated the Mamelukes at the Pyramids, had taken possession of Cairo. Having denied Christ in Europe, he acknowledged Mahomet in Asia; having butchered his prisoners at Jaffa, he was defeated by the Butcher* Pasha and Sir Sydney Smith, at Acre; having poisoned part of that army whom he called his children, he started for Paris, and left the remainder to encounter alone, those

“Storms that might veil his fame’s ascending star.”†

That remainder occupied Cairo, under the gallant and ill-fated Kleber. He had accepted terms of capitulation from the Turks, which Lord Keith refused to ratify. The moment Sir Sydney Smith learned the English admiral’s determination, he took upon himself to inform Kleber of the fact, and to advise him to hold his position. The Turks exclaimed against this chivalrous notice as a treachery, and there were not a few found in England to echo the same cry; but the spirit which dictated the British sailor’s act was understood in the deserts—a voice went forth among the tents of the Bedouin and the palaces of the despot, that England preferred honor to advantage. Battles, since then, have been fought, and been forgotten—nations have come and gone, and left no trace behind them—but the memory of that noble truthfulness remained, and expanded into a national characteristic; and our countrymen may, at this hour, in the streets of Cairo, hear the Arabs swear “by the honor of an Englishman.”

• • • • •

Kleber was assassinated by a fanatic, instigated by those priests whose faith he had offered to profess. The incapable Menou succeeded to the command. Abercrombie anchored in Aboukir Bay on the 2d of March, 1801, but was prevented from disembarking, by a continued gale of wind, until the 8th. Soon after midnight, a rocket from the admiral’s ship gave the signal for landing—and the boats, crowded with 6,000 troops, formed in such order as they could maintain on the yet stormy sea. Then, through the clear silence of the night, the order was given to advance, and the deep innumerable of a thousand oars made answer to the cheer that urged them on. It was morning before they approached the shore, which blazed with the fire of the French troops and their protecting batteries—but on they went, as reckless as the breeze that wafted them, till the boats took ground, and then leapt upon the bayonets of the French, advancing through the surf to meet them. The foam soon changed its color as they fought among the very waves, but nothing could stand the British onset long. The 23d, and the flank companies of the 40th, drove the enemy before them, and received and broke a charge of cavalry with the bayonet. The sailors, harnessing themselves to the field artillery, dragged it through the heavy sands, under the fire of the French batteries, to whose roar they replied with loud and triumphant cheers. The British troops now rushed on to the mouths of the cannon, swept the artillery men from their posts, carried the batteries with the bayonet, and stood conquerors on the Egyptian shore. On the 13th, a sanguinary engagement took place, without any result of importance. On the 21st, the English occupied a line extending from the spot we are now sailing over to where the sea glistens yonder, about a mile away. Their right flank was covered by a flotilla of gunboats, under Sir Sydney Smith—the left, by redoubts. The French had partly restored the ancient lines of circumvallation, near Alexandria, which Sir Ralph Abercrombie was preparing to storm, when the enemy’s confidence and impetuosity induced him to abandon his strong position, and advance to meet the British in yonder plain, where a few palm-trees still mark the ground they occupied. I need not tell the results of that glorious day. The 42d Highlanders and the gallant 28th regiment there won the proud name which they have since borne stainless through many a bloody field. The seaman there fought side by side in generous rivalry with the soldier—in a word, there Abercrombie conquered, and there Abercrombie fell.

“Sweet in manner, fair in favor,
Mild in temper, fierce in fight;
Warrior nobler, gentler, braver,
Never shall behold the light.”

The command devolved upon Lord Hutchinson, a worthy successor of his gallant friend. The powerfully written, manly, and feeling dispatch, in which he announced the victory of Aboukir, and the death of Abercrombie, is, perhaps, as fine a composition as our military records can supply. On the arrival of Sir David Baird from India, by Cosseir and the Nile, Lord Hutchinson advanced upon Alexandria, which capitulated, and soon afterwards Egypt was abandoned both by conquered and conquerors to the Moslem. It was in this last advance that the embankment was cut by the British army. Six dykes were opened, but the intermediate banks soon gave way, and the sea burst freely into lake Mareotis, submerging forty Arab villages with their cultivated lands. It was seventy days before the cataract subsided into a strait. The sea is now once more banked out by the causeway on which the Mahmoudish canal is carried to Alexandria, and Mehemet Ali intends to drain the lake, and again to restore it to cultivation; but the ruin which the hand of man, "so weak to save—so vigorous to destroy," effected in a few hours, it will take many years to restore.

*Djezzar—in Arabic, a butcher.

†Sir John Hammer.

Gentle reader, we are done with war—and if you should add, "time for us," I can only say, that I felt bound to account for this unpleasant-looking lake, on whose banks I have so long detained you, and, more truly, that I was fain to add my pebble to the cairn upon Abercrombie's grave.

It was midnight when we arrived at Atfê, the point of junction with the Nile—and a regular African storm, dark and savage, was howling among the mud-built houses, when we disembarked there, ankle deep in slime. A crowd of half-naked swarthy Arabs, with flaring torches, looked as if they were welcoming us to the realms of darkness, jabbering and shouting violently, in chorus with the barking of the wild dogs, the roaring of the wind, and the growling of the camels, as a hail-storm of boxes and portmanteaus was showered on their backs; donkies were braying, women shrieking, Englishmen cursing sonorously, and the lurid moon, as she hurried through the clouds, seemed a torch waved by some fury, to light up this scene of infernal confusion. My friend and I fought our way through the demon crowd, gave some of the ban-dogs reason for their howling, and, losing our way in an enclosure, stumbled over one of the only two pigs in the Land of Ham. These unclean animals are kept by a Frenchman, who magnanimously prefers pork to popularity, and is about to establish an hotel in this most diabolical village it has ever been my lot to enter. Marvelling whether we should ever be restored to any of our luggage, we groped our way through sleeping Arabs and kneeling camels, and found, to our pleased amazement, that our baggage, which appeared to scatter as widely and as suddenly as a burst rocket, was piled upon the deck uninjured, and our big-breached servants were smoking on the portmanteau pyramids, as apathetically as two sphinxes.

We are now upon the sacred river—but it is too dark to see its waters gleam—and the shrieking of the steamer prevents us from hearing its waters flow. Alas! alas!—What a paragraph! And, is it possible, ye Naiade of the Nile, that your deified stream is to be harrowed up by a greasy, grunting steam-ship, like the parvenue rivers of vulgar Europe? That stream—that, gushing from beyond the emerald mountains, scatters gold around it in its youth—that has borne the kings of India to worship at ancient Merôc—that has murmured beneath the cradle of Moses, and foamed round the golden prow of Cleopatra's barge! Unhappy river! Thou, who in thy warm youth hast loved the gorgeous clouds of Æthiopia, must thou now expiate thy raptures, like Ixion, on the wheel! Yes, for thy old days of glory are gone by—thy veil of mystery is rent away, and with many another sacrificial victim of the ideal to the practical, thou must, forsooth, become useful, and respectable, and convey cockneys. They call thy steamy torturer the Lotus, too—adding insult to deep injury; a pretty specimen of thy sacred flower, begrimed with soot, and bearing fifty tons of Newcastle coal in its calyx!

We were soon fizzing merrily up the stream, and after a night spent upon the hard boards in convulsive efforts to sleep, that were more fatiguing than a fox-hunt, we hurried on deck to see the sun shine over this renowned river. Must I confess it! We could see nothing but high banks of dark mud, or swamps of festering slime—even the dead buffalo, that lay rotting on the river's edge, with a pretty sprinkling of goitrous-looking vultures, scarcely repaid one for leaving Europe. In some hours, however, we emerged from the Rosetta branch, on which we had hitherto been boiling our way to the great river, and henceforth the prospect began to improve. Villages sheltered by graceful groups of palm-trees, mosques, santons' tombs, green plains, and at length the desert—the most imposing sight in the world, except the sea. The day passed slowly—the view had little variety—the wild fowl had ascertained the range of an English fowling-piece; the dinner was as cold as the climate would permit—the plates had no knives and forks, and an interesting-looking lady had a drumstick between her teeth, as I pointed out to her the scene of the battle of the Pyramids, which now rose upon our view. That sight restored us to good humor; we felt we were actually in Egypt—the bog of Allen, the canal-boat, the cockney steamer itself, failed to counteract the effect produced upon us by those man-made mountains, girt round with forests of palm trees. As the sun and the champagne went down, our spirits rose, and by the time the evening and the mist had rendered the country invisible, we had persuaded ourselves that Egypt was, indeed, the lovely land that Moore has so delightfully imagined in the pages of the "Epicurean."

CAIRO—ITS PORT—VIEW FROM WITHOUT—WITHIN —THE CITADEL—HELIOPOLIS—PALACE OF SHOOL-RA—THE SLAVE-MARKET.

While far as sight can reach, beneath as clear
And blue as heaven as ever blessed this sphere,
Gardens, and minarets, and glittering domes,
And high-built temples, fit to be the homes
Of mighty gods, and pyramids, whose hour
Outlasts all time above the water's tower.

MOORE.

MORNING found us anchored off Boulac, the port of Cairo. Toward the river it is faced by factories and storehouses; within you find yourself in a labyrinth of brown narrow streets that resemble rather rifts in some mud mountain, than any thing with which architecture has to do. Yet here and there the blankness of the walls is broken and varied by richly worked lattices, and specimens of arabesque masonry. Gaudy bazaars strike the eye and relieve the gloom—and the picturesque population that swarms every where keeps the interest awake.

On emerging from the lanes of Boulac, Cairo, Grand Cairo! opens on the view, and never yet did fancy flash upon the poet's eye a more superb illusion of power and beauty than the "city of Victory"* presents from a distance. The bold range of the Mokattam mountains is purpled by the rising sun—its craggy summits are cut clearly out against the glowing sky—it runs like a promontory into a sea of the richest verdure, here wavy with a breezy plantation of olives, there darkened with acacia groves. Just where the mountain sinks upon the plain, the citadel stands upon its last eminence, and, widely spread beneath it lies the city, a forest of minarets with palm trees intermingled, and the domes of innumerable mosques rising, like enormous bubbles, over the sea of houses. Here and there richly green gardens are islanded within that sea, and the whole is girt round with picturesque towers and ramparts, occasionally revealed through vistas of the wood of sycamores and fig-trees that surround it. It has been said that "God the first garden made, and the first city Cain;" but here they seemed commingled with the happiest effect. The approach to Cairo is a spacious avenue lined with the olive or the sycamore; here and there the white marble of a fountain gleams through the foliage, or a palm-tree waves its plummy head above the santon's tomb. Along this highway a masquerading looking crowd is swarming towards the city—ladies wrapped closely in white veils, women of the lower class carrying water on their heads, and covered only with a long blue garment that reveals, but too plainly, an exquisite symmetry in the young, and a hideous deformity in the elders—there are camels perched upon by black slaves, magpied with white napkins round their head and loins—there are portly merchants, with turbans and long pipes, gravely smoking on their knowing-look donkeys—here an Arab dashes through the crowd at full gallop, or a European still more haughtily shoves aside the pompous-looking bearded throng. Water-carriers, calenders, Armenians, barbers, all the dramatist personæ of the Arabian Nights are there. And now we reach the city wall, with its towers as strong as mud can make them. It must not be supposed that this mud architecture is of the same nature that one associates with the word in Europe. No! Overshadowed by palm-trees, and a crimson banner with its crescent waving from the battlements, and camels couched beneath its shade, and swarthy Egyptians, in gorgeous apparel, leaning against it, make a mud wall appear a very respectable fortification in this land of illusion.

And now we are within the city! Protean powers! what a change! A labyrinth of dark, filthy, intricate lanes and alleys, in which every smell and sight, from which the nose and eye revolt, meet one at every turn, and one is always turning. The stateliest streets are not above twelve feet wide, and as the upper stories arch over them toward one another, only a narrow serpentine seam of blue sky appears between the toppling verandahs of the winding streets. Occasionally a string of camels, bristling with fagots of firewood, sweeps the streets as effectually of passengers, as the machine which has superseded chummies does a chimney of its soot; lean mangy dogs are continually running between your legs, which afford a tempting passage in this pettecoated place; beggars, in rags, quivering with vermin, are lying in every corner of the street; now a bridal, or a circumcising procession, squeezes along, with music that might madden a drummer—now the running footmen of some bey or pasha, endeavor to jostle you towards the wall, unless they recognize you as an Englishman—one of that race whom they think the devil can't frighten or teach manners to. Notwithstanding all these annoyances, however, the streets of Cairo present a source of unceasing amusement and curiosity to the stranger. It has not so purely an oriental character as Damascus; but the intermixture of Europeans gives it a character of its own, and affords far wider scope for adventure than the secluded and solemn capital of Syria. The bazaars are very vivid and varied, and each is devoted to a peculiar class of commodities—thus you have the Turkish, the Persian, the Frank bazaars; the armorers', the weavers', the jewellers' quarters. These bazaars are, for the most part, covered in, and there is a cool and quiet gloom about them which is very refreshing; there is also an air of profound repose in the turbaned merchants, as they sit cross-legged on their counters, embowered by the shawls and silks of India and Persia: they look as if they were forever sitting for their portraits, and seldom move a muscle, unless it be to breathe a cloud of smoke from their bearded lips, or to turn their vivid eyes upon some expected customer—those eyes that seem to be the only living part of their countenance. These bazaars have each a ponderous chain hung across their entrance, to prevent the precipitate departure of any thief that may presume too far upon the listlessness of the shopkeeper; each lane and alley is also terminated by a door, which is guarded at night. In passing along these narrow lanes, you might suppose yourself in some gallery or corridor, until you meet a file of donkeys, or of soldiers staggering along their slippery paths.

* "El Kahira," the Arabic epithet of this city, means "the Victorious"—whence our word Cairo—in Arabic "Misr."

Mean-looking and crowded as is the greater part of Cairo, there are some extensive squares and stately houses. Among the former is the Esbekeych, by which you enter the city—a place perhaps twice the size of Stephen's-Green, occupied by a large plantation, divided by wide avenues, and surrounded by a dirty canal. A wide road, shaded by palm and sycamore trees, runs round this canal, and forms a street of tall mud-colored houses of very various architecture; some of these, the verandahs particularly, are very delicately and elaborately worked. The best buildings in the Esbekeych are the palaces of Ibrahim and Abbas Pasha, and the new hotel D'Orient, in which we had pleasant apartments—looking over a cemetery it is true, which was haunted by tribes of ghoul-like dogs. But beyond this were gardens, and Kiosks, and palm-groves, and a glimpse of the Nile, and, above all, the Pyramids far in the distance, yet, by their magnitude, curiously confounding the perspective. Another wide space is the Roumeleych, where fairs and markets are held, and criminals are executed, and other popular amusements take place. I am not writing a guide-book, and I shall only at present allude to the citadel, which, as I have observed already, overlooks the town. Mehemet Ali resides in it when he is in Cairo. Here are the remains of Saladin's palace, and the commencement of a magnificent mosque, from the terraced roof of which there is, perhaps, the finest view in the world. There is also a place of great interest to antiquarian cockneys, because it is called Joseph's well, although owing its origin to the Saracen,* not the patriarch. There is also a respectable armory of native workmanship, a printing-press, and a mint which coins annually about 200,000 sterling in gold. This citadel was built by Saladin, and was very strong from its position, before gunpowder gave the command of it to a height further up on the Mokattam height.

"Thin layer of thin earth between
The living and the dead,"

But to me, the most interesting spot within these crime-stained precincts, was that where the last of the Mamelukes escaped the bloody treachery of Mehemet Ali. Soon after the Pasha was confirmed by the Porte in the vice-royalty of Egypt, he summoned the Mameluke beys to a consultation on the approaching war against the Wahabees in Arabia. As his son Tousoun had been invested with the dignity of pasha of the second order, the occasion was one of festivity, as well as business. The beys came mounted on their finest horses, in magnificent uniforms, forming the most superb cavalry in the world. After a very flattering reception from the pasha, they were requested to parade in the court of the citadel, which they entered unsuspectingly, until the portcullis fell behind the last of the proud procession. They dashed forwards—in vain!—before and around them nothing was visible, but blank, pitiless walls, and barred windows; and the only opening was towards the bright blue sky. Even that was soon darkened by their funeral pall of smoke, as volley after volley flashed from a thousand muskets upon their defenceless and devoted band. Startling, and fearfully sudden as was the death, they met it as became their fearless character. Some with arms crossed upon their mailed bosoms, and their turbaned heads devoutly bowed in prayer; some with flashing swords, and fierce curses, alike unavailing against their dastard and ruthless foe. All that chivalrous and splendid throng, save one, sank rapidly beneath that deadly fire into a red and writhing mass—that one was Emim Bey. He spurred his charger over a heap of his slaughtered comrades, and sprang upon the battlements. It was a dizzy height, but the next moment he was in the air—another, and he was disengaging himself from his crushed and dying horse, amid a shower of bullets. He escaped, and found his well-earned freedom in the desert.

The objects of interest in the neighborhood are very numerous. One day, we rode to Heliogolia, the On of Scripture. It is about five miles from Cairo; and the road lies, for the most part, along a shady avenue passing through luxuriant corn-fields, over which numbers of the beautiful white ibis were hovering. We found nothing but a small garden of orange-trees, with a magnificent obelisk in the centre. Yet here Joseph was married to the fair Asenath; here Plato and Herodotus studied, and here the darkness in which the sun veiled the Great Sacrifice on Calvary, was observed by a heathen astronomer. The obelisks seem never to have been isolated in the position for which they were originally hewn out of the granite quarries of Syene. They terminated avenues of columns or of statues, and bore, in hieroglyphic inscriptions, the destination of the temples to which they led. People talk of the ruins of the temple of the Sun as being discoverable here; and there are reports about a sphinx, but we could discover neither. Here is the garden of Metarich, where grew the celebrated balm of Gilead, presented by the queen of Sheba to Solomon, and brought to Egypt by Cleopatra.* On our return towards Cairo, we were shown the fountain which refreshed, and the tree which shaded, the holy family in their flight to Egypt.

Another day, we went to Shooobra, the palace and garden of Mehemet Ali. We cantered under a noble avenue of sycamores, just wide enough to preserve their shade, and at the end of three miles, came to a low and unpretending gateway, picturesque, however, and covered with parasites.

* For an account of this plant, see the valuable notes to Lord Lindsay's Letters—a book without which no one should visit Egypt, and few should remain in England.

* Saladin's name was Joussef or Joseph.

Without, were tents and troops, and muskets piled, and horses ready saddled; but within, all was peace and silence. A venerable gardener, with a long white beard, received us at the entrance, and conducted us through the fairy-like garden, of which he might pass for the guardian genius. There were very few flowers; but shade and greenery are every thing in this glaring climate; and it was very delightful to stroll along these paths, all shadowy, with orange trees, whose fruit, "like lamps in a night of green," hung temptingly over our heads. The fragrance of large beds of roses mingled with that of the orange flower, and seemed to repose on the quiet airs of that calm evening. In the midst of this garden we came to a vast pavilion, glittering like porcelain, and supported on light pillars, forming cloisters, that surrounded a little marble basin, in the centre of which sparkling waters gushed from a picturesque fountain. Gaily painted little boats for the ladies of the harem, floated on the surface of this lake, through whose clear depths, shoals of gold and silver fishes flashed lines of light. In each corner of the building, there were gilded apartments with divans, tables, mirrors and all the simple furniture of an eastern palace, in which books or pictures are never found. The setting sun threw his last shadows on the distant pyramids, as we lay upon the marble steps inhaling the odors of the orange and pomegranate groves, and dreamily listening to the vespers of the busy birds, and the far-off hum of the city, and the faint murmur of the great river; the evening breeze was sighing among the palms and the columns of the palace, when we were startled by another rustle than that of leaves, and two odalisques came laughing by, unconscious of our presence, and unveiled. The old Arab gardener anxiously signed to us to look another way, but for once I preferred European to Egyptian manners, and gazed admiringly on the startled pair. One was a very beautiful Georgian girl—I believe her companion was handsome too; but one such face was enough at a time, and, as it was not very quickly shrouded by her veil, I had a glimpse of as bright—no, that is not the word—but of as beautiful a countenance as poet ever dreamed of. She was very fair, and all but pale—the deep seclusion of her life had left but little color on her cheek, and her exquisitely chiselled features would have been marble-like, but for the resplendent eyes that lent life and lustre to the whole countenance. A brilliant moon lighted our gallop back to Cairo: the gates were long since closed, but a bribe procured us easy admission.

The tombs of the Mamelukes are mausolean palaces, of great beauty, and the richest Saracenic architecture, but now falling fast to decay, and only inhabited, or rather haunted, by some outcast Arabs and troops of wild dogs. They form a grand cemetery of their own, surrounded by the desert.

The petrified forest is about five miles away. My friend R. went there, and described it as a vast shelterless wilderness of sand, strewn with what seemed the chips of some gigantic carpenter's shop. There are no roots, much less appearance of a standing tree.

One of the sights which amused me most was a chicken-hatching oven. This useful establishment is at some distance from the walls, and gives life to some millions of chickens annually. It seems that the hens of Egypt are not given to sedentary occupations; having been hatched themselves by machinery, they do not feel called upon to hatch. They seem to consider that they have discharged every duty to society, when they have produced the egg—no domestic anxiety ruffles their bosoms; they care not whether their offspring becomes a fowl or a fritter, a game cock or an omelette.

We entered a gloomy and filthy hut, in which a woman was squatting, with a dark, little, naked imp at her bosom. She sat sentry over a hole in the wall, and insisted clamorously on backsheesh (a bribe.) Being satisfied in this particular, she consented "to sit over," and we introduced ourselves with considerable difficulty into a narrow passage, on either side of which were three chambers, strown with fine mould, and covered with eggs, among which a naked Egyptian walks delicately as Agag, and keeps continually turning them with most hen-like anxiety. The heat was about 100°, the smell like that of Harrowgate water, and the floor was covered with egg-shells and struggling chickens. The same heat is maintained day and night, and the same wretched henman passes his life in turning eggs. His fee is one-half the receipt—he returns fifty chickens for every hundred eggs that he receives.

It was the feast of lanterns. As we strolled, by the soft moonlight, under the avenues of sycamore and olive trees that shadow the Esbekeyeh, we could see through the vistas an extensive encampment in the distance—innumerable lamps, of various colors, and painted lanterns, shone among the tents and the dark foliage. Not only did they glitter on every bough, and on a thousand banners, but scaffoldings were raised, on which they hung in garlands and festoons of light. The very sky above them wore the appearance of a faint dawn: every glimpse of the canals, every leaf in all the grove, shone with their reflected radiance. Of course we were soon struggling through the many-colored crowd of the prophet's worshippers, that thronged the encampment. A Moslem mob is good-tempered and patient beyond belief; and that sea of turbans stagnated as calmly, as if every wave of it was exactly in the position that he wished to occupy. Each tent was crowded to excess by performers or aspirants in a most singular religious ceremony. A ring of men, standing so closely side by side that they supported each other in their exhausting devotions, were vehemently shouting "Allah," or rather "Ullah," in chorus. They moved their bodies up and down, keeping strict time to this monotonous chant, exhaling their breath pantingly at every exclamation. Many were foaming at the mouth, some were incoherent—all seemed utterly exhausted, and fell, from time to time, among the crowd that was quietly squatted within their excited circle. They were instantly succeeded by others, and this proceeding continued till morning: every tent had its peaceful crowd of squatters, surrounded by its convulsive ring. None of the crowd appeared to take the slightest interest or curiosity about the business before or after they had performed their own part. They then lighted their pipes, where they had room to do so, and gently struggled towards the flower-ornamented stalls, where coffee and sherbet were supplied. It was very refreshing to turn from this melancholy scene, so humbling to human nature, and find oneself in silence and solitude, under the calm, pure skies, with the soothing whispers of the night breeze, as it wandered among the feathery palms.

I pass over, for the present, the schools, the hospitals, and the manufactories of the pasha, Mr. Leider's interesting missionary schools, the museums of Dr. Abbot and Clot Bey, and will only beg the reader's company to one more scene in Cairo.

I went to visit the slave-market, which is held without the city, in the court-yard of a deserted mosque. I was received by a mild-looking Nubian, with a large white turban wreathed over his swarthy brows, and a bernoose, or cloak, of white and brown striped hair-cloth, strapped round his loins. He rose and laid down his pipe as I entered, and led me in silence to inspect his stock. I found about thirty girls, scattered in groups about an inner court. The gate was open, but there seemed no thought of escape. Where could they go, poor things! "The world was not their friend, or the world's law." Some of them were grinding millet between two stones—some were kneading the flour into bread; some were chatting in the sunshine, some sleeping in the shade. One or two looked sad and lonely enough, until their gloomy countenances were lighted up with hope—the hope of being bought! Their faces were, for the most part, wofully blank—not the blankness of despair, but of intelligence; and many wore an awfully animal expression. Yet there were several figures of exquisite symmetry among them, which, if they had been indeed the bronze statues they resembled, would have attracted the inspection of thousands, and would have been worth twenty times the price that was set upon these immortal beings. Their proprietor showed them off as a horse-dealer does his cattle, examining their teeth, removing their body-clothes, and exhibiting their paces. He asked only from twenty-five to thirty pounds sterling for the best and comeliest of them. The Abyssinians are the most prized of the African slaves, from their superior gentleness and intelligence; those of the Galla country are the most numerous and hardy. The former have well-shaped heads, beautiful eyes, an agreeable brown color, and shining smooth black tresses. The latter have low foreheads, crisp hair, sooty complexions, thick lips, and projecting jaws. It was like the change from night to morning, passing from these dingy crowds to the apartments of the white slaves from Georgia and Circassia. It was not without some difficulty I obtained admission into this department of the human bazaar. Its commodities are only purchased by the wealthy and powerful Mussulmans, and many are bought upon commission. They fetch from one hundred and fifty to three hundred pounds sterling; and, being so much more valuable than the Africans, are much more carefully tended. They reclined upon carpets, lightly but richly clad. They were, for the most part, exquisitely fair; but I was disappointed in their beauty. The sunny hair, and heaven-blue eyes, that in England produce such an angel-like and intellectual effect, seemed to me here mere flax and beads; and I left them to the "turbaned Turk" without a sigh—except, perhaps, a very little one for those far away, in mine own land, whose image they served, however faintly, to recall.

It is the usual custom of travellers, to pour forth a torrent of indignation on the slave markets of the east. Certainly they do not sound well; and far be it from me to become their advocate; nevertheless it is not just to paint the black prince blacker than he is, even when speaking of niggers. It is not fair to judge of the sufferings or sensations of these creatures, half man, half orang-outang, by the standard of our own people. It is true they are only clothed with a blanket or a napkin, but that is the full-dress of their native land. They are fed on coarse flour-cakes and water, but that is the beef and beer of Ethiopia. Their domestic ties are broken, but they are not like our ties, whatever morbid philanthropy may say; and, if they were, the slave-dealer is only in the relation to them of a new-poor-law guardian unto us. They suffer hardship and cruelty, no doubt, during their passage of the desert, and down the Nile; but once they are purchased, they are treated with the same kindness, they have the same food and clothes as the free servant; and they have nothing of the stigma which is attached to their undeserved destiny in the free, and enlightened, and repudiating republic of America. It is to be considered, also, that they are, for the most part, prisoners of war, and exchange a cruel death for that servitude which is the lot of the freest of us all in one form or another. As for the Georgian and Circassian beauties, they have never learned what love or freedom means; they have been educated for exportation; their only ambition, like that of many fair maidens in happier lands, is to fetch a high price, and their only hope is to be first favorite in the hareem—whose hareem they care not.

Heaven forbid that I should attempt to defend the diabolical traffic in immortal beings! I only venture to exhibit the matter in the light in which it appears to the Mussulman, by which light alone he is to be judged. For my own part, I can truly say, that I have witnessed more melancholy sights in village church and city chapel, where orange-flowers wreathed, and jewels adorned, and bishops blessed a victim-bride, than in any slave-market of the east, from Cairo to Constantinople.

It is forbidden by the law of Mahomet to sell slaves to Christians, out of regard to their souls! We may smile at it, but we cannot scorn this consideration. Cairo is remarkable for latitudinarianism in matters of faith—but at Damascus, the traveller can only obtain admission to the slave-bazaar under the disguise of oriental costume. Even in the former city, however, the difficulty of access is daily increased, from the insults with which the slave-owners are overwhelmed by Christians, after they have satisfied their curiosity. These travellers should beware of relying too much on the ignorance of the African, for there are man-dealers and daughter-sellers in other lands than those of Egypt. * * * *

Here, you black scoundrel!—here is the price of that fair Georgian girl, whose eyes sparkle with the hope of being bought, and being free. Yet no—the transaction would be condemned as disreputable in my country, where I have just seen a wealthy worldling lead to the altar a richly-adorned, but unwilling bride, whose heart (and he knew it) was another's. Congratulations and honor showered upon his bargain, as reprobation would on my little transaction here. Yet the only difference is, that his purchase money was in settlements, and that his purchase was a free-born daughter of proud England.

But enough of this—let us hope we all know one, who acknowledges, in practice as well as in profession, that there is a world beyond our own; who prefers his child's happiness to an additional footman, and her peace of mind to a pair of leaders. May his days be many! May his white hairs shine, like a halo, in a happy home! and, in his dying hour, may he have nothing to reproach himself with, except not having made traffic of his daughter's love. * * * *

Here 's a pretty homily about a respectable class of elderly gentlemen, with whom, thank heaven! in the course of a tolerably varied life, I have never had a dealing: nor am likely to have after this remonstrance, to look upon a man as man, not as a pocket.

I do not mean to assert that a coronet is not a most graceful appendage, and coin a most convenient element, in a marrying man; but a noble heart, and a rich intellect are not utterly valueless, but to minds devoid of both. After all, it is no affair of mine, this English heart-market; I am neither a daughter nor a father—so, peace to the good, and repentance to the evil, and let us away to the quiet Nile, for

"We have many a distant path to tread,
By pensive fancy, not by fiction led."

FRAGMENT.

Oh! come to me now, for my sorrows are past,
And the cloud on my heart is dissolv'd at last;
Spirit of Poesy, come from above,
Come, on the wings of nature and love!

Come, while the yellow light streams thro' the pane,
And the air is fresh with the morning rain,
And the wind is up with its sweet wild voice,
Like a song of sorrow that bids us rejoice.

Come, 'mid fancies gathering fast,
'Mid thoughts of the present, and thoughts of the past;
Oh! come to me now! 't is thy chosen hour,
And the spirits of evil no longer have power!

From Knight's Quarterly Magazine.

THE STOLEN KISS.

Written in a Lady's Album by the late Abraham Gen-tlian, Esq.

SMOOTH'D be that brow—and chas'd the frown
Yet gathering to thy tardy will—
Nor think to awe my raptures down,
For anger makes thee lovelier still.

In vain thou wouldst compel the ire
But lightly felt, but faintly shown;
Thine eyes betray beneath their fire
The pardon thou wouldst blush to own.

Then, still that proudly swelling breast,
Softens that lovely, mantling cheek;
'T was but a Kiss, that well express'd
The tenderness I could not speak.

I ENVY thee, thou careless wind,
So light, so wild, thy wandering,
Thou hast no earthly chain to bind
One fetter on thine airy wing;—
I envy thee, thou careless wind!

The flower's first sigh of blossoming,
The harp's soft note, the woodlark's song,
All unto thee their treasures bring,
All to thy fairy reign belong;—
I envy thee, thou careless wind!

Thy jocund wing o'er ocean roves,
An echo to the sea-maid's lay;
Then, over rose and orange groves,
Thy fragrant breath exhales away;—
I envy thee, thou careless wind!

From the Monthly Magazine.

THE ANONYMOUS LETTER.

TO WRITE an anonymous letter is ungentlemanly; of this there can be no doubt—nay more, it is mean, dastardly, skulking, depraved! But what could I do! Colonel Plinth was about to marry his cook —.

To write an anonymous letter is degrading, to say the least: it would require the skill of a sophist to render it justifiable—perhaps; and yet when Colonel Plinth was going to marry his cook—.

A vixen—a perfect Saracen of a woman behind his back; and he a man of nice honor; who had gained golden laurels at Seringapatam—an aid-de-camp to Sir David Baird—my friend! The intelligence had come like a thunder-bolt.

To write an anonymous letter, except under the most imperative circumstances, is unquestionably atrocious. I felt that, even posited as I was—with the most benevolent intentions—conscience—my conscience, as a gentleman and an officer, would hesitate to approve of it. I paused—I determined to weigh the matter well; but the conviction fell upon me like an avalanche that not a moment was to be lost!—Colonel Plinth was on the eve of marrying his cook —.

Rebecca Moggs! And he my brother-in-law—the widowed husband of my sainted sister—a K. C. B.—a wearer of four medals, two crosses, and the order of the golden fleece—a man who had received the thanks of Parliament—the written approbation of my Lord Clive—two freedoms in gold boxes:—a man who, had he nobly fell on the ramparts of Tippoo's capital, would have been taken home in rum, and buried in St. Paul's.

His fragment—his living remains—(for he possessed only one organ of a sort—having lost a leg, an arm, an eye, and a nostril)—had resolved on what I considered a sort of demi-post mortem match, with—what?

A blowy, underhung menial, whose only merit consisted in cooking mulligatawny, and rubbing with a soft, fat palm the wounded ankle of his partially efficient leg; the illegitimate offspring of a Sepoy pioneer's trull; a creature whom my lovely and accomplished sister had taken from the breast of her dead mother, (the woman—a camp-follower—received an iron ball in her brain from one of Tippoo's guerilla troops in the jungle,)—one whom Evadne had brought up, with maternal care, in her kitchen;—a scullion! And such a one to be Colonel Plinth's wife—to take the place of Evadne! Good God!

To write an anonymous letter is rather revolting; much may be said against it; it is one's dernier resort; still it has its advantages—and why neglect them! Had Colonel Plinth not been what he was—were he but a casual acquaintance or a mere friend—then indeed —

But he was my brother-in-law—my brother in arms—in a word, Colonel Plinth.

Had he been a man who would listen to reason—who was open to conviction—to whom one might venture to speak—why really —

But he was hot as curry;—yet not deficient in sense;—but dreadfully opinionated—techy—easily susceptible of feeling himself insulted—careful as to keeping his pistol-case in such a state as to be ready at a moment's notice—a being inflamed in body, soul, and complexion, by the spices and sun of the burning East.

To remonstrate with him would have been absurd; he would have cut me down with his crutch:—he had amassed three thousand a-year.

To write an anonymous letter was not exactly the sort of thing; but why see him rush into a match which would dishonor himself, and shed a sort of retrospective shame on my sainted sister!

The cook was far from immaculate. A native-servant, whom I discharged at Calcutta for repeatedly staying out all night—but why expose the weak side of humanity?

And another young fellow of her acquaintance, whom I pardoned for having robbed me, on condition of his frankly confessing all his misdemeanors—

Besides, there was Larry the trumpeter—

And one or two more.

Under such circumstances—conscious of his infatuation, I ceased to waver: the end sanctified the means; and I wrote him an anonymous letter.

She, of course, would make a point of having children—and then where were my expectations!

Evadne had never been a mother; the Colonel was the only Plinth in the universe; and, posited as I was—Evadne being the link—I naturally had expectations.

To say nothing of being nine years my senior; he was a wreck—a fiery wreck, full of combustibles, burning gradually to the water's edge.

The sun of his happiness, would, as I felt, set forever, the moment he married such a creature as Moggs—innately vulgar—repulsive—double-chinned—tumid—protuberant. Social festivity was everything to Colonel Plinth; but who would dine with him, if his ce-divant cook were to carve!—Evadne's adopted; Larry the trumpeter's love! I could n't!

Therefore, under a sense of overwhelming duty to Colonel Plinth, I wrote him an anonymous letter.

Every precaution was taken; the hand was disguised—the paper such as I had never used; and, to crown all, I dropped the important document in a distant and very out-of-the-way post-office.

Conscious of perfect security—animated by the cause I had espoused, I played away upon him, from my masked battery, with prodigious vehemence. Reserve was out of the question; in an anonymous letter, the writer, of course, speaks out; this is its great advantage. I took a rapid review of his achievements—I recalled the accomplished Evadne to his mind's eye—I contrasted her with his present intended:—Larry the trumpeter figured in, and the forcible expression as to Cæsar's wife was not forgotten. I rebuked—I argued—I ridiculed—I scorned:—I appealed to his pride—I mentioned his person. I bade him consult a cheval glass, and ask himself if the reflection were that of a would-be bridegroom. I told him how old he was—what the Indian army would think—in short, the letter carried upon the face of it the perfect conviction of a thirty-two pounder. Here and there I was literally ferocious.

I dined alone that day, and was taking my wine in the complacent consciousness of having done all in my power, when Colonel Plinth knocked. Of course I knew his knock: it was always violent; but on this occasion rather less so than usual. I felt flurried; as he ascended, my accurate ear detected a strange footstep on the stair. Hastily pouring out and gulping down a bumper, I contrived to rally before my friend entered.

Commonly his countenance was turbid—billowy—rufus—the red sea in a storm;—now it was stony,—pale—implacable; he was evidently white hot with wrath. His eye—usually lurid as that of a Cyclops at the forge—was cold—clear—icy; his look froze me—I had seen him thus before—in the breach at Seringapatam.

His salute was charmingly courteous; he begged leave to introduce a friend—Baron Cahooz, a noble Swede in the Prussian service. Never before had I beheld such a martinet—where could Plinth have picked him up?

The Baron, in very good English, expressed his concern at making so valuable an acquaintance as that of Major Mocassin under such infelicitous circumstances. Colonel Plinth had been insulted: but as I had so long been his most valued friend—as we had fought and bled on the same fields—as those arms (his right and my left) which had been so often linked together, were mouldering, side by side, in the same grave—as I was his brother-in-law, Colonel Plinth would accept of the amplest possible apology:—with any other man than Major Mocassin, Colonel Plinth would have gone to extremities at once.

I was petrified during this speech; but at its conclusion some sort of an inquiry staggered from my lips.

Baron Cahooz did not understand.

I declared myself to be in the same predicament:—would he be so good as to explain?

In reply, the Baron hinted that I must be conscious of having written Colonel Plinth a letter.

Fearing that Plinth's suspicions had been aroused, and that this was a ruse to trap me into a confession—remembering my precautions—and feeling sure that nothing could, by any possibility, be brought home to me, unless I turned traitor to myself—I denied the imputation point blank! Indeed, what else could I do?

Colonel Plinth uttered an exclamation of bitter contempt, and hobbled towards the door.

Baron Cahooz handed me his card:—nothing further could be done:—he hoped the friend whom I might honor on the occasion would see him as early as possible, in order to expedite the necessary arrangements.

I made a last effort. Advancing towards the door, where Plinth stood, I begged to protest that I was mystified—that he must be laboring under a mistake.

"A mistake!" shouted he, in that tremendous tone, which for a moment had once appalled the tiger-hearted Tippoo—"A mistake, Major Mocassin! There's no mistake, sirrah! Will you deny your own hand-writing?"

So saying, he threw the letter in my face, and retired, followed by Cahooz.

In another moment the veil was torn asunder. Having never before attempted an anonymous letter, and acting under the influence of confirmed habit, I had concluded the fatal epistle, without disguise, in my customary terms:—"Yours, ever, JOHN MOCASSIN!"

NOTE.

The foregoing paper was drawn up and sent to his cousin in Kentucky by Major Mocassin, a few hours after Colonel Plinth and Baron Cahooz had quitted him. On the inside of the envelop appears the following:—"T is now midnight—Rear Admiral Jenkinson has settled every thing with the Baron, to their mutual satisfaction; we are to be on the ground by six in the morning. If I fall—"

After considerable research, we have discovered two announcements in the public prints, which form valuable appendages to Major Mocassin's document. The first extract is from a London journal, published in 1819; the second, from a Bath paper of two years later date.

No. I.

"Yesterday, at his own residence in Wimpole street, by special license, Colonel Plinth, K. C. B., to Rebecca Louisa Moggs, a native of Masulipatam. The gallant Colonel went through the ceremony with his only remaining arm in a sling—having a few hours before exchanged shots—both of which took effect—with Major Mocassin."

No. II.

"The busy tongue of fame reports that a gallant Major, who served with distinction, and lost an arm, under Sir David Baird, in the East Indies, is about to lead to the altar the dashing relict and sole legatee of a brave and affluent brother officer, who recently died at Cheltenham. A mutual attachment is supposed to have been long in existence; for the bridegroom elect fought a duel on the lady's account, with her late husband, on the very morning of the marriage. Pecuniary motives may perhaps have influenced the fair one in giving her hand on that occasion to the gallant Major's more fortunate rival."

From the Independent Weekly Press.

The following beautiful charade is worthy of the distinguished poet whose name it signifies:

Come from my First—aye come!

The battle dawn is nigh;

And the screaming trump, and the thundering drum,

Are calling thee to die!

Fight as thy father fought,

Fall as thy father fell;

Thy task is taught, thy shroud is wrought,

So farewell!—and farewell!

Toll ye my Second!—toll!

Fling high the flambeau's light;

And sing the hymn of a parted soul,

Beneath the silent night!

The wreath upon his head,

The cross upon his breast,—

Let the prayer be said, and the tear be shed;

So—take him to his rest.

Call ye my Whole—aye call

The lord of lute and lay!

And let him greet the sable pall

With a noble song to-day.

Go, call him by his name;

No fitter hand may crave

To light the flame of a soldier's fame

On the turf of a soldier's grave.

WHEN heavenly sounds about my ears,

Like winds through Eden's tree-tops, rise—

And make me, though my spirit hears,

For very luxury close my eyes;—

Let none but friends be round about,

Who love the soothing joy like me;

That so the charm be felt throughout,

And all be harmony.

[It was said that the Queen was to have a billiard table made out of the timbers of the Royal George—on which Punch presents the following petition.]

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY :

Although of a humble stock, and although my wife, Madam Judy, has not been presented at your Majesty's court, yet we humbly declare that the whole court doth not contain two more loyal and duteous subjects.

May it please your Majesty, we are very old ; we have been in the custom of mixing for centuries past with every class of the people of this kingdom, and we are enemies to no manner of sport wherewith they amuse themselves.

Billiards, among others, is a good sport. It has the privilege of uniting many honorable gentlemen daily together of the army, of the universities, and of the swell mob, at the watering-places. It has the eminent merit of leading to the detection of many rogues and swindlers ; it keeps many ingenious markers, brandy-merchants, and soda-water venders in honorable maintenance, and is a great aid and patron of the tobacco trade, thereby vastly increasing the revenues of your Majesty's government.

With that sport then we are far from quarrelling. But there is for this and for all other games a time and place. Thus in the late Mr. Hogarth's facetious print (I knew the gentleman very well) the Beadle is represented as caning "the Idle Apprentice" for playing at marbles—no, not for playing at marbles, but playing on a grave-stone during Sunday service. In like manner, were I to set up my show before St. James's Church during service hours, or under your Majesty's triumphal arch at Pimlico, or in the Bishop of London's drawing-room—it is likely, not that the Beadle would cane me, for that I would resist, but that persons in blue habiliments, oil-skin hatted, white-lettered, and pewter-buttoned—policemen in a word, would carry me before one of your Majesty's justices of the peace. My crime would be, not the performance of my tragedy of "Punch"—but its performance in an improper manner and time.

Ah, Madame ! Take this apologue into your royal consideration, and recollect that as is Punch and marbles so are BILLIARDS.

They too may be played at a wrong place. If it is wrong to play at marbles on a tombstone, is it just to play at billiards on a coffin—an indifferent coffin—anybody's coffin ! Is such a sport quite just, feeling, decorous, and honorable !

Perhaps your Majesty is not aware, what the wreck of the Royal George really is. Sixty years ago its fate made no small sensation. Eight hundred gallant men, your royal grandfather's subjects, went down to death in that great ship. The whole realm of England was stirred and terrified by their awful fate—the clergy spoke of it from their pulpits—the greatest poet then alive wrote one of the noblest ballads in our language, which as long as the language will endure shall perpetuate the melancholy story. Would your Majesty wish Mr. Thomas Campbell to continue the work of Mr. William Cowper, and tell what has now become of the wreck ! Lo ! it is a billiard-table, over which his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville may be knocking about red balls and yellow—or his Serenity the Prince of Hohenzollen Sigmaringen may be caramboling with his coat off. Ah, Madame ! may your royal fingers never touch a cue ; it is a losing hazard that you will play at that board.

The papers say there is somewhere engraved in copper on the table, a "suitable inscription." What is it ! I fancy it might run thus :—

"THIS BILLIARD TABLE IS FORMED OF PART OF THE TIMBERS
OF THE ROYAL GEORGE MAN-OF-WAR, OF 100 GUNS,
WHICH WENT DOWN ON THE 29TH AUGUST, 1782.
EIGHT HUNDRED SEAMEN PERISHED ON BOARD,
IN THE SERVICE OF THEIR COUNTRY AND THEIR KING.
HONOR BE TO THE BRAVE WHO DIE IN SUCH A SERVICE.
AS A FITTING MARK OF HER SENSE OF THESE BRAVE MEN'S MISFORTUNES,
AS A TESTIMONY OF SYMPATHY FOR THEIR FATE,
AS AN ENCOURAGEMENT TO ENGLISHMEN
TO BRAVE THEIR LIVES IN SIMILAR PERILS, IN HOPES THAT FUTURE SOVEREIGNS
MAY AWARD THEM SIMILAR DELICATE SYMPATHY ;
ABOVE ALL, AS A STERN MONUMENT OF THE VANITY OF MILITARY GLORY,
THE USELESSNESS OF AMBITION, AND THE FOLLY OF FIDELITY, WHICH EXPECTS ANY REWARD BUT ITSELF,
HER MAJESTY, QUEEN VICTORIA, HAS GRACIOUSLY CAUSED THIS PLAY-TABLE TO BE MADE FROM THE TIMBERS OF THE FAITHFUL, USELESS, WORN-OUT OLD VESSEL."

We stop the press, to announce that the billiard-table out of the Royal George has been countermanded, and that the remaining cart-loads of timber have been purchased to decorate the new chapel at Windsor Castle.

STANZAS.

Yes—labor, love ! and toil would please,
Were toil and labor borne for thee ;
And fortune's nursing, lapped on ease,
In wealth of heart be poor to me !

Why should I pant for sordid gain ?
Or why Ambition's voice believe ?
Since, dearest, thou dost not disdain
The only gift I have to give.

Time would with speed of lightning flee,
And every hour a comfort bring,
And days and years employed for thee
Shake pleasures from their passing wing.

CAMERON.

THE LIVING AGE.

---

No. 2.—25 MAY, 1844.

---

CONTENTS.

|  | PAGE.                                  |
|--|--|
| 1. Correspondence, . . . . .                           | 66                                     |
| 2. The Tailor Creditor, . . . . .                      | Metropolitan , 67               |
| 3. Greece, . . . . .                                   | Spectator , 76                  |
| 4. The British Fleet, . . . . .                        | Blackwood's Magazine , 78       |
| 5. Life upon the Nile—Songs of the Nile—Memphis, . . . | Dublin University Magazine , 81 |
| 6. The Greenwood Shrift, . . . . .                     | Blackwood's Magazine , 85       |
| 7. Cheap Postage, . . . . .                            | Spectator , 87                  |
| 8. The Client's Story, . . . . .                       | Friendship's Offering , 87      |
| 9. Barère's Memoirs (by Macaulay,) . . . . .           | Edinburgh Review , 93           |
| 10. New Books and Reprints, . . . . .                  | 128                                    |

POETRY.

|                                 |    |
|---------------------------------|----|
| Come, gentle sleep, . . . . .   | 76 |
| Vale Crucis, . . . . .          | 76 |
| The Child's Warning, . . . . .  | 77 |
| The Family Meeting, . . . . .   | 77 |
| Village Blacksmith, . . . . .   | 86 |
| Song for the Million, . . . . . | 99 |

SCRAPS.

|                                      |    |
|--------------------------------------|----|
| Legal Examination, . . . . .         | 80 |
| Lifts for Lazy Lawyers, . . . . .    | 85 |
| To the Brothers Cheeryble, . . . . . | 92 |
| Spanish Intelligence, . . . . .      | 92 |

BOSTON :

E. LITTELL & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

---

BOSTON.—REDDING & CO.—JORDAN & CO.—HOTCHKISS & CO.
 NEW YORK.—BURGESS & STRINGER—MOWATT & CO.—SUN OFFICE.
 PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUSE & CANNING—BERFORD & CO.—ZIEBER & CO.
 BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.
 ALBANY.—W. C. LITTLE—GEORGE JONES. PORTLAND.—GEORGE COLMAN.
 CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.
 NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WE repeat the request on our first cover—that the execution of our plan may be judged of by the first volume. We shall have so much difficulty in the arrangements of our printing and publication offices, that we shall not at once be able to bring all points to bear.

Mr. Macaulay's admirable review of Barère and the French Revolution necessarily displaces many short articles which we had prepared to increase the variety of No. 2.

We especially regret the postponement of several pieces showing the great strength of the movement in behalf of the miserable women and children who are crushed beneath the cars of the English Factory System. It has defeated and alarmed the English ministry, and has great interest for the manufacturers in the United States, especially as showing how much their formidable competition is dwelt upon in the calculations of British statesmen.

It is generally agreed that the revenue of the General Government shall be derived from a duty on imports. Such an advantage as that will afford will be more than enough to enable the American manufacturer to enter the market with the English. This duty ought to be settled, and not to be left as a stock in trade to politicians. The manufacturing interest requires that this should be steady—and not that it should be high. A moderate duty will be cheerfully acquiesced in by the whole country, which will share in the pride of our own workmen and machinery.

One short article on the subject of cheap postage is all that we could get into this number. To supply a cheap and frequent communication with all parts of the country, is one of the very greatest advantages which our government could afford us. Our law-makers and officials touch this matter feebly and partially. A president, who could accomplish for us what Rowland Hill has done and is doing for England, would have earned "glory enough" for one consulship.

A young lady wishes us to give the explanation of the Enigma at page 40. She must be aware that we cannot give it privately in her own copy only—and we ought not to give it in the whole edition, because other people have not "given it up." When it appears that nobody can unriddle it, we may have a few words to say.

Our personal and other friends will be glad to hear that we sold in two days the whole edition of No. 1, and have printed a second. Should we be obliged to do this with each succeeding number, we shall be satisfied. We are especially grateful for the interest shown in the work by the good people of Boston.

From the Metropolitan.

THE TAILOR CREDITOR—BY MRS. GORE.

PEOPLE plead guilty to duns;—the word carries an air of defiance with it which they fancy becoming. But few like to talk of their CREDITORS!—a name which, by conveying a consciousness of legal responsibility, conveys also a wound to their self-love. Yet, from the moment that, by drawing breath, we incur the debt of nature, to that when the bell, tolling over our remains, conveys a pecuniary liability to our inheritors, life is a series of indebtedments. Thrice happy the man who sleeps solvent upon his pillow! But scarcely less pitiful the wretch who lays his head there absolutely debtless:—untrusted either because untrustworthy, or because unwilling to accord credit in return!

The preëminence of Great Britain among nations is ascribed by the farthest-sighted philosophers to the magnitude of her national debt; and but for the stimulus of private liabilities, where would be the best works of the best authors!—the best pictures of the best artists!—the best articles of the best magazines! The high-mettled scribbler starts off at speed on the slightest spur of a dun. The Scotch novels are in a great measure the works of the creditors of Scott: and but that I, as becomes a gentleman, have creditors of my own, how should I be able to furnish the following "Accounts" for the amusement of my readers!

It was not, however, in quite so cheerful a mood that I first conceived the project of turning their Accounts to account, causing them to repay me with interest all I happened to owe. My parents, who died when I was a schoolboy, having been what is called "unfortunate," (that is imprudent,) I was bequeathed to the guardianship of a crabbed uncle, with so small a patrimony, that I and it together seemed scarcely worth the trouble of looking after. To me, however, those three thousand pounds appeared to contain a mine of wealth; and, in my vague notions of independence, I scorned all mention of articles to attorneys, clerkships in counting-houses, apprenticeships to apothecaries; already smitten with the wild desire of becoming a man of wit and pleasure about town!

According to the privilege of uncles well to do in the world, mine called me a fool. But he had said as much of my parents when ruined by speculation; and in his house I had already begun to understand the opprobrious word, according to a lexicon especially Great British, as the synonyme of "poor." But, foreseeing myself both wealthy and wise—that is, being so great a fool as to judge myself capable of achieving wealth through my own wisdom—I snapped my fingers at my uncle, and betook myself to the lean and hungry occupation of polite scholarship. Like other enthusiastic lads to whom parental coercion has been wanting, I fancied myself a man of genius. Pactolus seemed waiting to flow through my hands; and it needed only a stroke of my poetic wand to convert the waters of oblivion into claret and champagne.

Of course, the first thing that flowed through my hands was my small fortune. Till I attained my majority, I lived upon tick; and the first act of my first year of discretion being to discharge to the last do it my obligations, established a credit much to my credit, and little to my advantage. Convinced that the efforts of my pen would enable me to strike a future balance as readily as in the present instance, by inditing a draft upon my uncle's hauteur, I persisted in the personal engagements which had converted my inheritance into a four years' income. My tragedy, my comedy, my epic, my farce, my annual, my magazine, were destined to metamorphose all future creditors into my most obedient humble servants.

Alas! the only transformation I ever witnessed in them was from creditors into duns. Perceiving me to be a man of honor by the readiness with which I discharged the illegal obligations of my minority, they set me down as soft, and became proportionably hard. By degrees mistrusted, eventually trusted no longer, there came to be a sort of poetic license in the cut and texture of my garments, such as constitutes in itself an act of bankruptcy.

Still, I was young and sanguine. As I ascended in my lodgings story above story, I was only soaring a poetical flight. I thought of Milton, of Otway, of Goldsmith, and comforted by prospective immortality, overlooked my mortal necessities. Moreover, an occasional sparkle of gold dust on the surface redoubled my faith in the latent mines below. The first time I pocketed a guinea as the guerdon of two months' hard labor in leading articles for a weekly paper, I beheld myself the founder of a future Abbotsford—a baronet—and member of parliament.

At that moment, indeed, I even forgot my creditors. But my creditors, alas! did not forget me! With all my flights, I had only attained a third pair of stairs; and steep and rickety as they were, one might have fancied them smooth as an inclined plane or the verses of Rogers, and carpeted with Axminster, so pleasant appeared the ascent to every savage in whose books I had inscribed myself pending the triumphs of my own. It seemed a mall to the brutes—a ring, a cour la reine, a prater, a chajja—for their daily exercise and delectation. My bell had a silver sound in their ears—and they came both "single spies" and in "battalions."

I paid—when I could—and at length promised to pay—when I could; an expression they seemed to hold too vague and figurative, for most of them (probably for the pleasure of possessing my autograph as a literary man) required me to say as much, and sometimes a little more, upon paper. Now, my autograph happened to be precisely that of my crabbed uncle, so that he became, for reasons of his own, desirous of withdrawing it from circulation. He was, therefore, at the trouble of collecting the first series of these offsprings of my pen, apprising me, at the same time, that my next performance of the same nature might be in the hands of the attorneys, and the unfortunate author in quod till the day of judgment, for any effort he would make towards the redemption of either.

In former days, it was held a christianly thing to release captives from thrall; and kings on their deathbeds, and ladies fair in pain or peril, used to make vows of ransom for so many victims of the Moors. But neither kings nor countesses of modern times extend their tender mercies towards the victims of sheriff's officers; and I accordingly determined that, whatever bills might be brought against me, I would give more in return. I was beginning to understand the value of my own autograph.

This resolution only increased my influx of visitors. The sneaks crowding to write their names in the porter's book of a royal giver of fêtes are not more assiduous than the little knot of uncrediting creditors who daily assured me that they were tired of having reminded me of their claims—as though I were not equally tired of hearing of them! Custom has appropriately assigned the office of dunning to the most disagreeable moment of the year:—the moment when its two ends meet, though our own do not—the days when “daylight dies” so soon after its birth, that it scarcely seems worth while for it to have come into the world—when the sun is seen as through a glass darkly, and when we emerge from our cheerless houses into the chilly atmosphere,

“The bravest holds his breath
For a time!”

In those Christmas days of darkness and desolation, the sound of single knocks is great in the land. Parallelogrammatic letters, wafer-sealed and unsightly, make their appearance at every door. Not a tyro of a clerk but seems to be learning to draw in figures. Saints and sinners unite in bidding their fellow-creatures be L.S.D.—d; and, knowing our inability before they ask, and their own ignorance in asking, request us, “at our earliest convenience,” to settle their small accounts. The world seems bent, in short, upon prolonging by weariness of spirit the brevity of the shortest day of the year!

Among mine enemies (at the period when I was beginning to comprehend the identity between an enemy and a creditor) was a certain rich man, who swore he was a very poor one, Jonas Cox by name, and a tailor by nature. Yes, by nature; for he was born a tailor, a chip of the old shop-board, a Snip of many generations. There had been as many Coxes in his cabbagery as Guelphs upon the throne of Great Britain. He was Cox VI., of Poland Street; had come into the world cross-legged, and was likely to exhibit his cross-bones in the same sartorial bearings.

Jonas Cox, I blush to own it, was my family tailor. Though his cut was such as to fully justify my cutting him, in recalling to mind how he had admeasured me for my schoolboy jackets aforetime, and annually wasted upon my crabbed uncle the assurance (so sweet in the ears of parents) that I was “growing a fine young gentleman,” when I grew to be merely a fine gentleman, I remembered the days of my youth and Jonas Cox—eschewed Stultz, Burfhart, and Buckmaster, Cooke, Jackson, and Curlewis—and left my measures to the exclusive care of Poland Street, as her Majesty those of Government to the hands of Sir Robert Peel; and so long as I could be classed among the good customers of Jonas, I was “dressed,” as dinners are promised at suburban taverns, “on the shortest notice,” and I may add, as the said dinners are not, on the longest credit.

Among the accounts discharged with interest on the attainment of my majority, was one of Cox VI.’s, which for length, if shred into tailor’s measures, would have “put a girdle round about the earth,” or the waist of Daniel Lambert;—the amount of the stamp for the receipt in full would now afford me a week’s board and lodging! Jonas Cox was, accordingly, one of those who waited longest afterwards before he requested the favor of my autograph; and it was through the importunities of the family tailor to my uncle that my signature for once held good, to be consigned to dishonor for evermore.

But on the Christmas ensuing, Jonas saw fit to deliver his bill as he had formerly delivered his suits—at the shortest notice;—ay, and to deliver it with vociferous iteration. Lest I should mistake his meaning, the second and third reading of the bill expressed only “to bill delivered”—call and deliver being the watchword of one’s thieves of creditors, as stand and deliver used to be of the footpads of more heroic times.

At length, to this single line of argument were appended half a dozen more, requesting my immediate attention to the same; receiving no answer to which, Jonas probably concluded, like the belle of a country town concerning some militia captain, that my “attentions meant nothing.” His next missive announced a visit from his clerk, who called, and called, and called again; and I, though “not at home” to his calls, of course forgot to return the visit.

Then came a letter, of orthography so much more impeachable than the preceding ones, that it was plain the old goose had taken quill in hand to defend his own cause; for he assured me it “would not suit him to wait any longer.” Next followed a lawyer’s letter!

Before it reached my lodgings, I was hundreds of miles away; gathering up a small inheritance from a maiden aunt, enabling me to satisfy Cox VI. by a large instalment, which, for nearly a year ensuing, relieved me from the further mention of his name. Last Christmas, however, arrived, in the well-known clerly hand-writing, “To balance of accounts—,” with the superaddition of the cost of a suit of nephew’s mourning, which still constitutes the customary suit of rusty black of my quotidian wear.

Mr. Jonas Cox, it appeared, had retired from business. His riches had been increasing in the same proportion as my poverty; and he was now the proprietor of a charming villa, Number 3, Elysium Road, Maida Hill. Unluckily for me, in arranging his dissolution of partnership with his son, Cox VII., what were insolently called the bad debts of the firm, fell to the share of the old man; among the rest, mine! To collect these outstanding claims, seemed to have become the recreation of his leisure. It was a pastime to him, after counting the numbers of sprigs on his Michaelmas daisies in Elysium Row, and listening all the morning to the toll of the adjacent burying-ground, to take the omnibus to town, and hunt up, in their tranquil retreats, the thirty-seven unfortunate wretches whose names still figured in his schedule. They were his game—his bagged foxes—the sports of his new gentility—the memento of his former occupation. For Cox VII. had a touch of Philip the Second in him, and did not care to have the abdicated emperor resume his sceptre in Poland Street, i. e. his scissors. Repulsed, therefore, in his old workshop,

Without the power to fill again

The desert gap that caused his pain, by the concoction of new measures, or the hatching another goose, Jonas could only become the ninth part of a man again, by the perusal and reperusal of those accursed old bills; and not only “waiting” for them, but waiting with them upon his debtors.

I have reason to think I was peculiarly favored. As I have said before, my lodgings were high,—high as his demands; and by the time the old man had panted his way up to my door, Christian charity demanded that I should offer him a chair for the recovery of his breath, pending the recovery of his money. After due discussion of the "to pay or not to pay" part of my abilities, he was about to enter into that of their literary value; first, talking of his own books, secondly, of mine. He had known me since I was breeched, and was privileged.

The privilege, I conclude, was appreciated; for instead of Christmas remaining the exclusive period for auditorial persecution, his visits beset me all the year round. The finest day in June was not secure against the intrusions of Jonas Cox. Presuming on the indulgence he had shown me, it became an understood thing between us that, though steeped to the lips in poverty and printer's ink, I was never to be denied to the retired tailor. He had acquired one-hundred-and-twenty-seven pounds' worth of right to come and sit in the sunshine of my spirit, converting it into carefulness and gloom. He loved to talk to me of my parents and their troubles, and how little they had ever expected their only son would come to live in a garret, scribbling for bread. And then he would take out his silver snuff-box, or wipe his unctuous brows with a motley bandana, as he added that "my uncle was getting stricken in years; but he feared I should be never the better for his death, his fortune being notoriously divided between public charities and the charity that begun at home in the person of his robust housekeeper."

I bore it all. Though arsenic is dirt cheap, and prussic acid far from ruinous, and Jonas Cox would have gratefully accepted any refreshment I saw fit to offer him, whether liquid or substantial, I refrained. I looked upon the old wretch as a species of materialized conscience—an embodied remorse—a monitor or tormentor entailed upon me by my expensive habits!

At length, one autumn morning, when, soon after his arrival in my poor chamber, "drizzly rain did fall," rendering it impossible for him to regain his omnibus without being soaked to his unmacintoshed skin, I saw that my day was sacrificed, and with it a brilliant article, which had been spiriting forth from my pen at the moment of his arrival, and which his doleful family allusions checked in a moment. Transpierced by the acupuncture of the tailor's needle, my balloon had fallen from the clouds "Tu me lo pagherai!" muttered I—(as the tailor had often probably muttered to himself touching his bill, as he ascended my creaking stairs!)"—"You shall furnish me with a new and original article." Why not amuse the public with what I find so little amusing—"Accounts of my Creditors!" It is only to transcribe from this caitiff's own lips one or two of the anecdotes of my thirty-six-brother-martyrs, with which he is in the habit of favoring me, to create a few of those episodes of daily life, which possess the wholesomeness and nutrition of daily bread. Why sail to America in search of the humorous and burlesque! Why ransack Europe, Asia, and Africa, for the means of "piling up the agony" high enough! Why tax the violation of every law of the decalogue as a source of emotion, while the matter-of-fact narratives of a low-minded fellow like Jonas Cox contain all the elements of human passion! I am perhaps investing his stories with the coloring of my own imagination. But I remember I had sometimes a hard matter to gulp down my tears while he narrated such stories to me as the following.

"Yesterday was a mighty pleasant day to me," observed the old tailor, that rainy morning, as he sat slowly chafing his knees beside my fire. "Yesterday, sir, I recovered a debt even more desperate than yours, a matter of forty pounds, which I had given up as a bad job. Much such a case, indeed, as your own; a family I had worked for, partly for love, partly for money, these fifty years; I and my father, Jacob Cox, afore me. People well to do in the world were those Fosters! The grandfather, a rich merchant, with a substantial house in Bedford Row, and everything comfortable about him: so that it was a pleasure when his family coach and fat coach-horses, looking like emblems of peace and plenty, stopped at my door. I loved to measure his men for their liveries! There was a world of good living, sir, in their dimensions. The body coachman and gouty old footman must have weighed together nigh forty stone.

"He had two sons, had the old gentleman—likely little fellows as you'd wish to see, in their sugarloaf-buttoned jackets, and nankeen trousers; and by the time I had to stand on tiptoe while trying them on, young men of what is called the highest promise. Old Foster could n't be worth less than a hundred thousand pounds; and as he had only a couple of daughters to provide for in addition to his handsome sons, (one, at least, of whom was sure of his share in the house of business,) they might be considered as easy for life. I, God knows, considered them so; and was always careful to comply with their whims, and be punctual to their orders. Besides, they were good-looking youths, who did honor to my shop. You may not think it of much moment, sir, but I can tell you we tailors love to work for a man who is as well made as his coat!

"You see the fat footman and fat coachman were apt to gossip of their master's affairs, when they came about their plush waiscoats and velveteens, as servants, whether fat or lean, are apt to do; more especially about Christmas time, when the family accounts being sent in, family tradesmen are obliged to stand a glass or two as a token of respect to the servants' hall; and it was the opinion of old Foster's people that he would divide the property between his two sons, leaving the eldest to succeed him in his business.

"The young men, however, were not equally favorites with the old servants. There was no end of faults to be found with Master Harry, or, as he was now beginning to be called, 'Mister Henry!'—Mister Henry kept them up late at nights—Mister Henry was himself late of mornings—Mister Henry required more brushing of coats and polishing of boots than any ten Mister Henries in the land. Mister Henry professed that he would sooner walk ten miles in the rain than undergo the penance of the family coach; and Mister Henry had even been heard to speak disparagingly of the home-brewed of Bedford Row!—whereas the elder-born, the hope of the house, was a model young man—early to bed and early to rise—unimpeachable in morals, and so far from giving three pair of boots a day to be warmed, much addicted to gaiters. Yet such is the perversity of human nature, sir, that Henry was ten to one the favorite. The fat footman used to perjure his precious soul in trying to conceal from the old gen-tieman the indecent hours of the young scapegrace!

"John Foster, the elder brother, did his best, as perhaps in duty bound, to prevent his father from being deceived on such points. For it was doubtless for Henry's good, that he should be duly reprov'd; and though it was likely enough to banish him from the old gentleman's good books to learn that he was getting pretty deep into other people's, his brother took care that the amount of his debts should be no secret in Bedford Row.

"Don't suspect me, sir, of having aided or abetted this. I protest to you that, from the time the young gentleman lived upon an allowance, many was the Christmas I let pass without doing more than add up in my books the account of Mr. Henry. For I knew well enough, from the hints of the fat footman, that if ever so much sent in, it would n't be paid; so where was the use of bothering him? The family bill was, as usual, duly settled. John Foster used to pay ready money for his goods, for the sake of discount; and with such steady customers in the house, the less need to fret at the backwardness of the younger son.

"And to say the truth, like the old servants, I felt something of a weakness in favor of that young man! He was so good-looking, so affable, so pleasant,—he had such a way with him, as the saying is, that all his little faults were readily excused. For, as bad a paymaster as he was, and though I seldom sent him home a coat that he did n't tell my foreman my quizzical cuts made him the laughing-stock of his acquaintance, I liked his sauciness full as well as the dryness of the ready-money chap, who took discount, and gave neither praise nor blame. My wife used often to scold me, when she saw how Henry Foster's bill was running up; and swore she'd have it made out and sent in to his father. But I pacified her by assuring her he would pay me in the lump; and bade her take care how she slew the old goose in Bedford Row, for the sake of a few golden eggs.

"However, in time, the young jackanapes made me ashamed of my own indulgence; for, (will you believe it!) he had the face to come to me one evening, pale as ashes and with scarcely breath to speak, and entreat me to put my name to a bill for him! He had got into trouble, and assured me it would ruin him with his father if the circumstances transpired. A pretty joke, truly, was n't it, for the name of Jonas Cox of Poland Street, to be essential to the credit of Mr. Henry Foster, of Great St. Helen's and Bedford Row?"

"You complied then, with his request?" said I, in some amazement.

"If I did," rejoined the old snip, (apparently alarmed lest I should ground expectations upon his weakness,) "the matter occurred five-and-twenty years ago, or more,—and, thank goodness, I am older and wiser now! Even then, I would n't have had my wife know that I'd put my foot into it to the tune of three hundred pounds, for double the money!"

"You lost it, then? They came upon you for the amount of the bill?"

"On the contrary, some days before 't was due, Harry Foster walked into my shop,—had his account added up before him,—and without so much as examining the items, gave me a cheque upon his banker for the sum total of the whole!—'Old Cox,' said he, 'you are a trump!'—or words to that effect.—'The assistance you rendered me was invaluable, and I can't better prove my gratitude than by wiping off old scores. I've had a run of luck, old fellow, and look upon you as the origin of my change of fortune.'

"And he literally threw a guinea to my son Elias, sir, then a little boy in petticoats, playing with the pattern-book in a corner of the shop. You may believe how I crowed over my wife, as I wrote 'Settled' at the foot of the long account about which she had jeered me so often.

"And now, sir, she began to jeer me, forsooth that, having lost my debtor, I should certainly lose my customer. No such thing. Mr. Henry gave me an order not a week afterwards; and, indeed, found only half the fault he was used to do, seeing that he was in better humor with himself and all the world.

"He was, in fact, in plaguy good humor with himself. For he was in love, sir, and fancied himself beloved in return; and few things put a young man in finer conceit with his own merits. I could see, whenever he entered my shop, that he seemed to walk two inches taller than formerly; nor could he forbear casting a glance at himself in the swing-glass as he went by, which before he had never noticed. All this did not surprise me; for I had already learned from the fat footman, that instead of coming in late of nights, Mr. Henry had ceased to come in at all!

"One day, my wife accosted me before I had crossed the threshold, on my return home from waiting upon a customer,—(and now I call to mind, sir, the customer was neither more nor less than your own good uncle,)—she accosted me, I say, with an exclamation of 'Here's a pretty kettle of fish!—What'll you say now, Cox, to the doings of your paragon in Bedford Row!'

"Mr. Henry!" cried I, aghast. 'What has happened to him? What has he been about?'

"It has happened to him to be turned out o' doors by his father!" replied my wife. 'And right enough too!—A young gentleman of his prospects to go and marry a play-actress!—Ay! you may well hold up your hands and eyes—'t is no more than every other soul has done belonging to him. But all too late! The mischief's done; and I find from the old Bedford Row coachman, (who's been sitting here as down in the mouth as though he'd buried his wife,) that the moment the news was carried to old Foster by his precious son John, the old man gave his malediction to Henry, forbade him the house, and, what was worse than all, scratched his name out of his will!"

"On inquiry, all this news, strange as it was, proved true. The clandestine marriage of the young man had been discovered through the interference of his brother; and old Foster, whose opposition might have been overcome perhaps had his son shown confidence in his indulgence, could not forgive having been imposed upon. As my wife announced, he had actually cursed and disinherited his favorite child!

"I could n't help feeling a little curious to learn how the poor young fellow was getting on in his troubles. But when I inquired in Bedford Row, nobody knew a word concerning him, and few had courage to mention his name. For my part, I did n't like to inquire. Having a small account against him, I was afraid Mr. Henry might fancy, if he found that Cox the tailor was inquiring after him, that I wanted payment of my bill; so I let months, and even the year slip on, without so much as asking a question; yet, I vow to goodness, I was almost as much vexed as if I had taught out one of my children in a lie or a theft, whenever I thought of that fine gentlemanly young man having thrown himself away on a play-acting miss, some impudent, ranting jade, who had trapped him afore he knew what he was about.

"It was nigh two years after the bad news first reached me, that I received a note from Mr. Henry, begging me to call, when convenient, at a number he gave me in an obscure street, bordering on Long Acre. Poor fellow! A momentary expectation which had beset me, on seeing his handwriting, that I was going to receive the amount of my small bill against him, disappeared in a moment. Poverty breathed from every line of that short note.

"Nevertheless, I was not an atom prepared for the aspect of poverty that really met my eyes on entering his lodgings. The sitting-room was much about the size of this, sir, opening into a bed-room, which was also a nursery, as the sitting-room served equally the purpose of a kitchen. Yet wretched as it all was for a gentleman brought up like Mr. Henry, I promise you there was nothing disgusting or unsightly in the arrangements. All was so neat, so clean, so orderly. The little cradle, placed beside the tidy white bed, looked so cosy, and the few books ranged on the console, and the writing-desk on the table, reminded me so much of the Master Harry of former days, (in whose handsome bed-room in Bedford Row, reading and writing materials always had their place,) that, strange as it might seem to find the opulent young man reduced to such neediness, I never a moment doubted that I had found my way right, and that these were indeed Henry Foster's lodgings.

"And yet, when I came to see him, that is, when he made his appearance out of the bed-room to meet me, his person was ten times more altered than his condition! I could scarce have believed the lapse of three years capable of inscribing so many lines in a human face. His hair was thinned, his smile (for he did smile at seeing me) was ghastly! Still he tried to speak cheerfully, and hailed me as 'Jonas, my old boy!' as he used, in his better days. But there was something painful in the distance between those gay words and the hollow voice in which they were uttered. For my part, I tried to answer him more respectfully than ever.

"He made me sit down,—but that he was always used to do when I waited upon him in Bedford Row, if not ready to attend to me on my arrival; and though, perhaps, I had better have held my tongue, I could not forbear telling him how it made my old heart ache to find him in so poor a place.—'A poor, but not a sad one, I promise you!' was his cheerful reply; though the smile he had called up to welcome me had already vanished. 'I have treasures here, Jonas, I never possessed in Bedford Row,—treasures such as any man might be proud of!'

"And immediately he glided back into the inner room, and brought back in his arms a beautiful boy of two years' old,—one of those curly-headed, blue-eyed creatures, that painters put into their pictures, and which one sees so seldom in real flesh and blood. The child put out one of its dimpled hands towards me at its father's desire, but only nestled the closer to him for seeing a stranger in the room; and the round, rosy, smiling face leaning against the countenance of the care-worn man, served to make its leanness more apparent.

"'Baby's asleep!' lisped the little fellow into his father's ear; upon which Mr. Henry hastily explained to me that on my entrance he was sitting in the other room with his wife, who had only been confined a fortnight.

"'I make a capital nurse, Jonas, as you may see,' continued he, again attempting a ghastly smile. 'One never does anything half so well as the accomplishments one learns and practises of one's own accord. And, God knows, I ought to exert myself as a nurse during Emma's sickness; for, when well, not a finger will she ever allow me to stir in assistance of our little household. I did not choose an heiress, Cox, my boy, as my brother John has done,—nor a fine lady, as my sisters wished me;—but, if a frugal, laborious, virtuous, forbearing, tender wife be a crown of rubies, I have got it, if ever man had!'

"It was a pleasure to hear him speak so; and the neatness and orderliness of his poor home certainly said much in confirmation of his words. Still, I could not forbear inquiring why he made no advances towards a reconciliation with his family.

"'Advances!' cried he, 'Can you suppose that, with these dear ones around me wanting all but bread, I have not humiliated myself to the utmost! I have submitted to be repulsed, insulted, threatened; and when, on my last application to my father for even a trifling assistance, he sent me word that "my wife had better go on the stage again, and earn a maintenance for her brats!"—then, then indeed, I swore as great an oath as my father had already sworn never to see my face again, that rather should my children starve before my face than I would address myself further to my family.'

"'It is all Mr. John's doing!' muttered I, incautiously.

"'My brother and sisters have not stood my friends!' replied young Foster. 'But had there been in my father's heart any real parental tenderness towards me, would the fact of my choosing a wife otherwise than he desired, (more especially when he came to know that wife as all that is truest and best in womanly nature,) determine him to cast off the son of his loins! No, no, Cox, my boy! My father always preferred John. John's sober, business-like ways, and almost sneaking submission, engrossed his affections, and I am reaping the harvest on't. The old gentleman wanted an excuse for leaving his fortune to my brother, so as to keep up untarnished the magnitude of the house of business and the family name. I'll tell you what, Cox! the Almighty counted too largely upon the instinct of parental love, (often no stronger in human beings than in the beasts that perish.) when he omitted among his laws to enjoin that the children who are required to honor their father and their mother should be repaid with love in return. If the old man had cared a straw for me, Cox, do you fancy he could bear to think of me—me, whom he had nurtured so tenderly, laboring with the labor of my hands, and laboring with the still bitterer apprehension that my wife and children may lack and suffer hunger?'

"I suppose my young friend discovered by the expression of my countenance that I was puzzling myself how to bring out an offer of such poor assistance as I was able to render; for he suddenly started up with a change of countenance, and, while depositing the child on the hearthrug, exclaimed.

"Not that I am in any immediate necessity! I have work in hand that will place me comparatively at ease—copying, for a house in the city"—(and he pointed to several quires of MS. lying beside his open desk)—"which, when finished and paid for, will make me rich for months to come. It would have been done a week ago but for poor Emma's illness. She has no other nurse; and though requiring less attendance than woman ever did, my children constantly call me from my desk."

"I now found courage and words to express a wish that he would at least permit me to advance him a portion of the forthcoming payment."

"No, no, no!" cried he. "I have no need of any such act of kindness, which I don't the less feel as it deserves. The worst is over now; we have struggled through the hardest time; Emma is safe, and I have scarcely a care remaining"—and again he smiled one of those terrible smiles. "The service I really want you to do me, Cox," continued he, "is to make me a good warm frieze coat, that will enable me to sit up without a fire these bitter nights. I write late—I am forced to write late—and the remains of my wardrobe, such as they are, afford nothing solid enough for my purpose. You used to work for a fine gentleman, Cox, and worked accordingly; now you must give me something strong and coarse, that will resist time and weather. But 'tis not the article of which I am in fear;—tell me—are you afraid to trust me?"

"I replied that I was very much hurt at his asking the question, and, without further words, went straight home, and set my men at work so close, that next morning I was able to take home to Mr. Henry the warmest and best turned-out beaver wrapping coat that ever you set your eyes upon! (I wish I'd seen another beside me this very moment, to keep me from the rain on my way to the omnibus!) And that was n't all. With my wife's help, sir, I managed to turn out a little greatcoat of fine cloth for the boy, and asked his father's acceptance of it in such terms that he could n't be affronted, reminding him of the guinea he had thrown to Elias when playing in the corner of my shop. I thought there came tears in Mr. Henry's sunken eyes as I alluded to the matter; but he said, in a low voice, he remembered nothing about it."

"However, he showed his thankfulness in a way that pleased me, for he led me into the sick room, where his wife was sitting up for the first time with her infant in her arms, looking so pale and delicate that it seemed wonderful she could be alive; and 'Emma, my dear,' said he, bending down to her, 'this is old Cox, of whom you have heard me speak so often, as having stood my friend in the first scrape I ever got into. He has been kind enough to make this warm little coat for Henry. See! it fits as though you had made it yourself!'"

"And partly through weakness, and partly through the pleasure of seeing her beautiful child so respectably dressed, the poor thing burst into tears. So, while her husband was pacifying her, and removing the babe from her arms into the cradle, I slipped down stairs, and left them together. I can't tell you, sir, what a heartache I carried with me out of that house!"

"For me, Jonas Cox, a poor tailor working for the maintenance of his own family, to think of rendering assistance to the son of an old hunk with five thousand a year, would have been ridiculous. So I set about considering how I could get some of these matters made known to Mr. Foster, who, I felt sure, was partly kept in the dark. I bethought me, therefore, of the old ton of a coachman, and portly footman, who always seemed to love Master Harry as though he were a child of their own; and away I trudged to Bedford Row, to see what could be done toward reaching the ear of their master. Bless your soul! the knocker was tied up. The old gentleman had undergone a dreadful operation for some inward tumor, (I think, from his conduct, it must have been in his heart!) and wasn't to be spoken to even by the surgeons. Next day, sir, he died!"

"Leaving of course, only the will by which your young friend was disinherited!"

"Worse and worse! (that there should be such men in the world and call themselves Christians!) leaving his whole fortune to his eldest son, and annuities to his daughters—on the express condition that neither of them rendered the smallest assistance to their brother Henry;—in which case, being proved, the property was to be paid over, by trustees appointed for the purpose, to create a new ward in one of the city hospitals;—unless (for, unrelenting as he was, old Foster seemed disposed to leave a loophole for Henry's escape,) unless he chose to break off the infamous connexion he had formed, and resume his place in his brother's house of business, when he was to receive an annuity of eight hundred per annum, with the power of settling three thereof upon the actress and her offspring."

"It would appear, then, that the old gentleman did not believe in the reality of their marriage!"

"John Foster took care of that! The father's severity had purported only to bring his son to terms, and he actually died believing that, in time, Harry would grow weary of his disreputable habits, and, having secured a provision for his mistress, end his days in decent competence. The cunning brother of course knew better; having so dictated the phrasing of his father's will as to render compliance on Henry's part as impossible as any concession on his own. By an act of fiendish foresight, therefore, the young man's ruin was ir retrievable!"

Just at that moment, a brightening, or rather diminished gloom of the atmosphere, induced old Cox to toddle to the window, in hopes the weather was clearing up. Not an umbrella was perceptible! and he accordingly began to button up his coat and talk of being too late for the omnibus. I persuaded him, however, that, unless his soles were caoutchouced, the streets were still too wet to venture, and recited anecdotes of recent colds and fatal sorethroats, all occurring to hale old gentlemen of sixty-eight or thereabouts, which pinned him anew to his chair, and insured me the sequel of the melancholy story, in which I was deeply interested.

"You did not, I am sure, lose sight of these unfortunate people!" said I, remembering that, in my own case, Cox VI. exhibited a remarkable adhesiveness to the unfortunate.

"Indeed I did!" cried he, "though by no free will of my own. When the time of payment of his copying came, (though in the midst of the bitterness arising from the scandalous will of his father,) Henry Foster called upon me to offer the price of the frieze coat; and a hard matter I had to make him keep back the full sum till better times."

"Better times are coming, I trust, my kind old friend!" said he. "By the recommendation of a kinsman of my wife, I have obtained a clerkship in a government office at Plymouth. My salary of a hundred and thirty pounds a year will be riches to us, and the post is a rising one. I am as happy at this moment as the sense of ill-usage at the hands of those once nearest and dearest to me will allow. But no matter; I have those, thank God, who are nearer and dearer still; who will never desert me, never calumniate me, never persecute me! And what can I want more?"

"And he wept like a child as he took leave of me, and thanked me for my kindness. Perhaps I had better have let the matter rest so; but for the life and soul of me, I could not sleep again till I had called at his lodgings, and ascertained whether the little family had need of further service on the eve of such a removal. Henry Foster was out, and I saw only his wife;—such a wife, sir!—such a woman! I never heard a voice like hers, or saw such a face. There was something painful in their sweetness—more especially when she talked of her husband, and how it was impossible for her to repay his having stooped to a thing like her; and how, instead of being peevish with her as having caused his ruin by her fatal affection, he continued to love and serve her as though she were the greatest lady in the land! She did not shed a tear while she told me the melancholy history of their courtship and early struggles; but there was a sound as of tears past in every word she uttered. And then, the lady's face seemed made of shadows; no color, and yet it did not appear pale. I have seen wild flowers in the fields look just so—that is, so delicate of hue that one could not say whether they were white or tinted."

I could scarcely forbear a smile at finding even old Jonas Cox grow poetical under the influence of youth and beauty. But the ex-tailor soon descended to matter of fact;—apprized me that his offers of service were civilly declined, that the Fosters paid all, or nearly all, their liabilities on quitting London, and gradually, by instalments, satisfied the rest.

"With so many other matters to think of, I soon lost all remembrance of them," resumed the old man. "John Foster, who was now established in a handsome house in Portland Place, knew better than to have his fine liveries made by the snob who had provided those of his father. The young ladies married, and one of them died. The family was broken up and dispersed. The fat coachman kept a public house in the Borough; the fat footman was in an infirmary. I ceased, in short, to hear the smallest mention of the name of Foster; unless when, once a year, I proposed carrying my boy Elias to one of the playhouses, to see the pantomime; when my good woman was sure to observe that no good ever came of going to playhouses;—'For instance,' she would add, 'look at your old favorite, poor Mr. Henry Foster!—And what was I to answer?'"

"Well, sir, about five or six years after all I have been telling you of, late one summer evening, just at the time that London is so wild with business and pleasure,—and it seems as if poor folks could never work fast enough, or rich folks be sufficiently idle,—and, having more than a dozen suits of uniforms, liveries, and court-dresses, to send home for the birthday, (which fell then upon the 4th of June,) I had just offered extra wages to my men to work all night, when I heard the voice of a servant-maid inquiring whether that was the house of Mr. Jonas Cox, the tailor.

"I answered her myself, and pretty sharply; for I did not understand, at that time of day, any servant of a respectable family being ignorant of my house of business—fifty years established on the same spot, sir, as no one knows better than yourself. But I soon saw 't was a country lass I had to deal with; and, in answer to my reprimand, she put into my hand a bit of paper, on which was written,—'Mrs. Henry Foster, Crown Inn, Holborn.'"

"Missus says, sir, she would be very glad if you could make it convenient to call to-night," said the girl.

"Impossible, child—quite impossible!—I am overwhelmed with business!" cried I, already out of sorts with the harassing labors of a sultry day, and the prospect of a busy night before me. "But pray tell her, with my compliments, I will do my best to be with her before to-morrow evening." And the girl, already terrified by the severity of my first address, had not courage to reply, but hurried out of the shop.

"Next day, I was well nigh forgetting my appointment. But my son, who had heard it made,—more, I believe, by way of getting rid of me out of the workshop for an hour, than for any other reason,—reminded me of it as evening drew on; and off I started for Holborn. A fine summer evening it was; and right thronged were the streets of the populous part of the town I had to traverse,—all the shopkeepers at their open doors, to enjoy a breath of air, and the workmen whistling their way homewards for joy, as the birds sing in the country in summer weather. I had got rid of the crossness produced by over-work and fault-finding, by the time I reached Holborn, and was beginning to rejoice at the idea of seeing once more the young couple in whom I had taken so strong an interest. In the interval, all had thriven with me!—my business was doubled—my family prosperous. I was in hopes of hearing as much of the Fosters in return!

"The inn,—(they had probably stopped there with the coach on their arrival from Plymouth,)—was a narrow-fronted, noisy, gloomy-looking place; and when I shoved my way into the crowded passage, such mingled smells of gas, rum, and tobacco, reeked from the tap within, that I wondered how, on so close an evening, a multitude of human beings could find pleasure in such an atmosphere. I had some difficulty in making my request to see Mrs. Foster audible to a tawdry-looking, red-faced woman, who was serving at the bar. But as soon as she did understand, a dirty urchin was called from the tap and desired to conduct me up stairs; and up stairs, accordingly, we groped, flight after flight, till, on reaching a skylight, through which the remains of a crimson sunset still glimmered, I saw the lad who showed me the way take off his oilskin cap, almost respectfully, as he approached a door, as rickety as all the rest of the premises, which seemed as though the rumble of any heavily-laden dray passing the gate would shake it into a heap.

"The corpse lies there, sir," said the boy; and so startled was I by the word, that I stood listening to his retreating footsteps down the creaking stairs, instead of opening the door. At length I took courage to tap,—and again and louder, till I found myself bidden to 'come in.'

"As well as I could judge by the glimmering light within, no one was stirring in the chamber but the servant-maid who had come in search of me the preceding night; who, meeting me at the foot of the curtainless bed, laid her hand upon my arm, and pointing to it, whispered me to be silent. On that bed lay two human forms; the one, stiff and stretched, with a sheet drawn tight over the rigid limbs; the other, flung down helplessly beside it, hiding her face in the pillow,—not sleeping, for, from time to time, convulsive sobs burst from the bosom of the widow.

“‘Why did you not tell me last night how it was with her?’ said I, addressing the girl.

“‘Please to come into the room, sir, where the little boys are abed and asleep,’ said she, leading me away, as if apprehensive of telling her sad tale in presence of her poor mistress. And having conducted me into the adjoining closet she called a room, (where on a flock pallet lay two little fellows locked in each other’s arms) she told me that her master had expired only the preceding night;—that when she came to fetch me, he was yet alive.

“‘Master had a great wish to see you, sir,’ said the girl, whose tears fell bitterly as she told the doleful story of his last moments. ‘He was much disappointed, poor gentleman, when he heard that you had spoken harshly, and refused to come. Master suffered much, sir, in his last moments, but was patienter than a lamb. And now, please God, he is in a better place.’

“‘I gradually drew from the girl that the Fosters had been a fortnight in town; that poor Mr. Henry had long been declining, suffering from the same inward malady, it was thought, which had carried off his father. He was recommended to go through an operation, and came to London for the purpose, bringing with him a letter of recommendation from the Plymouth Commissioners to one of our eminent army surgeons. But the fatigue and exertion of the journey, accompanied by his family, whom he could not be prevailed upon to leave behind, brought his malady to a crisis. Since his arrival he had never risen from the bed into which he was moved on quitting the coach; and though in daily hopes that the morrow might effect some improvement in his state, he had gradually sunk. All that remained of my gifted young friend lay under the coarse sheet of an inn garret, in the adjoining room!

“‘What will become of poor missus I know not!’ sobbed the girl. ‘She has not a friend in this town. The money master brought here is running short. I heard the undertaker inquiring of the landlord who was to be responsible for the funeral expenses—’

“‘I am afraid your poor mistress was cut to the soul, my good girl, by my refusing to come!’ cried I, interrupting her.

“‘Bless you, sir, she has taken no notice of any mortal thing since, after assisting me to lay out the body, she threw herself down beside it. She let the undertakers come and measure it, as she lay there, without so much as seeing them.’

“‘Ah, this was dreadful to think of, sir,’ continued the old tailor, shuddering at the remembrance; ‘and, moreover, it happened at a moment when I had a hard matter to command time and thought for even my own business. But this seemed business which the Almighty had thrown in my way, and it was not for me to refuse it; so I did my best. I saw the landlord, I saw the undertaker, that very night; and the servant-girl being strange in London, and scarce fit for such a charge, I sent for the good woman who used to nurse my own wife, and put her in charge of children, mother,—ay, and him who was no more. Next day, the young widow was better able to commune with me; and when she heard all I had done, would fain have gone down on her poor knees to thank me. Unknown to me, however, she took strength and courage to write to her late husband’s employers, acquaint them with his untimely end, and request the means of laying him decently in the grave.

“‘Twenty pounds was forwarded by return of post; a sum that just sufficed to clear the expenses of the family at the inn, and procure a grave for the departed. I attended the grave as chief mourner. We buried him in St. Andrew’s churchyard, on a bright June morning, when even the London sky looked blue and gladsome; and as I stood beside that humble grave, holding in each hand one of the poor, sobbing, terrified orphans, whom the mother insisted should see their father laid in the ground, I could scarce forbear contrasting that miserable consignment of dust to dust, with the fine pageant proceeding at t’other end of the town,—a mob of embroidered foplings crowding to court, full of cares and strifes of their own creation,—while in the silent earth at my feet, the wicked ceased from troubling and the weary were at rest!

“‘The funeral had been hurried, at the wish of the landlord,—because in a house of public entertainment the presence of a corpse is injurious. Otherwise, I should have done my best to persuade the widow to attempt an appeal to her rich brother-in-law. John Foster, restricted only as regarded his living brother, could not have refused to bestow upon him a more appropriate interment. But when I hazarded a hint on the subject, she would not hear of any communication with her brother-in-law; nor would she have allowed her husband’s remains to be laid in the family vault.

“‘You have done me the greatest favor man could do!’ said she. ‘You have attended him to his last home. You have put his boys into decent mourning for their father’s burial. These things shall I remember to my dying day. But for mercy’s sake, suggest to me no charities from John Foster!’

“‘Forced to return to Plymouth to wind up her affairs, an offer was made her by the employers of poor Mr. Henry to get her sons into the government free school, if she found it convenient to settle on the spot. But in the interim, it occurred to me to apprise John Foster of the melancholy event, without violating my promise to the widow; and I accordingly inserted in the newspapers a notice of Mr. Henry’s death at the Crown Inn, Holborn, as ‘son to the late John Foster, of Bedford Row, of the eminent firm of Foster and Sons, Great St. Helen’s.’ My expectations were verified. Apprehensive that further publicity might be given to the case, Dives hurried to the wretched scene of his poor brother’s last moments; and on learning from the landlord by whom his funeral had been attended, condescended to find his way to my long-forgotten shop.

“‘I am ashamed to own, sir, that I felt as proud as a prince when I saw the pitiful figure he cut as he inquired into the circumstances of his poor brother’s death. I promise you I did not spare him an inkling. I could scarcely, indeed, refrain from exclaiming to him, ‘Cain, Cain!—where is thy brother?’

“‘Not to weary you with details of our various interviews, suffice it that I so mediated between him and the proud widow, that, though for herself she positively refused all assistance, she suffered a portion of their grandfather's fine fortune to be devoted to the maintenance and education of the boys. I persuaded her that this was less humiliating than to see them the objects of a public charity.

"Well for them that I did so! For within the year, that heart-broken woman followed her young husband to the grave; and then, what would have become of the orphans! Moreover, God in his justice had stricken with barrenness the bed of the rich man; and young Harry is now pretty sure to succeed to the inheritance of which his father was defrauded. There is a Providence above all, sir; and John Foster (like the Scottish usurper in that terrible play which Kemble used to act in my boyhood) had committed crimes in order to acquire a fortune which he had neither chick nor child to inherit!

"But what has all this to do," cried I, "with the recovery of your debt! Did not the rich man of Harley Street book up with you to the last farthing, after your noble conduct to his brother?"

"He would have doubtless done so, had I put forward a demand. But when the negotiations were concluded between him and the widow, she exacted a promise from me that I would never allow that bad man to contribute to the last wants of him who was gone; undertaking to pay me, within the year, with the fruit of her own labors. I gave her my word, and am satisfied she would have kept hers, had she not been taken from this world by a summons no man may gainsay. After her death, sir, there was delivered to me a packet in her hand-writing, enclosing one which her dying words charged me to remit to her eldest boy, on his attaining twelve years old.

"Trust me still, my kind old friend!" wrote the widow; "trust me in my grave! My son shall redeem my pledge. Harry will still pay you for the mourning suit he wore at the burial of his father."

"I thought no more of all this, sir, except to lay by the packet till the appointed time." For I knew the young gentlemen were reared and educated as they ought to be,—that is, as became the high worldly position of the uncle by whom they had been adopted. But when the time came appointed by Mrs. Henry's injunctions, I did not shrink from my duty, but betook myself to Harley Street; and with some difficulty obtained access to Master Foster, who was just arrived from Eton for the holidays.

"And such a noble-looking lad; even handsomer than his poor father at the same age! When he received me (in the showy dining-room of his uncle, who was absent in the city at his business, and now a widower,) I could scarcely bring to my belief that this was the same little fellow to whom I had presented the blue pelisse in Long Acre, ten years before. I thought him a little stiff at first,—perhaps a little proud. But it was only shyness. For when I placed his mother's packet in his hand, the color disappeared from his face, and he trembled like a leaf; and, after reading her letter to an end, threw himself in tears into my arms, and even kissed the cheeks of the old tailor, as he would have done those of a relation!"

"A relation?—Say rather of a benefactor!"—cried I, deeply moved.

"And then, such loads of questions as he asked me, concerning the miseries of his parents, (not of their wrongs—to them the mother had wisely refrained from recurring!) and the place where his father was laid,—and—and—. But the last thing he said vexed me! It was to implore a renewal of my money engagements with his mother. 'The debt is a sacred one, and now, mine to discharge,' said the little fellow, with a spirit far beyond his years. 'Promise me that you will never accept payment from my uncle!'

"It was not hope of the lucre of gain that brought me hither, Master Foster," said I. And then, seeing I was hurt, the poor lad flung his arms around my neck again; and went and fetched his brother Alfred, a more mettlesome but not less handsome boy than himself, to make my acquaintance; telling him I had been the friend of their parents,—at one time, indeed," added Henry, 'their only, only friend!'

"From that day, I am convinced those two poor young gentlemen must have laid by every guinea of their pocket-money and presents, to accomplish the sacred purpose pointed out by their mother; and for a schoolboy in their condition of life to abjure the indulgences enjoyed by his playmates, is a sacrifice greater than the greatest sacrifices of a man. Right earnest, however, were they in their purpose; for three years afterwards, I received a purse containing sixteen guineas,—in pocket-pieces, new guineas, and a five-pound note, which I afterwards found was a token from Mr. Foster to his elder nephew, on his obtaining high honors in the school. I wanted to return the money to them; but they would not hear of it. Only Master Henry requested my indulgence at present for the remainder, as they wished to devote the next portion of their savings to placing a stone in St. Andrew's churchyard, over the grave of their father.

"Yesterday, sir—(I am at last bringing the two ends of my story to meet)—yesterday, sir, as I was tying up my dahlias in my little garden in Elysium Place, a smart cab stopped at the door, and a little tiger jumping down, (and, by the way, I never saw a better cut livery since I handled a needle!) inquires of me, 'whether, that was the residence of Mr. Jonas Cox?'—So startled was I, that I could scarce answer intelligibly; for on going to the gate, I saw there was a coronet on the harness, and two young gentlemen in the cab.

"Wait for me a moment," said the youngest of them (a mere lad) to his companion; and in a moment he had lifted the garden latch, and (no doubt to the surprise of the tiger) was shaking me heartily by the hand, and asking me for a few minutes' conversation in the house.

"You don't remember me, I'm sure," said he; 'I'm Alfred Foster. You must have noticed my being gazetted, last month, into the Guards! I've been to Poland Street—I was there a week ago—but being on guard since, and much engaged, could not find my way here before. A draft upon Cox and Greenwood, my good friend,' he continued—placing a paper in my hand. 'But don't fancy that because this makes money matters straight between us, Harry or I shall ever lose sight of our obligations. You would do us a favor, my dear Mr. Cox, by using this trifle for our sakes, said he, placing in my hands a handsome snuff-box, that bore an inscription I scarce could read for the tears in my eyes! (I would have brought it with me, sir, this morning, if I had looked forward to the pleasure of this long chat with you ; though I should be almost ashamed to show you the flattering words inscribed in 't!) Before I could say a word in answer to the dear young gentleman, or so much as offer him a receipt in full, (as I doubtless ought,) he was off. Away rolled the cab along the road to Maida Hill ; whilst I stood upon the doorsteps, staring after it, and looking like an old fool !

"I promise you that I and Mrs. Cox drank the health of young Master Harry and his brother, yesterday, as kindly as I had ever felt inclined to do that of his father ! But, thank goodness, 't is clearing up," cried Cox VI., interrupting himself ; "for I've got to call in Poland street, on my way to the coach-office, to have a peep at the new sheriff's liveries, which my son has the honor of furnishing. I could tell you a famous story, sir, about those liveries, ay, and their master too ! But I've tired you and myself ; you shall hear it another time. Good day, sir, good day." I'll bring the snuff-box with me the very first day I'm able to call."

GREECE.

THE new constitution of Greece has been settled, on all the free principles of Western Europe, imitated from England,—limited monarchy, ministerial responsibility, national representation, parliamentary control over the expenditure, legal equality of all classes, trial by jury, freedom of the press, and so forth. The consummation was not accomplished without another struggle, not less dangerous to the peace of the country and the existence of the monarchy than if it had been open warfare instead of a quiet negotiation carried on almost in secret. A revolution, bloodless because it was effected by an overwhelming power, had resulted in referring the question of the constitution to a special National Assembly. The Assembly accordingly framed the constitution in the terms of its appointment, and submitted it to King Otho for ratification. The young monarch took one last opportunity of proving his own incompetency to comprehend his real position, and to show himself almost the idiot he has been suspected to be ; he returned the national document covered with objections, and suggested alterations,—some destroying the value of the charter by striking out essential provisions, as that securing for political accusations trial by jury ; others attempting to defeat the whole project by some discreditable but transparent quibble, as the suggested addition to the royal oath that the king should keep the constitution "according to his conscience" ; and others coming down to petty grammatical pedantries of criticism, indulged by a Bavarian in handling a Greek composition. Otho took up a position the very reverse of that which would have been dignified and suitable, and appeared an idle schoolboy and tricky trifler. Luckily, to use a homely English phrase, "the gray mare is the better horse" ; Otho has a queen, to whom are attributed earnest humanity, enlarged views, and a feminine gentleness not incompatible with great influence over her husband. And luckily for Greece, the Assembly exhibited an unusual, perhaps an unprecedented example of moderation and discretion in a popular body ; there was no display of incontinent "patriotism," no taunting opposition ; even the unavoidable asperity was veiled by debating on the king's amendments with closed doors ; but the Assembly was firm and unanimous—it could not yield to Otho's caprices. Mahomet therefore consented to go to the mountain—Otho himself yielded, and adopted the constitution, with more apparent cheerfulness than might have been expected. If the Greeks show as much intelligence, firmness, and discretion in working out their new form of government, as they have in devising it, it cannot but go well ; and liberty will once more have been firmly planted in South-eastern Europe.—Spectator, April 13.

From the London Magazine.

Come gentle sleep, come to these eyes,
And wrap them up in rest ;
And let this heart that inly mourns,
In dreams, at least, be blest.

But like to nothing on this earth
Let the sweet vision be ;
Or else it must remembrance bring
Of something sad to me.

The master-key of all my soul
Hath felt a fearful blow ;
And every string that chimed before,
With discord frights me now.

Then like to nothing on this earth
Let the sweet vision be ;
Or else it must remembrance bring
Of something sad to me.

VALE CRUCIS.

A WELSH SONG, BY MR. ROSCOE.

Vale of the Cross, the shepherds tell,
'T is sweet within thy woods to dwell,
For there are sainted shadows seen,
That frequent haunt thy dewy green ;
In wandering winds the dirge is sung,
The convent bell by spirits rung,
And matin hymns and vesper prayer,
Break softly on the tranquil air.

Vale of the Cross, the shepherds tell,
'T is sweet within thy woods to dwell,
For peace has there her spotless throne,
And pleasures to the world unknown ;
The murmurs of the distant rills,
The sabbath silence of the hills,
And all the quiet God hath given,
Without the golden gates of Heaven.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE CHILD'S WARNING.

There's bloom upon the lady's cheek,
 There's brightness in her eye :
 Who says the sentence is gone forth
 That that fair thing must die ?

Must die before the flowering time,
 Out yonder, sheds its leaf—
 Can this thing be, O human flower !
 Thy blossoming so brief ?

Nay, nay, 't is but a passing cloud,
 Thou didst but droop awhile ;
 There's life, long years, and love and joy,
 Whole ages, in that smile—

In the gay call that to thy knee
 Brings quick that loving child,
 Who looks up in those laughing eyes
 With his large eyes so mild.

Yet, thou art doom'd—art dying ; all
 The coming hour foresee,
 But, in love's cowardice, withhold
 The warning word from thee.

God keep thee and be merciful !
 His strength is with the weak ;
 Through babes and sucklings, the Most High
 Hath oft vouchsafed to speak—

And speaketh now—"Oh, mother dear !"
 Murmurs the little child ;
 And there is trouble in his eyes,
 Those large blue eyes so mild—

"Oh, mother dear ! they say that soon,
 When here I seek for thee,
 I shall not find thee—nor out there,
 Under the old oak-tree ;

"Nor up-stairs in the nursery,
 Nor anywhere, they say.
 Where wilt thou go to, mother dear ?
 Oh, do not go away !"

Then was long silence—a deep hush—
 And then the child's low sob.
 Her quivering eyelids close—one hand
 Keeps down the heart's quick throb.

And the lips move though sound is none,
 That inward voice is prayer.
 And hark ! "Thy will, O Lord, be done !"
 And tears are trickling there,

Down that pale cheek, on that young head ;
 And round her neck he clings ;
 And child and mother murmur out
 Unutterable things.

He half unconscious—she deep-struck
 With sudden solemn truth,

That number'd are her days on earth,
 Her shroud prepared in youth—

That all in life her heart holds dear,
 God calls her to resign,
 She hears—feels—trembles—but looks up,
 And sighs, "Thy will be mine !"

THE FAMILY MEETING.

BY CHARLES SPRAGUE.

We are all here,
 Father, Mother,
 Sister, Brother,

All who hold each other dear.
 Each chair is filled—we're all at home !
 To-night let no cold stranger come :
 It is not often thus around
 Our old familiar hearth we're found.
 Bless, then, the meeting and the spot ;
 For once be every care forgot ;
 Let gentle peace assert her power,
 And kind affection rule the hour.

We're all—all here.

We're not all here !

Some are away—the dead ones dear,
 Who thronged with us this ancient hearth,
 And gave the hour to guileless mirth.
 Fate, with a stern, relentless hand,
 Looked in, and thinned our little band ;
 Some like a night-flash passed away,
 And some sank lingering day by day ;
 The quiet grave-yard—some lie there—
 And cruel ocean has his share—

We're not all here.

We are all here,

Even they—the dead—though dead, so dear ;
 Fond Memory, to her duty true,
 Brings back their faded forms to view.
 How life-like, through the mist of years,
 Each well-remembered face appears !
 We see them, as in times long past ;
 From each to each kind looks are cast,
 We hear their words, their smiles behold—
 They're round us as they were of old—
 We are all here.

We are all here,
 Father, Mother,
 Sister, Brother,

You that I love, with love so dear.
 This may not long of us be said—
 Soon must we join the gathered dead,
 And by the hearth we now sit round
 Some other circle will be found.
 Oh ! then, that wisdom may be known
 Which yields a life of peace below ;
 So, in the world to follow this,
 May each repeat, in words of bliss,
 We're all—all here !

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE BRITISH FLEET.

WERE the question proposed to us, What is the most extraordinary, complete, and effective instance of skill, contrivance, science, and power, ever combined by man? we should unhesitatingly answer, an English line-of-battle ship. Take the model of a 120 gun ship—large as it may be for a floating body, its space is not great. For example, it is not half the ordinary size of a nobleman's mansion; yet that ship carries a thousand men with convenience, and lodges them day and night, with sufficient room for the necessary distinctions of obedience and command—has separate apartments for the admiral and the captain, for the different ranks of officers, and even for the different ranks of seamen—separate portions below decks for the sleeping of the crew, the dining of the officers, and the receptacle for the sick and wounded. Those thousand men are to be fed three times a-day, and provisions for four months are to be stowed. One hundred and twenty cannon, some of them of the heaviest metal, are to be carried; and room is to be found for all the weight of shot and quantities of powder, with other missiles, rockets, and signal fires, necessary for service. Besides this, room is to be provided for the stowage of fresh rigging, sails, ropes, cables, and yards, to replace those lost by accident, battle, or wear and tear. Besides this, too, there is to be a provision for the hospital. So far for the mere necessities of the ship. Then we are to regard the science; for nothing can be more essential than the skill and the instruments of the navigator, as nothing can be more fatal than a scientific error, a false calculation, or a remission of vigilance. We shall do no more than allude to the habits of command essential to keep a thousand of these rough and daring spirits in order, and that, too, an order of the most implicit, steady, and active kind; nor to their knowledge of tactics, and conduct in battle. The true definition of the line-of-battle ship being, a floating regiment of artillery in a barrack, which, at the beat of a drum, may be turned into a field of battle, or, at the command of government, may be sent flying on the wings of the wind round the world.

We think that we have thus established our proposition. If not, let anything else be shown which exhibits the same quantity of power packed within the same space; and that power, too, increasing daily by new contrivances of stowage and building, by new models of guns, and new inventions in machinery. England is at this moment building two hundred steam-ships, with guns of a calibre to which all the past were trifling, with room for a regiment of land troops besides their crews, and with the known power of defying wind and wave, and throwing an army in full equipment for the field, within a few days, on any coast of Europe.

It is remarkable that the use of the navy, as a great branch of the military power of England, had been scarcely contemplated until the last century. Though the sea-coast of England, the largest of any European state, and the national habits of an insular country, might have pointed out this direction for the national energies from the earliest period, yet England was a kingdom for five hundred years before she seems to have thought of the use of ships as an instrument of public power. In the long war with France during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the ships were almost wholly mercantile; and, when employed in wars, were chiefly employed as transports to throw our troops on the French soil. It was the reign of Elizabeth, that true birth of the progress of England, that first developed the powers of an armed navy. The Spanish invasion forced the country to meet the Armada by means like its own; and the triumph, though won by a higher agency, and due to the winds and waves, or rather to the Supreme Providence which watched over the land of Protestantism, awoke the nation to the true faculty of defence; and from that period alone could the burden of the fine national song be realized, and Britain was to "rule the main."

The expeditions against the Spanish West Indies, and the new ardor of discovery in regions where brilliant fable lent its aid to rational curiosity, carried on the process of naval power. The war against Holland, under Charles II., though disastrous and impolitic, showed at least that the fleet of England was the true arm of its strength; and the humiliation of the only rival of her commerce at once taught her where the sinews of war lay, and by what means the foundations of naval empire were to be laid. But it was not until the close of the last century that the truth came before the nation in its full form. The American war—a war of skirmishes—had its direct effect, perhaps its providential purpose, in compelling England to prepare for the tremendous collision which was so soon to follow, and which was to be the final security of the continent itself. It was then, for the first time, that the nation was driven to the use of a navy on a great scale. The war, lying on the western side of an ocean, made the use of naval armaments necessary to every operation. The treacherous hostility of the French cabinet, and the unfortunate subservency of Spain to that treachery, made corresponding energy on the part of England a matter of public demand; and when France and Spain sent out fleets of a magnitude till then unknown, England was then urged to follow their example. The defeats of the combined navies excited the nation to still more vigorous efforts; and the war closed with so full a demonstration of the matchless importance of a great navy to England, that the public feeling was fixed on giving it the largest contribution of the national confidence.

The time was at hand when the trial was to involve every interest of England and mankind. The first grand struggle of revolutionary France with England was to be on the seas; and the generation of naval officers who had been reared in the American war, then rising into vigor, trained by its experience, and stimulated by its example, gallantly maintained the honor of their country.

A succession of sanguinary battles followed, each on the largest scale, and each closing in British victory; until the republic, in despair, abandoned the fatal element, and tried her fortunes in the easier conflicts of the land. The accession of Napoleon renewed the struggle for naval supremacy, until one vast blow extinguished his hopes and his navy at Trafalgar. Peace now exists, and long may it exist! but France is rapidly renewing her navy, taking every opportunity of exercising its strength, and especially patronizing the policy of founding those colonies which it idly imagines to be the source of British opulence. But whether the wisdom of Louis Philippe limits the protection of French trade to the benefits which commerce may confer on his vast kingdom, or looks forward to the support which a mercantile navy may give to a warlike one, we must not sleep on our post. The life of any individual is brief on a national scale; and his successor, whether regent or republican, may be as hot-headed, rash, and ambitious, as this great monarch has shown himself rational, prudent, and peaceful. We must prepare for all chances; and our true preparation must be, a fleet that may defy all.

It is a remarkable instance of the slowness with which science advances, that almost the whole scientific portion of seamanship has grown up since the middle of the seventeenth century, though America had been reached in 1492, and India in 1496; and thus the world had been nearly rounded before what would now be regarded as the ordinary knowledge of a navigator had been acquired. England has the honor of making the first advances. It was an Englishman, Norwood, who made the first measurement of a degree between London and York, and fixed it at 122,399 English yards. The attention of the world thus once awakened, Huygens and Cassini applied themselves to ascertain the figure of the earth. The first experiments of the French savans were in contradiction to Newton's theory of the flattening of the poles; but the controversy was the means of exciting new interest. The eyes of the scientific world were turned more intently on the subject. New experiments were made, which corrected the old; and finally, on the measurement of the arc in Peru, and in the north, truth and Newton triumphed, and the equatorial diameter was found to exceed the polar by a two hundred and fourth part of the whole. This was perhaps the finest problem ever solved by science; the most perplexing in its early state—exhibiting for a while the strongest contradiction of experiment and theory, occupying in a greater degree the attention of philosophers than any before or since, and finally established with a certainty which every subsequent observation has only tended to confirm. And this triumph belonged to an Englishman.

The investigation by measurements has since been largely adopted. In 1787, joint commissions were issued by England and France to connect the Greenwich and Parisian observations. Arcs of the meridian have since been measured across the whole breadth of France and Spain, and also near the Arctic circle, and in the Indian peninsula.

In navigation, the grand point for the sailor is to ascertain his latitude and longitude; in other words, to know where he is. The discovery of the latitude is easily effected by the quadrant, but the longitude is the difficulty.

Any means which ascertained the hour at Greenwich, at the instant of making a celestial observation in any other part, would answer the difficulty; for the difference in quarters of an hour would give the difference of the degrees. But clocks could not be used on shipboard, and the best watches failed to keep the time. In the reign of Anne, Parliament offered a reward of £5000, perhaps not far from the value of twice the sum in the present day, for a watch within a certain degree of accuracy. Harrison, a watch-maker, sent in a watch which came within the limits, losing but two minutes in a voyage to the West Indies; yet even this was an error of thirty miles.

But, though chronometers have since been considerably improved, there are difficulties in their preservation in good order which have made it expedient to apply to other means; and the lunar tables of Mayer of Gottingen, formed in 1755, and subsequently improved by Dr. Maskelyne and others, have brought the error within seven miles and a half.

Improvements of a very important order have also taken place in the mariner's compass; the variation of the needle has been reduced to rules, and some anomalies, arising from the metallic attraction of the ship itself, have been corrected by Professor Barlow's experiments. The use of the marine barometer and thermometer have also largely assisted to give notice of tempests; and some ingenious theories have been lately formed, which, promising to give a knowledge of the origin and nature of tempests, are obviously not unlikely to assist the navigator in stemming their violence, or escaping them altogether.

The construction of ships for both the merchant and the public service has undergone striking improvements within this century. Round sterns, for the defence of a vessel engaged with several opponents at once; compartments in the hold, for security against leaks; iron tanks for water, containing twice the quantity, and keeping it free from the impurities of the casks; a better general stowage; provisions prepared so as to remain almost fresh during an East Indian voyage; every means of preserving health, suggested by science, and succeeding to the most remarkable degree; a more intelligent system of ship-building, and a constant series of experiments on the shape, stowage, and sailing of ships, are among the beneficial changes of later times. But the one great change—steam—will probably swallow up all the rest, and form a new era in shipbuilding, in navigation, in the power and nature of a navy, and in the comfort, safety, and protection of the crews in actual engagement. The use of steam is still so palpably in its infancy, yet that infancy is so gigantic, that it is equally difficult to say what it may yet become, and to limit its progress. It will have the one obvious advantage to mankind in general, of making the question of war turn more than ever on the financial and mechanical resources of a people; and thus increasing the necessity for commercial opulence and intellectual exertion.

It may expose nations more to each other's attacks; but it will render hostility more dreaded, because more dangerous. On the whole, like the use of gunpowder, which made a Tartar war impossible, and which rapidly tended to civilize Europe, steam appears to be intended as a further step in the same high process, in which force is to be put down by intelligence, and success, even in war, is to depend on the industry of peace; thus, in fact, providing a perpetual restriction on the belligerent propensities of nations, and urging the uncivilized, by necessity, to own the superiority, and follow the example of the civilized, by knowledge, habit and principle.

It is not to be forgotten, even in this general and brief view of the values of the British fleet, that it has, within these few years, assumed a new character as an instrument of war. The Syrian campaign, the shortest, and, beyond all comparison, the most brilliant on record, if we are to estimate military distinction, not only by the gallantry of the conflict, but by the results of the victory—this campaign, which at once finished the war in Syria, gave peace to Turkey, reduced Egypt to obedience, rescued the Sultan from Russian influence, and Egypt from French; or rather rescued all Europe from the collision of England, France, and Russia; and even, by the evidence of our naval capabilities, taught American faction the wisdom of avoiding hostilities—this grand operation was effected by a small portion of the British navy, well commanded, directed to the right point, and acting with national energy. The three hours' cannonade of Acre, the most effective achievement in the annals of war, exhibited a new use of a ship's broadside; for, though ships' guns had often battered forts before, it was the first instance of a fleet employed in attack, and fully overpowering all opposition. The attack on Algiers was the only exploit of a similar kind; but its success was limited, and the result was so far disastrous, that it at once fixed the eye of France on the invasion of Algiers, and disabled and disheartened the native government from vigorous resistance. The victory of the fleet at Acre will also have the effect of changing the whole system of defence in fortresses and cities exposed to the sea.

But a still further advance in the employment of fleets as an instrument of hostilities, has since occurred in the Chinese war—their simultaneous operations with troops. In former assaults of fortresses, the troops and ships attacked the same line of defence, and the consequence was the waste of force. From the moment when the troops approached the land, the fire of the ships necessarily ceased, and the fleet then remained spectators of the assault. But in this war, while the troops attacked on the land side, the fleet ran up to the sea batteries, and both attacks went on together—of course dividing the attention of the enemy, thus having a double chance of success, and employing both arms of the service in full energy. This masterly combination the Duke of Wellington, the highest military authority in Europe, pronounced to be a new principle in war; and even this is, perhaps, only the beginning of a system of combination which will lead to new victories, if war should ever unhappily return.

LEGAL EXAMINATION.

INTRODUCTORY QUESTIONS.

Q. Mention some of the principal law books which you have studied!—A. Hoyle's Laws of Whist, Cribbage, &c. The Rules of the Cricket Club; ditto of the Jockey Club.

Q. Have you attended any, and what law lectures!—A. I have attended to many legal lectures, when I have been admonished by police magistrates for kicking up rows in the streets, pulling off knockers, &c.

COMMON LAW.

Q. What is a real action!—A. An action brought in earnest, and not by way of a joke.

Q. What are original writs!—A. Pothooks and hangers.

EQUITY AND CONVEYANCING.

Q. What are a bill and answer!—A. Ask my tailor.

Q. How would you file a bill!—A. I don't know, but would lay a case before a blacksmith.

Q. What steps would you take to dissolve an injunction!—A. I should put it into some very hot water, and let it remain there until it was melted.

Q. What are post-nuptial articles!—A. Children.

CRIMINAL LAW AND BANKRUPTCY.

Q. What is simple larceny!—A. Picking a pocket of a handkerchief, and leaving a purse of money behind.

Q. What is grand larceny!—A. The Income-tax.

Q. How would you proceed to make a man a bankrupt!—A. Induce him to take one of the national theatres.

Q. How is the property of a bankrupt disposed of!—A. The solicitor to the fiat, and the other legal functionaries, divide it amongst themselves. —Punch.

From the Dublin University Magazine.

LIFE UPON THE NILE.

Smooth went our boat along the summer seas,
 Leaving—for so it seemed—a world behind,
 Its cares, its sounds, its shadows; we reclined
 Upon the sunny deck, heard but the breeze
 That whispered through the palms, or idly played
 With the lithe flag aloft—a forest scene
 On either side drew its slope line of green,
 And hung the water's edge with shade.
 Above thy woods, Memphis!—pyramids pale Peered as we passed; and Nile's azure hue
 Gleaming 'mid the grey desert, met the view;
 Where hung at intervals the scarce seen sail.
 Oh! were this little boat to us the world,
 As thus we wandered far from sounds of care,
 Circled with friends, and gentle maidens fair,
 While southern airs the waving pennant curled,
 How sweet were life's long voyage, till in peace
 We gained that haven still, where all things cease!

(Altered from) BOWLES.

READER! whoever you are, you may one day be induced to change the feverish life of Europe, with all its perplexing enjoyments, its complicated luxuries, and its manifold cares, for the silence, the simplicity, and the freedom of a life on the Desert and the River. Has society palled upon you? Have the week-day struggles of the world made you wish for some short sabbath of repose? Has our coarse climate chafed your lungs, and do they require the soothing of balmily breathing breezes? Come away to the Nile! Has love, or hate, or ambition, or any other ephemeral passion, ruffled up a storm in your butterboat of existence? Here you will find that calm counsellor Egeria—whose name is solitude. Have the marvellous stories of the old world sunk into your soul, and do you seek for their realization? Or have mere curiosity and the spirit of unrest, driven you forth to wander, à l'Anglais, as a man takes a walk on a dreary day for the pleasure of returning from it? Come away to the Nile. Here are sunshines that are never clouded, and fragrant airs, as gentle as a maiden's whisper, instead of northern gales that howl round you, as if you were an old battlement. Here are nights, all a-glow with stars, and a crescent moon that seems bowing to you by courtesy, not bent double by rheumatism. Here is no money to be lost or gained—no letters to disturb into joy or sorrow—none of the wear and tear and petty details of life. You never hear the sound of your native tongue, and somehow men don't talk, and therefore don't think so lightly, when they have to translate their thoughts into a strange language. In a word, here is the highest soul of monastic retirement. You stand apart from the world—you see men so widely differing from yourself in their appearance, their habits, their hopes and their fears, that you are induced to look upon man in the abstract. As you recede from Europe further and further on towards the silent regions of the Past, you live more and more in that Past;—the river over which you glide, the desert, the forest, the very air you breathe are calm; the temples in their awful solitudes, the colossal statues, the tombs with their guardian sphinxes—all are profoundly calm—and at length even English restlessness softens down, and blends with the universal calm around.

II. LIVING AGE.

6

• • • • •
 Cairo! for the present farewell. It was late when I issued from the gates, but it was impossible to be in a hurry on such an evening, and on such a spot. The distance between the modern metropolis and the river is broken by many a mound and chasm, that marks where its predecessor stood,—the distorted features of a city that has died a violent death. The metropolis of Egypt had an uneasy life of it. To say nothing of its youth at Thebes, it has wandered about Lower Egypt, as if it were a mere encampment. Under the name of Memphis, it remained for some time on the western bank of the river. It fled from Nebuchadnezzar to the opposite side under the "alias" of Babylon; paid a visit to Alexandria under the Ptolemies; and returned to Babylon, where it was besieged by Amrou. A dove built its nest in the tent of the Saracen general, and he, who had ruthlessly ravaged and laid waste the dwellings of man, would not disturb the domestic arrangements of a little bird. Babylon was taken, but he ordered a new city to be built from its ruins on the site where this dove sat hatching. Thus Fostat became the metropolis of Egypt. The nomade instinct was too strong for its repose, however, and, under the Fatimites, it was obliged to start again, and remove to its present position, where it dwells under the name of Misr el Kahira, "the victorious city," or, in plain English, Grand Cairo. There are some remains of these former cities still existing, among which is a fine aqueduct, and some buildings, called Joseph's Granaries, which are still used for that purpose.

• • • • •
 Some hundred years ago there was a great scarcity of corn in Egypt—the people were daily perishing of want, yet some avaricious merchants hoarded up their stock until it became worth its weight in gold. Among these was an old miser named Amin, who had filled one of "Joseph's Granaries," at the last plenteous harvest. Day by day, as the famine wasted his fellow-citizens, he sat upon the steps of his corn-store, speculating on their sufferings, and calculating how he could make the utmost usury out of God's bounty. At length there was no more corn elsewhere; famishing crowds surrounded his store-house, and besought him as a charity to give them a little food for all their wealth. Gold was piled around him—the miser's soul was satisfied with the prospect of boundless riches. Slowly he unclosed his iron doors—when, lo! he recoils, blasted and terror-stricken, from his treasury. Heaven had sent the worm into his corn, and instead of piles of yellow wheat, he gazed on festering masses of rottenness and corruption. Starving as the people were, they raised a shout of triumph at the manifest judgment, but Amén heard it not—he had perished in his hour of evil pride.

The sun was setting behind the pyramids when I embarked; but night and day make little difference in this country, and the former is only associated with the idea of rest, when it happens to be too dark to see. It was bright moonlight as I mustered our swarthy crew on the river's edge. Their countenances were full of hope and eagerness, and when their inspection was concluded, each kissed my hand and placed it on his head, in sign of devotion and fidelity. Their dress was principally a pair of loose cotton drawers, reaching to the knee, a long blue shirt, and the red cloth cap called a "tarboosh," which, on state occasions, is wound round with a white turban by the lower classes. The officers in the pasha's service always wear it plain. The crew consisted of a rais, or captain, a pilot, and eight rowers: with one exception we found them good-humored, faithful, honest, and affectionate fellows. Two servants completed the equipment. One of these, named Mahmoud, has the well-deserved character of being the best dragoman in Egypt. He had none of the indolence of his race; always actively employed, his song was never silent except when exchanged for conversation; strikingly handsome, keen and intelligent, he had unbounded influence over the crew, and was welcomed eagerly by peasant and governor wherever we landed. From Cairo to the depths of Nubia he seemed intimately acquainted, not only with every locality, but with every individual along the river. He had accompanied Lord Prudhoe on both his expeditions into the interior of Africa, and spoke of him with gratitude and enthusiasm. * * * Now the cable is loosed, a long towing line is drawn along the shore by the sailors; the pilot perches himself on the spar-deck; the rais squats at the bow; and the Nile ripples round our prow, as we start on a two-months' voyage with as little ceremony as if only crossing the river in a ferry-boat. Palms, palaces, and busy crowds glide by; the river bends, and the wind becomes favorable; the sailors wade or swim on board; enormous sails fall from the long spars, like two wide unfolding wings. The pyramids of Gizeh on our right, the distant minarets of Cairo on our left, slowly recede, and the cool night-breezes follow us, laden with perfumes from the gardens of Rhoda, and the faint murmur of the great city; the crew gather about the fire, with and discuss, in a whisper, the appearance of the white stranger, who reclines on a pile of Persian carpets, smoking his chibouque, and sipping his coffee as contentedly as if he had been born and bred under the shadow of the palm.

"Dark faces pale around that rosy flame,"

It was a lovely night. There was just wind enough to bosom out our snowy sails, that heaved as with a languid respiration; the moon shone forth in glory, as if she were still the bright goddess of the land, and loved it well. No longer do the white-robed priests of Isis celebrate her mystic rites in solemn procession along these shadowy banks; no longer the Egyptian maidens move in choral dances through these darkling groves, with lotus garlands on their brows, and mirrors on their breasts, which flashed back the smile of the worshipped moon at every pant of those young bosoms, to typify that the heart within was all her own, and imaged but her deity.—These were fine times for that epicurean hermit, the man in the moon. No doubt Lord Rosse's new telescope will find the expression of his countenance sadly altered now. There are no more mystic pomps or midnight pageants in the land of Egypt; he may look in vain for venerable priest or vestal virgin now. Yet still does Isis seem to smile lovingly over her deserted shrines, and her pale light harmonizes well with the calm dwellings of the mighty dead. These, with their pyramids, their tombs, their temples, are the real inhabitants of this dreamy land. The puny people who usurp their place have as little in common with it as the jackdaws have with Mucross Abbey.

SONGS OF THE NILE.

"Oh music! miraculous art! that makes the poet's skill a jest, revealing to the soul inexplicable feelings by the aid of inexplicable sounds! A blast of the trumpet, and thousands rush forth to die—a peal of the organ, and uncounted multitudes kneel down to pray."

DE QUINCY.

FROM Memnon to Mehemet Ali all Egypt luxuriates in music. In the pasha's palace, in the peasant's hut, at the soldier's bivouac, on the sailor's deck, in every circumstance of the Arab's life, I have found it regarded as the chief source of his enjoyment. He is born, he is married, he dies, he is buried to the sound of music. It cheers his labor, it heightens his festival, it controls his passions, it soothes his miseries. Our crew sung for two months almost without intermission, yet never seemed to weary of their song. Among the items furnished by our dragoman as necessary to our outfit, were a drum and some Nile-flutes. The former consisted of a large earthen bowl with a skin stretched over it; the latter resembled the double flageolet, and was made of reeds: it seemed capable of a much wider range of notes than their monotonous music required. Its sound was somewhat shrill, but not displeasing, and every sailor on board seemed a proficient in its use. I could detect but little variety in the airs, and the words were of the simplest kind. I listened as vainly for the songs of Antar among the Arabs of Egypt as I had done for those of Tasso among the gondoliers of Venice. The songs of the Arab sailor are generally of home, of the Nile, never of war, but most of all, of love. Very few of these last are fit for translation, and as the home-made poetry of a people always takes for its subject that which is uppermost in their thought, I fear the sensuality of their muse must be taken as some index of their character. It is true that the songs of our sailors and our cottagers are not always of the most edifying character; but the popularity of some of the "Old songs that are the music of the heart,"

the love ballads of Scotland, England, and above all, of old Ireland; the enthusiasm for the compositions of Moore, Burns, and Dibdin, which linked in one sympathy the castle and the cottage, all this proves that there is an echo to a purer tone even in the rugged and too little cared-for minds of our peasantry.

I do not pretend to give specimens of Arab poetry; but I subjoin one or two translations of Nile songs in verse, as un-artistic as their own. The first was given to me by a Levantine lady at Alexandria, and probably owes much of its delicacy to the fair medium through which it passed from the Arabic into Italian. The original is characteristic in its profusion of images, and unique, as far as I know of eastern poetry, in its tenderness and purity of tone. Lady! should these desultory pages ever meet thy radiant eyes, let me be grateful that the veil of a strange language will half conceal their imperfections: thy gentle heart will do the rest, and whisper thee besides, how much the wanderer owes to thee, if ever a bright thought illumines his "Wanderbuch."

THE ARAB LOVER TO HIS MISTRESS.

1

Thou art the palm-tree of my desert, and thy glance,
so soft and bright,
Is the moonlight of my spirit in its long and dreary night;
Only flower in my heart's deserted garden—only well
In my life's wide, lonely wilderness—my gentle-eyed gazelle!

2

But the palm-tree waves in sunny heights, unreach'd
by sighs of mine,
And the moonlight has its mission first on loftier
brows to shine,
And a wealthier hand will cull that flower—unseal that stainless spring,
May'st thou be happy! even with him, while lone I'm wandering.

Very different is the song which now swells from our sailor circle. One plays the pipes, another strikes the drum, à la tambourine, and all the others keep time with the wild, quick music, by clapping their hands. Each verse is first sung by a single voice, and then the two last lines are repeated in full chorus. The words are trifling and seem to convey little meaning; it is the air, which to us seems to resemble "Young Lobsky said to his ugly wife," that is to them so full of association, lights up their dark countenances, and swells their voices with enthusiasm.

MOTHER TO HER DAUGHTER.

1

The Mother.

My daughter 't is time that thou wert wed,
Ten summers already are over thy head,
I must find you a husband, if under the sun
The conscript-catcher has left us one.

2

The Daughter.

Dear mother, one husband will never do,
I have so much love, that I must have two,
And I'll find for each, as you shall see,
More love than both can bring to me.

3

One husband shall carry a lance so bright,
He shall roam the desert for spoil by night,
And when morning shines on the tall palm-tree,
He shall find sweet welcome home with me.

4

The other a sailor bold shall be,
He shall fish all day in the deep blue sea,*
And when evening brings his hour of rest,
He shall find repose on this faithful breast.

5

Mother.

There's no chance, my child, of a double match,
For men are scarce and hard to catch;
So I fear you must make one husband do,
And try to love him as well as two.

These songs were for the most part humorous, and such they always chanted on approaching a village, or when gathered round their night-fires as the boat lay moored to the bank; but they had also songs of a graver character, and more plaintive airs, which they sung on leaving their friends or entering upon serious undertakings. Thus, when we had reached the limits of our journey at the Second Cataract, and our boat's head was turned toward the north and home, they sung the following stanzas to an air not unlike "Vaga Luna," and kept time with their oars to the plaintive measure:—

1

Allah! il Allah! hear our prayer!
Just Prophet! grant that the breeze is fair,
And thy guiding moon her lustre lends,
To favor the guest whom Allah sends.†

2

The stranger's home is far away,
'Neath the bright deathbed of the day,

* The Arabs call the Nile "the sea."

† Mahomet taught that a stranger was a "God-given guest," which the Arabs naturally consider the best introduction.

O'er many horizons* his bark must go,
Ere he reach that home,—Row, Arabs, row!

3

Though gentle Nile for the stormy sea,
Though for forest dark, the bright palm-tree,
He must change—yet his father's home is there,
And his love's soft eye is gloomed with care.

4

The pale-faced stranger, lonely here,
In cities afar, where his name is dear,
Your Arab truth and strength shall show;
His hope is in us—Row, Arabs, row!

And they did row, sometimes eighteen hours at a stretch, only pausing to eat their scanty meals, or to drink of their beloved river. There was one Nubian in our crew, a harmless, inoffensive creature, who filled the indispensable situation of butt to his comrades, submitted to all their jokes, and laughed at them too, even when practised on himself. The day on which we entered Nubia, however, he came out in a new character; he knocked an Egyptian, who had affronted him, overboard; and to the surprise of all, actually volunteered a song. It was received with great approbation, and repeated so often with shouts of laughter, that I obtained the translation of it, which I subjoin; premising that the refrain "Durwadeega Durwadee," is Nubian for "My henhouse, oh, my henhouse," and that this henhouse is considered the property of the wife, which her husband is obliged to make over to her in case of a divorce.

1

A change came over my husband's mind,
He loved me once, and was true and kind;
His heart went astray, he wished me away,
But he had no money my dower to pay.

Sing Durwadeega, Durwadee,
Oh dear to me is Durwadee.

2

For blessed be Allah! he's old and poor,
And my cocks and hens were his only store,
So he kept me still, for well he knew
If I went, that the cocks and hens went too.

Sing Durwadeega, Durwadee,
Oh dear to me is Durwadee.

3

But I saw him pining day by day,
As he wished his poor wife far away;
So I went my rival home to call,
And gave her the henhouse, and him and all.

Sing Durwadeega, Durwadee,
Oh dear to me is Durwadee.

4

Then he tore his turban off his brow,
And swore I never should leave him now,

Till the death-men combed his burial locks,†
Then blessed for ever be hens and cocks.

Sing Durwadeega, Durwadee,
Oh dear to me is Durwadee.

I make no apology for the simplicity of these songs. It would have been easy to have given them a more polished turn, and not very difficult to have put them into better poetry; but I preferred preserving, as much as possible, the spirit of the original, as the songs of a people afford no trifling insight into their character. * * * * *

MEMPHIS.

Thence over Egypt's palmy groves,
Her grot, and sepulchres of kings,
The exiled spirit sighing roves;
* * * * * Now loves
To watch the moonlight on the wings
Of the white pelicans that break
The calm of Acherusia's lake.

MOOR.

MORNING found us anchored off Bedrasheen, near the site of ancient Memphis. The valued friend with whom I was fortunate enough to share my voyage had been detained at Cairo, and I preferred waiting for him at the former metropolis; although corn was growing where its palaces once stood, and palm forests were waving over the gardens in which Pharaoh's daughter used to hunt butterflies with Moses. The tent was pitched on a little lawn near the river, and in the East there is no such home as a tent supplies. It is spread with carpets, under which saddle and portmanteau duly placed, form undulations enough to be substitutes for chair or pillow; sabres, and pistols, and turban capote, hang from the tent-pole. A large lantern within, and a large watch-fire without, give light to you and to your people; and an Arab sleeps across the door to keep off the wild dogs.

I wandered towards the forest of palms that embosoms the lake of Acherusia, and the few traces that remain of the ancient city of the Pharaohs. The former, with its gloomy waters shadowed by dark foliage, and only broken by a promontory black with blasted and gnarled stems, was a spot that Rembrandt would have loved to paint; with the vivid sunshine here and there bursting through the gloom, like bars of burning gold. Nor would he have forgotten Charon, with his spectral passengers steering his demon ship to that vast necropolis, whose tombstones are pyramids. Some mounds among these forests are generally received as Memphis; the site of Vulcan's temple, and that where the bull Apis was kept, are supposed to be ascertained. Cambyses the tauricide, however, coming so soon after Nebuchadnezzar, and the desert, the most resistless inva-

† The Musselman's head is shaved, with the exception of one lock. This is retained for the convenience of the angel who has to pull him out of his grave. This "burial-lock" is reverently arranged by the men who prepare the corpse.

* In the East they speak of distance by "horizons."

der of all, have left little trouble to the tourist, little harvest for the antiquarian. The only inhabitant I saw was Rhampses the Great, who lies upon his face in the mud; the benignant expression of his countenance had rather a ludicrous effect considering his attitude. He is forty feet long, and with his wife and four sons, must have formed an imposing family party in front of the Temple of Vulcan. The lady and young gentlemen have disappeared; let us hope they are gone to the Elysian fields, which ought to be somewhere in this neighborhood, but as is natural, they are much more difficult to find than the other place which lies yonder. The quick twilight was come and gone as I wandered and wondered in this strange and lonely scene; the last rays of light fell upon the pyramid of Cheops, just visible through a vista of gigantic palm trees that opened from the lake of Acherusia on the distant desert. I stole down to the water's edge, to get within gun-shot of some pelicans, but the solemn and thoughtful aspect of the scene converted my murderous intention into a fit of musing, and I almost thought I could hear the old trees whispering the dread prophecy—"The country shall be destitute of that whereof it was full, when I shall smite all them that dwell therein; and Noph shall be desolate." * * * * *

The next day I was sitting at the door of my tent towards sunset, enjoying, under the rose-coloring influence of my chibouque, the mood of mind that my situation naturally superinduced. At my feet flowed the Nile, reflecting the lofty spars of our gaily painted boat; beyond the river was a narrow strip of vegetation, some palm and acacia trees; then a tract of desert bounded by the Arabian hills, all purple with the setting sun-light. Far away on the horizon the minarets and citadel of Cairo were faintly sketched against the sky; around me lay fields of corn, beneath which Memphis, with all its wonders lay buried, and farther on a long succession of pyramids towered over the dark belt of forest that led along the river. Suddenly the sleeping sailors started to their feet—a shout was heard from the wood—and I saw my long-lost friend slowly emerging from its shade, accompanied by some India-bound friends of his, who were escorting him so far upon his desert way. The tent suddenly shrank into its bag—the furniture was on board, and we four were seated round a dinner, to which, simple as it was, the four quarters of the globe had contributed. We passed the evening together, and something more, for morning blushed at finding the party then only separating—our friends for India—we for Ethiopia—allons!

LIFTS FOR LAZY LAWYERS.

Q. What are meane incumbrances?

A. Poor relations.

Q. What is a mortgagee in possession?

A. An Uncle.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE GREENWOOD SHRIFT.

OUTSTRETCHED beneath the leafy shade
Of Windsor Forest's deepest glade,
A dying woman lay;
Three little children round her stood,
And there went up from the greenwood
A woful wail that day.

"O mother!" was the mingled cry,
"O mother, mother! do not die,
And leave us all alone."
"My blessed babes!" she tried to say,
But the faint accents died away
In a low sobbing moan.

And then, life struggling hard with death,
And fast and strong she drew her breath,
And up she raised her head;
And peering through the deep wood maze
With a long, sharp, unearthly gaze,
"Will she not come?" she said.

Just then, the parting boughs between,
A little maid's light form was seen,
All breathless with her speed;
And following close, a man came on,
(A portly man to look upon)
Who led a panting steed.

"Mother!" the little maiden cried,
Or e'er she reached the woman's side,
And kissed her clay-cold cheek—
"I have not idled in the town,
But long went wandering up and down,
The minister to seek.

"They told me here, they told me there—
I think they mocked me everywhere;
And when I found his home,
And begg'd him on my bended knee
To bring his book, and come with me,
Mother! he would not come.

"I told him how you dying lay,
And could not go in peace away
Without the minister;
I begg'd him, for dear Christ, his sake,
But oh! my heart was fit to break—
Mother! he would not stir.

"So, though my tears were blinding me,
I ran back, fast as fast could be,
To come again to you;
And here—close by—this squire I met,
Who asked (so mild!) what made me fret;
And when I told him true,

"I will go with you, child," he said,
'God sends me to this dying bed,' Mother, he's here, hard by."
While thus the little maiden spoke,
The man, his back against an oak,
Look'd on with glistening eye.

The bridle on his neck hung free,
 With quivering flank and trembling knee,
 Press'd close his bonny bay ;
 A statelier man,—a statelier steed,
 Never on greensward paced, I rede,
 Than those stood there that day.

So, while the little maiden spoke,
 The man, his back against an oak,
 Look'd on with glistening eye
 And folded arms ; and in his look,
 Something that, like a sermon book,
 Preached—"All is vanity."

But when the dying woman's face
 Turned toward him with a wishful gaze,
 He stepp'd to where she lay ;
 And kneeling down, bent over her,
 Saying,—“I am a minister—
 My sister ! let us pray.”

And well, withouten book or stole,
 (God's words were printed on his soul,)
 Into the dying ear
 He breathed, as 't were, an angel's strain,
 The things that unto life pertain,
 And death's dark shadows clear.

He spoke of sinners' lost estate,
 In Christ renewed—regenerate—
 Of God's most blest decree,
 That not a single soul should die
 Who turns repentant with the cry
 “Be merciful to me.”

He spoke of trouble, pain, and toil,
 Endured but for a little while
 In patience—faith—and love—
 Sure, in God's own good time, to be Exchanged for an eternity
 Of happiness above.

Then—as the spirit ebb'd away—
 He raised his hands and eyes to pray
 That peaceful it might pass ;
 And then—the orphan's sobs alone
 Were heard, and they knelt every one
 Close round on the green grass.

Such was the sight their wandering eyes
 Beheld, in heart-struck, mute surprise,
 Who rein'd their coursers back,
 Just as they found the long astray,
 Who, in the heat of chase that day,
 Had wander'd from their track.

But each man rein'd his pawing steed,
 And lighted down, as if agreed,
 In silence at his side ;
 And there, uncovered all, they stood—
 It was a wholesome sight and good—
 That day for mortal pride.

For of the noblest of the land
 Was that deep hush'd, bare-headed band ;

And central in the ring,
 By that dead pauper on the ground,
 Her ragged orphans clinging round,
 Knelt their anointed king.

The royal minister was George the Third. The anecdote is related on the authority of the Rev. George Crabbe.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.

BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

UNDER a spreading chestnut tree,
 The village smithy stands ;
 The smith, a mighty man is he,
 With large and sinewy hands ;
 And the muscles of his brawny arms
 Are strong as iron bands.

His hair is crisp, and black, and long,
 His face is like the tan ;
 His brow is wet with honest sweat,
 He earns whate'er he can,
 And looks the whole world in the face,
 For he owes not any man.

Week in week out, from morn till night,
 You can hear his bellows blow,
 You can hear him swing his heavy sledge,
 With measured beat and slow,
 Like the sexton ringing the bell,
 When the evening sun is low.

And children coming home from school
 Look in at the open door ;
 They love to see the flaming forge,
 And hear the bellows roar,
 And catch the burning sparks that fly
 Like chaff from a threshing floor.

He goes on Sunday to the church,
 And sits among his boys ;
 He hears the parson pray and preach,
 And he hears his daughter's voice,
 Singing in the village choir,
 And it makes his heart rejoice.

It sounds to him like her mother's voice,
 Singing in Paradise !
 He needs must think of her once more,
 How in the grave she lies,
 And with his hard rough hand he wipes
 The tears out of his eyes.

Toiling,—rejoicing,—sorrowing,
 Onward through life he goes ;
 Each morning sees some task begin,
 Each evening sees it close ;
 Something attempted, something done,
 Has earned a night's repose.

Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend,
 For the lesson thou hast taught !
 Thus at the flaming forge of life
 Our fortunes must be wrought ;
 Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
 Each burning deed and thought !

NATIONAL ACKNOWLEDGMENT FOR THE PENNY POSTAGE.

EVER since the establishment of the uniform penny postage, there has been a general feeling throughout the country, that the author ought to receive some acknowledgment of his great public service: the suggestion has been repeatedly made in the provinces; and at length, a committee has been formed in London to carry it into effect; many mercantile persons of high position and influence giving the project their sanction. The Morning Post, a persevering, not to say spiteful, opponent of the penny postage, sneers at this commercial sanction, confessing at the same time that the influential gentlemen of the city owe to Mr. HILL a quid pro quo—

“The rich men in business have made a very good thing of Mr. Hill's penny mania, and they, at all events, have substantial cause for gratitude; though to speak of ‘national gratitude’ to Mr. Hill seems rather too ridiculous. There are very many houses in business, no doubt, receiving or sending from fifty to a hundred letters per diem. Take the lower figure, and a small effort of arithmetic will enable any one to see that it makes all the difference between 5s. and 50s. a day to these houses. Call it two guineas a day, or say six hundred guineas a year, leaving out Sundays and holydays: six hundred guineas a year saved are six hundred guineas a year gained; and therefore there cannot be the slightest question that those extensive merchants, whether in the city or elsewhere, do owe a very considerable debt of gratitude to Mr. Rowland Hill.” [The Post proceeds to calculate the amount of the compensation they might be expected to make up among them—about thirty thousand pounds.]

This admission confesses too much for the immediate purpose of the Post. It is not pretended that merchants are the only persons who receive letters; and if the merchant saves his six hundred guineas a year, does not the merchant's clerk save a sum, trifling perhaps in the comparison, but proportionately considerable to him? In fact, all classes save in a somewhat similar ratio. How strongly and widely felt, then, must be that service which extends a pecuniary saving to every class, of such an amount that to individuals it is as great as £630 a year! But that is not all; it is notorious that the low postage has extended the habits of correspondence to classes who never enjoyed it before. In numberless families, as many letters, mostly from relations, are brought to the kitchen as to the parlor. It is not shown, if it is even alleged, that servants perform their work at all the worse for this signal solace and safeguard to their home attachments. Similar experiences may be adduced from others of the poorer classes. Here, then, is a vast and totally new benefit conferred on the multitudinous and humble classes, deserving every comfort, and attaining only too few; a benefit that cannot be priced in a money-value. The Post, of all journals, will be the last to set mere financial considerations above the comforts and solaces of the poor. Is he whose ingenuity, patient industry, and persevering energy, procured this benefaction for the whole people, helping all classes at the expense of none, to be excepted from the rule for public service, and to be denied, not only liberal reward, but justice? Is the country to pay for every other service—military, diplomatic, administrative—general or local—for thousands of duties which one man could perform as well as another—and to say that he who has accomplished by far the best service of the day is to be put off with some paltry set of plate? On the contrary, his claim is on the nation, and the reward should be national. There is one compensation that is eminently due, and that, we believe, would be most satisfactory to the man himself—the completion of his plan. He proposed one comprehensive scheme, of which only part was adopted; and ill effects flowing from that incompleteness have, with strange disregard of sense and justice, been charged upon the scheme itself, really untried in its integrity. To adopt the whole scheme, however, would only enhance the service to the public and strengthen the title to just acknowledgment; to neglect which, would be derogatory to the country or its official managers. The nation owes it to itself, even more than to ROWLAND HILL, suitably to remunerate the author of the penny postage; and in no way can provision for the purpose be made so appropriately as by Parliament. This must be done some day, though it does not appear to be among the good deeds which are to grace Sir ROBERT PEEL's cabinet. It is rather among his blunders, that he courts a future sentence of condemnation, in leaving this gross omission to be repaired by other and rival statesmen.—Spectator.

From the Friendship's Offering.

THE CLIENT'S STORY.

It was late one Saturday evening in December, when I received a letter, which, on opening, I found to be from Walter Moreton: and the purport of the letter was, to request my immediate presence at Cambridge, in the capacity both of a friend and of a lawyer. The letter concluded thus: “Do not delay your journey many hours after receiving this. My urgency will be explained by the change you will perceive in yours, Walter Moreton.”

I had known Walter Moreton in youth, and in manhood: we had been intimate, without having been altogether friends; and the attraction which his company possessed for me, arose rather from the shrewdness of his remarks than from any sympathy of feeling betwixt us. Of late years, I had seen comparatively little of Moreton: I knew that he had married; that he had been in ‘strained circumstances; that his father-in-law had died, and left him a rich widower; that he had married a second time, and that he was now the father of three children. From the tenor of the letter I had received, I could scarcely doubt that Walter

Moreton had been seized with some dangerous illness, and was desirous of settling his worldly affairs. My old intimacy with Moreton would of itself have prompted me to obey his summons; but the requirement of my professional aid of course increased the celerity of my obedience. Early next morning, therefore, I put myself into the Cambridge coach; and after despatching a hasty dinner at the Hoop, I walked to Walter Moreton's house in Trumpington street.

I was prepared for a change, but not certainly such a change as that which presented itself. Walter Moreton could not have been forty, but he seemed a broken-down man; gray haired,—thin visaged,—and cadaverous. His expression, too, was changed; there was an uneasy restlessness in his eye; his lips had grown thin; and he appeared, moreover, to be under the influence of extreme nervousness.

He received me with apparent kindness; thanked me for my ready compliance with his wish; and informed me at once that he had need of my professional services in the disposal of his property; but I had no difficulty in perceiving, from a certain reserve and distractedness of manner, that something beyond the mere making of a will had brought me to Cambridge. I did not of course make any observation upon the change which I observed in his appearance; but expressed a hope that his desire for my professional assistance had not arisen from any apprehensions as to the state of his health; to which he only replied, that his health was not worse than usual, but that it was always well to be prepared; and he added, "Come, Thornton, let us to business;" and to business we went.

I need scarcely say, that I was prepared for instructions to divide the father's fortune according to some rule of division,—or, perhaps, of some capricious preference, among his children—two sons and one daughter, children yet of a tender age,—and to secure a life-rent interest to his wife. Great, therefore, was my surprise when Mr. Moreton, after mentioning a few trifling legacies, named, as the sole successors of his immense fortune, two individuals unknown to me, and of whose connexion with the testator I was entirely ignorant.

I laid down my pen, and looked up:—"Mr. Moreton," said I, hesitatingly, "you have a wife and children!"

"I have children," said he; "but God preserve them from the curse of wealth that does not belong to them."

"Moreton,—Walter Moreton," said I, "you are over-scrupulous. I know indeed, that this large fortune has come to you through your first wife; but it was hers to give; she became the sole heiress of her father, when his three sons of a former marriage were unfortunately drowned in the —"

"Hush, Thornton!" interrupted he, hastily; and in a tone so altered and so singular that it would have startled me, had I not at the moment been looking in his face, and seen the expression that passed over it, and the convulsive shudder that shook his whole frame. I perceived there was a mystery, and I resolved to be at the bottom of it.

"Moreton," said I, rising and approaching him, and laying my hand gently on his shoulder, which slightly shrunk from my touch, "we were once companions,—almost friends; as a friend, as well as a lawyer, you have sent for me. There is some mystery here, of which I am sure it was your intention to disburden yourself. Whatever the secret be, it is safe with me. But I tell you plainly that if you are resolved to make beggars of your innocent children without giving a sufficient reason for it, some other than Charles Thornton must be the instrument of doing it.

"Thornton," said he, in a grave tone, and without raising his eyes, "there is a mystery,—a fearful mystery; and it shall be told this night. That done, neither you nor any man can be the friend of Walter Moreton; but he will have no occasion for friendship. Reach me some wine, Thornton, and pour it out for me; my nerves are shattered:—another glass,—now, sit down,—no, not there,—ay, ay,—one other glass, Thornton."

"I took my place in a large high-backed chair, as Walter Moreton directed me; and he, placing himself a little out of my view, spoke as follows:—

"It is now upwards of ten years, as you know, Thornton, since I married my first wife, the daughter of Mr. Bellenden,—old Bellenden the lawyer. She, you also know, was the child of a former marriage,—and that the large fortune of my father-in-law which in the end came—no matter how—to me, belonged to him, or rather to his three sons, in right of his second wife, who was also dead at the time of my marriage. I could not have indulged any expectation that this fortune would ever reach me; for although I knew very well that, failing my wife's three half-brothers, it came entirely into her father's power, yet there could be no ground for any reasonable expectation that three healthy boys would die off, and make way for Agnes. Mark me, Thornton, I did not marry for money; and the thought of the succession which afterwards opened, never entered my mind. I will tell you, Thornton, the first occasion on which the hope dawned upon me. There was an epidemic in this part of the country; and my father-in-law's three sons were seized with it at one time. All the three were in the most imminent danger; and one evening when the disease was at its height, and when my wife seemed greatly distressed at receiving a message that it was doubtful if any of the three would survive till morning—'And if they should die;' said I, within myself!—This supposition constantly recurred,—and was so willingly entertained that I lay awake the whole of that night, planning within myself the disposal of this large inheritance ; forgetting, at the time, that another life, that of my father-in-law, stood betwixt us and the succession. Next morning, however, a favorable change took place, and eventually the three youths recovered : but so strong a hold had the hopes, which had been thus suddenly created, taken of my mind, that in place of their being dissipated by the event, which naturally deprived them of any foundation they ever had, I was not only conscious of the keenest disappointment, but felt as if an untoward accident had defrauded me of something that was all but within my reach. 'How near I have been to affluence,' was a constantly recurring thought ; and when I heard every morning, that this person was dead, and that person was dead, a feeling of chagrin was invariably felt. You are perhaps incapable of understanding these feelings, Thornton ; and so was I, until the events took place which gave birth to them."

Moreton paused a moment ; but I did not interrupt him ; and, after passing his hand over his forehead, and filling out with an unsteady hand another glass of wine, he proceeded :—

"You must understand, Thornton, that these were mere thoughts, feelings, fancies : if I had stood beside the sick-beds of these boys, when the flame of life was flickering, I would not have blown it out ; if two phials had stood by, one containing health and the other death, do not suppose I would have administered the latter :—no ; I was no murderer, Thornton—no murderer—then !

"You know something of the river here ; and of the passion for boating. The three boys often indulged in this exercise ; and it sometimes happened that I accompanied them. One day about the end of August, we had spent the day at Eel-pits, and it was not far from sunset when we set out to row back to Cambridge. It was a fine calm evening when we left that place, but it soon began to rain heavily ; and in the scramble for cloaks and umbrellas, which the suddenness and heaviness of the shower occasioned, the boat was all but upset ; but it righted again, and served only as matter of mirth to the boys ; though in me a very different effect was produced. More than a year had elapsed since the presence of the epidemic had given rise to the feelings I have already confessed to, and the circumstances had been nearly—but not altogether forgotten. At that moment, however, the thoughts that at that time had continually haunted me recurred with tenfold force. 'If it had upset !' I said within myself, while sitting silent in the stern,—'If it had upset !' and the prospect of wealth again opened before me. The three boys, Thornton, were sitting shouting, and laughing, and jesting, and I sat silently in the stern, putting that question to myself. But it was only a thought, a fancy, Thornton ; I knew that no one but myself could swim ; but any thing premeditated was as far from my thoughts as yours. I only contemplated the probable results of an event which was nearly taking place.

"Well,—we continued to row and it soon fell dusk,—and then the moon rose ; and we continued to ascend the river,—ours the only boat upon it,—till we were within less than two miles of Cambridge. I had occasionally taken a turn at the oar ; but at that time I sat in the stern ; and still something continually whispered to me, 'if the boat had upset !' I need not tell you, Thornton, that little things influence the greatest events ; one of those little things occurred at this moment. I had a dog in the boat, and one of the boys said something to it in Latin. 'Don't speak Latin to the dog,' said another, 'for its master does not understand Latin.' 'Yes he does,' said the eldest, 'Mr. Moreton understands dog Latin.' This was a little matter, Thornton,—but it displeased me. There was always a good deal of assumption of superiority, especially on the part of the eldest, on account of his university education : and little annoyances of this kind were frequent. It was precisely at this moment that something dark was seen floating towards us : it chanced to come just in the glimpse of the moon on the water, and was seen at once by us all ; and as it approached nearer, till it was about to pass within oar's length of the boat—You have heard the story, Thornton,—you said, if I recollect, that you knew the three boys were"—Here Moreton suddenly stopped, and hastily drained the wine he had filled out.

"Drowned in the Cam," said I :—"yes, I knew of this misfortune ; but I did not know that you were present."

"I was—I was—present !" said Moreton, laying a peculiar emphasis on the word. "Ay, Thornton,—you've hit the word.—I was present,—but listen : I told you the dark object floated within an oar's length of the boat ; at once the three boys made a spring to the side of the boat, extending arms and oars to intercept it ; and—in an instant the boat was keel uppermost !"

Moreton pronounced the last words rapidly, and in an under tone,—and stopped : he raised the wine decanter from the table, but let it drop again. Moreton had yet said nothing to criminate himself ; the incident appeared, from his narrative, purely accidental ; and I therefore said, "Well, Moreton—the boys were unhappily drowned ; but it was the consequence of their own imprudence."

"Thornton," said he, "you are there to hear a confession ; I am here to make it ;—'tis of no use shrinking from it : fill me a glass of wine, for my hand trembles. Now,—two of the boys, the two youngest, I never saw ; as God is my judge, I believe if I had seen the youngest, I would have done my uttermost to save him. I suppose they sank beneath the boat, and floated down below the surface. The eldest, he rose close to me ; we were not twenty yards from the bank ; I could have saved him. I believe I would have saved him, if he had cried for help. I saw him but for a moment. I think, when I struck out to swim, I kicked him beneath the water—undesignedly, Thornton,—undesignedly : but I did not turn round to help him ; I made for the bank, and reached it—and it was then too late. I saw the ripple on the water, and the boat floating away ; but nothing else. Thornton—I am his murderer !”

When Moreton had pronounced this word, he seemed to be somewhat relieved, and paused. I imagined his communication had ended ; and I ventured to say that although it was only justice that the inheritance which had become his should revert to the heirs of those who had been deprived of it,—supposing them to have been deprived of it by his act,—it was proper to consider the matter coolly ; for there was such a thing as an over-sensitive conscience ; and it was perhaps possible that, in the peculiar circumstances attending the awful event, his mind had been incapable of judging correctly ; that he might have too much coupled the fancies which had preceded the event, with the event itself ; and that want of presence of mind might have been mistaken for something more criminal. I confess that, in speaking thus, although I believed that such reasoning might in some cases be correctly applied, I had little hope that it was so in the present case. There was a deliberateness in the mode of Moreton's confession that almost commanded belief ; and besides, Moreton was no creature of imagination. He had always been a shrewd and strong-minded man ; and was in fact, all his life, a man of realities.

“No, no, Thornton,” said he, “I am no fancier : believe it to be as I have told you. But if you ever could have doubted,—as I do not believe you do,—your doubts would have been dispelled by what you have yet to hear. I am not going to give you a narrative of my life ; and ~~shall say~~ nothing of the time that immediately followed the event I have related. The fortune became my father-in-law's ; and my wife became an heiress. But my present circumstances were nowise changed. Brighter prospects led to increased expenses ; and embarrassments thickened around me. You know something of these, Thornton ; and tried, as you recollect, ineffectually to extricate me from them. Meanwhile, my father-in-law, who speedily got over the loss he had sustained, spoke of his daughter,—of Agnes, my wife,—as a great heiress, and boasted and talked much of his wealth, though it made no difference in his mode of living. ‘Not one shilling, Walter, till I die,’—was constantly in his mouth : and not a shilling indeed did he ever offer, although he well knew the pressing difficulties in which we were placed. I once, and only once ventured to ask him for some advance ; but the answer was the same. ‘Not a shilling, Walter, till I die : patience, patience,—it must all go to Agnes.’

“Must I confess it, Thornton ? yes—I may confess any thing after what I have already confessed. The words ‘not a shilling till I die,’ were continually in my ears. The event that had placed fortune within my power frequently recurred to my memory ; and with it, the conviction that I was in no way benefited by it : the nearer vicinity of wealth only made the want of it more tantalizing. The ‘ifs,’ and fancies, that had formerly so frequently arisen in my mind, had all been realized. The crime,—ay, Thornton, the crime—that had placed an inheritance within my view, seemed the blacker since no advantage had attended it ; and the oft-repeated ‘not a shilling till I die,’ repeated, and re-repeated with a complacent chuckle, and on occasions the most inopportune, begot within me an insatiable longing for—ay, why mince the matter ?—for the moment when the saying should be fulfilled.

“You recollect very well, Thornton, my application to you in December, 182—, six years ago. You recollect its extreme urgency, and the partial success which attended it, sufficient however to keep me from a jail. You might well, as you did, express your surprise that my wife's father should suffer such a state of things to be ; but he could suffer any thing, save parting with his money ; he was a miser ; the love of riches had grown with their possession : and I believe he would have suffered me to rot in jail rather than draw upon his coffers.

“It was just at this time, or at most a week or two subsequent to it, that Mr. Bellenden was attacked by a complaint to which he had been long subject,—one, requiring the most prompt medical aid ; but from which, on several former occasions, he had perfectly recovered. Agnes was extremely attentive to her father ; and on Christmas evening, as we were both on the way to the sick-chamber, we met the family surgeon leaving the house.

“‘You are perhaps going to spend some time with my patient ?’ said Mr. Amwell.

“‘My husband,’ said Agnes, ‘means to spend an hour or two with my father : I have a particular engagement at present,—and am only going to ask how he does.’

“‘I have some little fears of another attack,’ said Mr. Amwell ; ‘do not be alarmed, my dear madam,—we know how to treat these things ; promptness is all that is required. It will be necessary, my dear sir,’ said Mr. Amwell, addressing me, ‘to lose no time in sending for me, should Mr. Bellenden experience another attack ; all depends upon the prompt and free use of the lancet. There is no occasion for any alarm, madam. The good old gentleman may live to eat twenty Christmas dinners yet.’

“Mr. Amwell passed on, and we entered the house, and ascended to the sick-chamber. My wife remained but a few minutes,—she had some particular engagements at home ; and as she left the room, she charged me not to lose a moment in calling Mr. Amwell, should there appear to be any occasion for his aid. She shut the door, and I seated myself in a large chair near to the bed.

"Mine was a singular situation. I, who for many years had had my hopes directed towards a great inheritance—I, who had seen, and rejoiced to see, the most formidable obstacles removed, and who had myself been instrumental in removing them, was now watching the sick-bed of the only individual who stood between me and the succession,—an individual, too, whose death I had looked forward to and had allowed myself to hope for. I could not help smiling at the singular situation in which I was placed; and as I looked towards the sick-bed, and heard only the uneasy breathing of the old man in the silence of the room, I felt—very like a criminal.

"There was a table near to me with several phials upon it. I took them up one by one, and examined them. One was labelled 'laudanum.' While I held it in my hand, all the demon was within. My pecuniary difficulties seemed to augment; the excellence of wealth to increase; the love of enjoyment grew stronger; and my estimate of the value of an old man's life weaker. At this moment, the sick man asked for drink. Thornton!—need I hesitate to confess that I was strongly tempted—but I resisted the temptation; I held the fatal phial for a few moments in my hand; laid it down, pushed it from me, and assisted the old man to his needs. But no sooner had I done this, and re-seated myself, than I began to accuse myself with inconsistency. These, thought I, are distinctions without any real difference. A youth, who stood betwixt me and fortune, was drowning; and I did not stretch out my hand to save him: there are many kinds of murder, but in all the crime is the same.

"I had nearly proved to my own satisfaction that I was a fool, when certain indications that could not be mistaken assured me that Amwell's fears were about to be realized, and they instantly were, to the fullest extent. Mr. Amwell's parting words recurred to me: 'all depends upon the prompt use of the lancet.' My heart beat quick; I rose,—hesitated,—re-seated myself,—rose again,—listened,—again sat down,—pressed my fingers on my ears, that I might hear nothing,—and leaned my head forward on the table. I continued in this posture for some time, and then started up—and listened. All was silent; I rang the bell violently; opened the door, and cried out to call Mr. Amwell instantly,—and returned to the chamber—which I believed to be no longer a chamber of sickness, but of death; and re-seated myself in the chair, with a strong persuasion that the last obstacle to fortune had been removed. But,—Thornton,—again I knew that I was, a second time, a murderer!"

Here Mr. Moreton paused, and leaned back in his chair, apparently exhausted. I again thought his communication had ended; and although I could not now address him as I had addressed him before, I was beginning to say that to make absolute beggars of his children could not be an acceptable atonement for crime,—when he interrupted me, heedless, apparently, of my having addressed him.

"In a few minutes Mr. Amwell entered the room. He approached the bed, bent over it, turned to me, and said, 'I fear it is too late, Mr. Moreton.'

" 'Perhaps not,' said I; 'at all events make the attempt.'

"Mr. Amwell did of course make the attempt; and in a few moments desisted; shook his head, and said, 'A little, and I have reason to believe only a very little too late,' and in a few minutes I was again left alone.

"Thornton, since that hour, I have been a miserable man."—Another long pause ensued, which I did not attempt to break; and Moreton at length resumed.

"Since that hour, I say, Charles Thornton, I have never known a moment's peace. My wife's tears for her father fell upon my heart like drops of fire; every look she gave me seemed to read my innermost thoughts; she never spoke that I did not imagine she was about to call me murderer. Her presence became agony to me. I withdrew from her, and from all society—for I thought every man looked suspiciously upon me; and I had no companion but conscience,—ay, conscience, Thornton,—conscience that I thought I had overcome; as well I might, for had I not seen the young and healthy sink, when I might have saved! and how could I have believed that! . . . but so it was, and is: look at me, and you will see what conscience has made of me. Agnes sickened, and as you know, died. This I felt as a relief; and for a time I breathed more freely; and I married again. But my old feelings returned, and life every day becomes more burdensome to me. Strange, that events long passed become more and more vivid,—but so it is. The evening on the Cam, and the death-chamber of old Bellenden, are alternately before me.

"Now, Thornton, you have heard all. Are you now ready to frame the will as I directed? I am possessed of a quarter of a million, and it belongs to the heirs of those for whom it was originally destined."

Some conversation here ensued, in which my object was to show that, although the large property at Moreton's disposal ought never to have been his, yet if the events which he had related had not taken place, it never could have come into the possession of those for whom he now destined it. I admitted, however, the propriety of the principle of restitution to the branches of the family in which it had originally been vested, but prevailed with Mr. Moreton, in having a competency reserved for his own children and for his wife, who married in the belief that he was able to provide for her. And upon these principles, accordingly, the testament was framed and completed the same evening.

It grew late. "Walter Moreton," said I, rising to take leave, "let this subject drop forever. When we meet again, let there be no allusion to the transactions of this evening."

"Thornton," said he, "we shall never meet again."

"There are remedies, my friend," said I—for could I refuse to call the wretched man before me friend!—"there are remedies for the accusations of conscience: apply yourself to them; if the mind were relieved by religious consolations, bodily health would return. You are yet little past the prime of life; I trust we may meet again in happier circumstances. Conscience, Moreton, is not given to us to kill, but to cure."

Moreton faintly smiled. "Yes, Thornton," said he, "there are remedies; I know them, and will not fail to seek their aid. Good night!"

I returned to the inn, and soon after retired to bed; as may easily be believed, to think of the singular revelations of the evening. For some time these thoughts kept me awake; but at length I fell asleep. My dreams were disturbed, and all about Walter Moreton. Sometimes he was swimming in the river, or standing on the bank, pointing with his finger to a human head that was just sinking; sometimes he was sitting by the bedside of old Bellenden, examining the phials, and walking on tiptoe to the door, and listening; and sometimes the scene of the past evening was renewed, when I sat and listened to his narrative. Then again, he had a phial in his hand, and uncorked it; and in raising it to his mouth, it seemed to be a small pistol; and just at this moment I awoke.

The last scene remained forcibly and vividly on my mind. It instantly occurred to me that he might have meditated suicide, and that that was the remedy of which he spoke. I looked at my watch; it was an hour past midnight. I hastily dressed, and hurried to Trumpington Street. There was a light in one of the windows. I knocked gently at the door; and at the same time applied my hand to the knob, which yielded. I hurried up-stairs, directed by the situation of the light I had seen, and entered the room. Moreton stood near to the bed, beside a small table; a phial in his hand, which, at the moment I entered, he laid down. I sprang forward and seized it. It was already empty. "Ah, my friend!" said I—but farther speech was useless. Moreton was already in the grasp of death.

A SONG FOR THE MILLION.

WHEN Harry Brougham turns a Tory,
Too late convinc'd that Whigs betray,
What can revive his tarnish'd glory?
What his desertion best repay?

The only robe his shame to cover,
To hide the brand upon his back,
And best reward this faithless lover—
That Peel can give him is—the sack.

Punch.

"TO THE BROTHERS CHEERYBLE."

IN the Times of the 7th instant there was the subjoined advertisement:—

To the BROTHERS CHEERYBLE, or any who have Hearts like theirs.—A clergyman, who will gladly communicate his name and address, desires to introduce the CASE of a GENTLEMAN, equal at least to Nickleby in birth, worthy, like him, for refinement of character, even of the best descent, like him, of spotless integrity, and powerfully beloved by friends who cannot help him, but no longer like Nickleby sustained by the warm buoyancy of youthful blood. The widowed father of young children, he has spent his all in the struggles of an unsuccessful but honorable business, and has now for 18 months been vainly seeking some stipendiary employment. To all who have ever known him he can refer for commendation. Being well versed in accounts, though possessed of education, talents, and experience, which would render him invaluable as a private secretary, he would accept with gratitude even a clerk's stool and daily bread. Any communication addressed to the Rev. B. C., post-office, Cambridge, will procure full particulars, ample references, and the introduction of the party, who is now in town, and ignorant of this attempt to serve him.

Thus it is, ink-drops beget flesh and blood. Men, women, and children, as vital as the offspring of Adam, trickle down the goose-quill of genius, and become living, breathing presences in the world. Their goodness, like Heaven's air, is a thing forever; we hug them to our hearts, creatures of thew and muscle. In the dreariest as in the pleasantest seasons, by the sweet conjuration of our thoughts they are with us—they are our friends inalienable by disappointment or wrong; our fast co-mates to the grave. Wondrous, enviable privilege of genius, that out of so many ink-drops can create immortal beings, ministrant of pleasure and goodness—can people the roughest, darkest by-ways of the world with cheerful, hopeful things of life, and quicken and ennoble the spent, desponding spirit of man with the true and beautiful!

Here is an invocation to charity, made in the name of the Brothers Cheeryble—mere shadows; spectres of the press; things begotten of an ink-bottle. Such, indeed, may the foolish think them; yet has the "Rev. B. C., post-office Cambridge," truer, wiser knowledge of the brethren. He knows them to be vitally endowed by the power of genius—as such, he knows them to be still moving about the world, shaking ten thousand hands that welcome them; and so, conjuring by the benignity of their fine natures, he asks relief for his Nickleby. May his warm, ingenuous spirit find it!—Punch.

SPANISH INTELLIGENCE.

WE understand that the celebrated case of the two Kilkenny cats—who, shut together in a garret, fought each other until nothing of them remained but their tails—has been under the serious consideration of the Five Powers, with a view to its application to the present state of Spain. It has, consequently, been resolved upon that no foreign intercourse whatever shall be permitted with that country for the next five years. That time elapsed, it will be curious to know how much will remain of all parties of the Spanish. Bets run that nothing will be found but their moustaches!—Punch.

From the Edinburgh Review.

Mémoires de Bertrand Barère; publiés par MM. HIPPOLYTE CARNOT, Membre de la Chambre des Députés, et DAVID d'Angers, Membre de l'Institut: précédés d'une Notice Historique par H. CARNOT. 4 Tomes. Paris: 1843.

THIS book has more than one title to our serious attention. It is an appeal, solemnly made to posterity by a man who played a conspicuous part in great events, and who represents himself as deeply aggrieved by the rash and malevolent censure of his contemporaries. To such an appeal we shall always give ready audience. We can perform no duty more useful to society, or more agreeable to our own feelings, than that of making, as far as our power extends, reparation to the slandered and persecuted benefactors of mankind. We therefore promptly took into our consideration this copious apology for the life of Bertrand Barère. We have made up our minds; and we now purpose to do him, by the blessing of God, full and signal justice.

It is to be observed that the appellant in this case does not come into court alone. He is attended to the bar of public opinion by two compurgators who occupy highly honorable stations. One of these is M. David of Angers, member of the Institute, an eminent sculptor, and, if we have been rightly informed, a favorite pupil, though not a kinsman, of the painter who bore the same name. The other, to whom we owe the biographical preface, is M. Hippolyte Carnot, member of the Chamber of Deputies, and son of the celebrated Director. In the judgment of M. David and of M. Hippolyte Carnot, Barère was a deserving and an ill-used man, a man who, though by no means faultless, must yet, when due allowance is made for the force of circumstances and the infirmity of human nature, be considered as on the whole entitled to our esteem. It will be for the public to determine, after a full hearing, whether the editors have, by thus connecting their names with that of Barère, raised his character or lowered their own.

We are not conscious that, when we opened this book, we were under the influence of any feeling likely to pervert our judgment. Undoubtedly we had long entertained a most unfavorable opinion of Barère; but to this opinion we were not tied by any passion or by any interest. Our dislike was a reasonable dislike, and might have been removed by reason. Indeed our expectation was, that these Memoirs would in some measure clear Barère's fame. That he could vindicate himself from all the charges which had been brought against him, we knew to be impossible; and his editors admit that he has not done so. But we thought it highly probable that some grave accusations would be refuted, and that many offences to which he would have been forced to plead guilty would be greatly extenuated. We were not disposed to be severe. We were fully aware that temptations such as those to which the members of the Convention and of the Committee of Public Safety were exposed must try severely the strength of the firmest virtue. Indeed our inclination has always been to regard with an indulgence, which to some rigid moralists appears excessive, those faults into which gentle and noble spirits are sometimes hurried by the excitement of conflict, by the maddening influence of sympathy, and by ill-regulated zeal for a public cause.

With such feelings we read this book, and compared it with other accounts of the events in which Barère bore a part. It is now our duty to express the opinion to which this investigation has led us.

Our opinion then is this, that Barère approached nearer than any person mentioned in history or fiction, whether man or devil, to the idea of consummate and universal depravity. In him the qualities which are the proper objects of hatred, and the qualities which are the proper objects of contempt, preserve an exquisite and absolute harmony. In almost every particular sort of wickedness he has had rivals. His sensuality was immoderate; but this was a failing common to him with many great and amiable men. There have been many men as cowardly as he, some as cruel, a few as mean, a few as impudent. There may also have been as great liars, though we never met with them or read of them. But when we put everything together, sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity, the result is something which in a novel we should condemn as caricature, and to which, we venture to say, no parallel can be found in history.

It would be grossly unjust, we acknowledge, to try a man situated as Barère was by a severe standard. Nor have we done so. We have formed our opinion of him by comparing him, not with politicians of stainless character, not with Chancellor D'Aguesseau, or General Washington, or Mr. Wilberforce, or Earl Grey, but with his own colleagues of the Mountain. That party included a considerable number of the worst men that ever lived; but we see in it nothing like Barère. Compared with him, Fouché seems honest; Billaud seems humane; Hébert seems to rise into dignity. Every other chief of a party, says M. Hippolyte Carnot, has found apologists: one set of men exalts the Girondists; another set justifies Danton; a third deifies Robespierre: but Barère has remained without a defender. We venture to suggest a very simple solution of this phenomenon. All the other chiefs of parties had some good qualities, and Barère had none. The genius, courage, patriotism, and humanity of the Girondist statesmen, more than atoned for what was culpable in their conduct, and should have protected them from the insult of being compared with such a thing as Barère. Danton and Robespierre were indeed bad men; but in both of them some important parts of the mind remained sound. Danton was brave and resolute, fond of pleasure, of power, and of distinction, with vehement passions, with lax principles, but with some kind and manly feelings, capable of great crimes, but capable also of friendship and of compassion. He, therefore, naturally finds admirers among persons of bold and sanguine dispositions. Robespierre was a vain, envious, and suspicious man, with a hard heart, weak nerves, and a gloomy temper. But we cannot with truth deny that he was, in the vulgar sense of the word, disinterested, that his private life was correct, or that he was sincerely zealous for his own system of politics and morals. He, therefore, naturally finds admirers among honest but moody and bitter democrats. If no class has taken the reputation of Barère under its patronage, the reason is plain : Barère had not a single virtue, nor even the semblance of one.

It is true that he was not, as far as we are able to judge, originally of a savage disposition ; but this circumstance seems to us only to aggravate his guilt. There are some unhappy men constitutionally prone to the darker passions, men all whose blood is gall, and to whom bitter words and harsh actions are as natural as snarling and biting to a ferocious dog. To come into the world with this wretched mental disease is a greater calamity than to be born blind or deaf. A man who, having such a temper, keeps it in subjection, and constrains himself to behave habitually with justice and humanity towards those who are in his power, seems to us worthy of the highest admiration. There have been instances of this self-command ; and they are among the most signal triumphs of philosophy and religion. On the other hand, a man who, having been blessed by nature with a bland disposition, gradually brings himself to inflict misery on his fellow-creatures with indifference, with satisfaction, and at length with a hideous rapture, deserves to be regarded as a portent of wickedness ; and such a man was Barère. The history of his downward progress is full of instruction. Weakness, cowardice, and fickleness were born with him ; the best quality which he received from nature was a good temper. These, it is true, are not very promising materials ; yet out of materials as unpromising, high sentiments of piety and of honor have sometimes made martyrs and heroes. Rigid principles often do for feeble minds what stays do for feeble bodies. But Barère had no principles at all. His character was equally destitute of natural and of acquired strength. Neither in the commerce of life, nor in books, did we ever become acquainted with any mind so unstable, so utterly destitute of tone, so incapable of independent thought and earnest preference, so ready to take impressions and so ready to lose them. He resembled those creepers which must lean on something, and which, as soon as their prop is removed, fall down in utter helplessness. He could no more stand up, erect and self-supported, in any cause, than the ivy can rear itself like the oak, or the wild vine shoot to heaven like the cedar of Lebanon. It is barely possible that, under good guidance and in favorable circumstances, such a man might have slipped through life without discredit. But the unseaworthy craft, which even in still water would have been in danger of going down from its own rottenness, was launched on a raging ocean, amidst a storm in which a whole armada of gallant ships was cast away. The weakest and most servile of human beings found himself on a sudden an actor in a Revolution which convulsed the whole civilized world. At first he fell under the influence of humane and moderate men, and talked the language of humanity and moderation. But he soon found himself surrounded by fierce and resolute spirits, scared by no danger and restrained by no scruple. He had to choose whether he would be their victim or their accomplice. His choice was soon made. He tasted blood, and felt no loathing : he tasted it again, and liked it well. Cruelty became with him, first a habit, then a passion, at last a madness. So complete and rapid was the degeneracy of his nature, that within a very few months after the time when he had passed for a good-natured man, he had brought himself to look on the despair and misery of his fellow-creatures, with a glee resembling that of the fiends whom Dante saw watching the pool of seething pitch in Malebolge. He had many associates in guilt ; but he distinguished himself from them all by the bacchanalian exultation which he seemed to feel in the work of death. He was drunk with innocent and noble blood, laughed and shouted as he butchered, and howled strange songs and reeled in strange dances amidst the carnage. Then came a sudden and violent turn of fortune. The miserable man was hurled down from the height of power to hopeless ruin and infamy. The shock sobered him at once. The fumes of his horrible intoxication passed away. But he was now so irrecoverably depraved, that the discipline of adversity only drove him further into wickedness. Ferocious vices, of which he had never been suspected, had been developed in him by power. Another class of vices, less hateful perhaps, but more despicable, was now developed in him by poverty and disgrace. Having appalled the whole world by great crimes perpetrated under the pretence of zeal for liberty, he became the meanest of all the tools of despotism. It is not easy to settle the order of precedence among his vices ; but we are inclined to think that his baseness was, on the whole, a rarer and more marvellous thing than his cruelty.

This is the view which we have long taken of Barère's character ; but, till we read these Memoirs, we held our opinion with the diffidence which becomes a judge who has only heard one side. The case seemed strong, and in parts unanswerable : yet we did not know what the accused party might have to say for himself ; and, not being much inclined to take our fellow-creatures either for angels of light or for angels of darkness, we could not but feel some suspicion that his offences had been exaggerated. That suspicion is now at an end. The vindication is before us. It occupies four volumes. It was the work of forty years. It would be absurd to suppose that it does not refute every serious charge which admitted of refutation. How many serious charges, then, are here refuted? Not a single one. Most of the imputations which have been thrown on Barère he does not even notice. In such cases, of course, judgment must go against him by default. The fact is, that nothing can be more meagre and uninteresting than his account of the great public transactions in which he was engaged. He gives us hardly a word of new information respecting the proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety; and, by way of compensation, tells us long stories about things which happened before he emerged from obscurity, and after he had again sunk into it. Nor is this the worst. As soon as he ceases to write trifles, he begins to write lies; and such lies! A man who has never been within the tropics does not know what a thunder storm means; a man who has never looked on Niagara has but a faint idea of a cataract; and he who has not read Barère's Memoirs may be said not to know what it is to lie. Among the numerous classes which make up the great genus Mendacium, the Mendacium Vasconicum, or Gascon lie, has, during some centuries, been highly esteemed as peculiarly circumstantial and peculiarly impudent; and among the Mendacia Vasconica, the Mendacium Barerianum is, without doubt, the finest species. It is indeed a superb variety, and quite throws into the shade some Mendacia which we were used to regard with admiration. The Mendacium Wrathalianum, for example, though by no means to be despised, will not sustain the comparison for a moment. Seriously, we think that M. Hippolyte Carnot is much to blame in this matter. We can hardly suppose him to be worse read than ourselves in the history of the Convention, a history which must interest him deeply, not only as a Frenchman, but also as a son. He must, therefore, be perfectly aware that many of the most important statements which these volumes contain are falsehoods, such as Corneille's Dorante, or Molière's Scapin, or Colin d'Harleville's Monsieur de Crac would have been ashamed to utter. We are far, indeed, from holding M. Hippolyte Carnot answerable for Barère's want of veracity. But M. Hippolyte Carnot has arranged these Memoirs, has introduced them to the world by a laudatory preface, has described them as documents of great historical value, and has illustrated them by notes. We cannot but think that, by acting thus, he contracted some obligations of which he does not seem to have been at all aware; and that he ought not to have suffered any monstrous fiction to go forth under the sanction of his name, without adding a line at the foot of the page for the purpose of cautioning the reader.

We will content ourselves at present with pointing out two instances of Barère's wilful and deliberate mendacity; namely, his account of the death of Marie Antoinette, and his account of the death of the Girondists. His account of the death of Marie Antoinette is as follows:—"Robespierre in his turn proposed that the members of the Capet family should be banished, and that Marie Antoinette should be brought to trial before the Revolutionary Tribunal. He would have been better employed in concerting military measures which might have repaired our disasters in Belgium, and might have arrested the progress of the enemies of the Revolution in the west."—(Vol. ii., p. 312.)

Now, it is notorious that Marie Antoinette was sent before the Revolutionary Tribunal, not at Robespierre's instance, but in direct opposition to Robespierre's wishes. We will cite a single authority, which is quite decisive. Bonaparte, who had no conceivable motive to disguise the truth, who had the best opportunities of knowing the truth, and who, after his marriage with the Archduchess, naturally felt an interest in the fate of his wife's kinswoman, distinctly affirmed that Robespierre opposed the trying of the Queen.* Who, then, was the person who really did propose that the Capet family should be banished, and that Marie Antoinette should be tried? Full information will be found in the Moniteur.† From that valuable record it appears that, on the first of August, 1793, an orator deputed by the Committee of Public Safety addressed the Convention in a long and elaborate discourse. He asked, in passionate language, how it happened that the enemies of the republic still continued to hope for success. "Is it," he cried, "because we have too long forgotten the crimes of the Austrian woman? Is it because we have shown so strange an indulgence to the race of our ancient tyrants? It is time that this unwise apathy should cease; it is time to extirpate from the soil of the republic the last roots of royalty. As for the children of Louis the conspirator, they are hostages for the Republic. The charge of their maintenance shall be reduced to what is necessary for the food and keep of two individuals. The public treasure shall no longer be lavished on creatures who have too long been considered as privileged. But behind them lurks a woman who has been the cause of all the disasters of France, and whose share in every project adverse to the Revolution has long been known. National justice claims its rights over her. It is to the tribunal appointed for the trial of conspirators that she ought to be sent. It is only by striking the Austrian woman that you can make Francis and George, Charles and William, sensible of the crimes which their ministers and their armies have committed." The speaker concluded by moving, that Marie Antoinette should be brought to judgment, and should, for that end, be forthwith transferred to the Conciergerie; and that all the members of the house of Capet, with the exception of those who were under the sword of the law, and of the two children of Louis, should be banished from the French territory. The motion was carried without debate.

* O'Meara's Voice from St. Helena, ii, 170.

† Moniteur, 2d, 7th, and 9th of August, 1793.

Now, who was the person who made this speech and this motion? It was Barère himself. It is clear, then, that Barère attributed his own mean insolence and barbarity to one who, whatever his crimes may have been, was in this matter innocent. The only question remaining is, whether Barère was misled by his memory, or wrote a deliberate falsehood.

We are convinced that he wrote a deliberate falsehood. His memory is described by his editors as remarkably good, and must have been bad indeed if he could not remember such a fact as this. It is true that the number of murders in which he subsequently bore a part was so great, that he might well confound one with another, that he might well forget what part of the daily hecatomb was consigned to death by himself, and what part by his colleagues. But two circumstances make it quite incredible that the share which he took in the death of Marie Antoinette should have escaped his recollection. She was one of his earliest victims. She was one of his most illustrious victims. The most hardened assassin remembers the first time that he shed blood; and the widow of Louis was no ordinary sufferer. If the question had been about some milliner, butchered for hiding in her garret her brother who had let drop a word against the Jacobin club—if the question had been about some old nun, dragged to death for having mumbled what were called fanatical words over her beads—Barère's memory might well have deceived him. It would be as unreasonable to expect him to remember all the wretches whom he slew, as all the pinches of snuff that he took. But though Barère murdered many hundreds of human beings, he murdered only one Queen. That he, a small country lawyer, who, a few years before, would have thought himself honored by a glance or a word from the daughter of so many Cæsars, should call her the Austrian woman, should send her from jail to jail, should deliver her over to the executioner, was surely a great event in his life. Whether he had reason to be proud of it or ashamed of it, is a question on which we may perhaps differ from his editors; but they will admit, we think, that he could not have forgotten it.

We, therefore, confidently charge Barère with having written a deliberate falsehood; and we have no hesitation in saying, that we never, in the course of any historical researches that we have happened to make, fell in with a falsehood so audacious, except only the falsehood which we are about to expose.

Of the proceeding against the Girondists, Barère speaks with just severity. He calls it an atrocious injustice perpetrated against the legislators of the republic. He complains that distinguished deputies, who ought to have been readmitted to their seats in the Convention, were sent to the scaffold as conspirators. The day, he exclaims, was a day of mourning for France. It mutilated the national representation; it weakened the sacred principle, that the delegates of the people were inviolable. He protests that he had no share in the guilt. "I have had," he says, "the patience to go through the Moniteur, extracting all the charges brought against deputies, and all the decrees for arresting and impeaching deputies. Nowhere will you find my name. I never brought a charge against any of my colleagues, or made a report against any, or drew up an impeachment against any."*

Now, we affirm that this is a lie. We affirm that Barère himself took the lead in the proceedings of the Convention against the Girondists. We affirm that he, on the twenty-eighth of July, 1793, proposed a decree for bringing nine Girondist deputies to trial, and for putting to death sixteen other Girondist deputies without any trial at all. We affirm that, when the accused deputies had been brought to trial, and when some apprehension arose that their eloquence might produce an effect even on the Revolutionary Tribunal, Barère did, on the 8th of Brumaire, second a motion for a decree authorizing the tribunal to decide without hearing out the defence; and, for the truth of every one of these things so affirmed by us, we appeal to that very Moniteur to which Barère has dared to appeal.†

What M. Hippolyte Carnot, knowing, as he must know, that this book contains such falsehoods as those which we have exposed, can have meant, when he described it as a valuable addition to our stock of historical information, passes our comprehension. When a man is not ashamed to tell lies about events which took place before hundreds of witnesses, and which are recorded in well-known and accessible books, what credit can we give to his account of things done in corners? No historian who does not wish to be laughed at will ever cite the unsupported authority of Barère as sufficient to prove any fact whatever. The only thing, as far as we can see, on which these volumes throw any light, is the exceeding baseness of the author.

So much for the veracity of the Memoirs. In a literary point of view, they are beneath criticism. They are as shallow, flippant, and affected, as Barère's oratory in the Convention. They are also, what his oratory in the Convention was not, utterly insipid. In fact, they are the mere dregs and rinsings of a bottle, of which even the first froth was but of very questionable flavor.

* Vol. ii., 407.

† Moniteur, 31st of July, 1793, and Nonidi, first Decade of Brumaire, in the year 2.

We will now try to present our readers with a sketch of this man's life. We shall, of course, make very sparing use indeed of his own Memoirs; and never without distrust, except where they are confirmed by other evidence.

Bertrand Barère was born in the year 1755, at Tarbes in Gascony. His father was the proprietor of a small estate at Vieuzac, in the beautiful vale of Argeles. Bertrand always loved to be called Barère de Vieuzac, and flattered himself with the hope that, by the help of this feudal addition to his name, he might pass for a gentleman. He was educated for the bar at Toulouse, the seat of one of the most celebrated parliaments of the kingdom, practised as an advocate with considerable success, and wrote some small pieces, which he sent to the principal literary societies in the south of France. Among provincial towns, Toulouse seems to have been remarkably rich in indifferent versifiers and critics. It gloried especially in one venerable institution, called the Academy of the Floral Games. This body held every year a grand meeting, which was a subject of intense interest to the whole city, and at which flowers of gold and silver were given as prizes for odes, for idyls, and for something that was called eloquence. These bounties produced of course the ordinary effect of bounties, and turned people who might have been thriving attorneys and useful apothecaries into small wits and bad poets. Barère does not appear to have been so lucky as to obtain any of these precious flowers; but one of his performances was mentioned with honor. At Montauban he was more fortunate. The Academy of that town bestowed on him several prizes, one for a panegyric on Louis the Twelfth, in which the blessings of monarchy and the loyalty of the French nation were set forth; and another for a panegyric on poor Franc de Pompignan, in which, as may easily be supposed, the philosophy of the eighteenth century was sharply assailed. Then Barère found an old stone inscribed with three Latin words, and wrote a dissertation upon it, which procured him a seat in a learned assembly, called the Toulouse Academy of Sciences, Inscriptions, and Polite Literature. At length the doors of the Academy of the Floral Games were opened to so much merit. Barère, in his thirty-third year, took his seat as one of that illustrious brotherhood, and made an inaugural oration which was greatly admired. He apologizes for recounting these triumphs of his youthful genius. We own that we cannot blame him for dwelling long on the least disgraceful portion of his existence. To send in declamations for prizes offered by provincial academies, is indeed no very useful or dignified employment for a bearded man; but it would have been well if Barère had always been so employed.

In 1785, he married a young lady of considerable fortune. Whether she was in other respects qualified to make a home happy, is a point respecting which we are imperfectly informed. In a little work, entitled Melancholy Pages, which was written in 1797, Barère avers that his marriage was one of mere convenience, that at the altar his heart was heavy with sorrowful forebodings, that he turned pale as he pronounced the solemn "Yes," that unbidden tears rolled down his cheeks, that his mother shared his presentiment, and that the evil omen was accomplished. "My marriage," he says, "was one of the most unhappy of marriages." So romantic a tale, told by so noted a liar, did not command our belief. We were, therefore, not much surprised to discover that, in his Memoirs, he calls his wife a most amiable woman, and declares that, after he had been united to her six years, he found her as amiable as ever. He complains, indeed, that she was too much attached to royalty and to the old superstition; but he assures us that his respect for her virtues induced him to tolerate her prejudices. Now Barère, at the time of his marriage, was himself a Royalist and a Catholic. He had gained one prize by flattering the throne, and another by defending the church. It is hardly possible, therefore, that disputes about politics or religion should have embittered his domestic life till some time after he became a husband. Our own guess is, that his wife was, as he says, a virtuous and amiable woman, and that she did her best to make him happy during some years. It seems clear that, when circumstances developed the latent atrocity of his character, she could no longer endure him, refused to see him, and sent back his letters unopened. Then it was, we imagine, that he invented the fable about his distress on his wedding day.

In 1788, Barère paid his first visit to Paris, attended reviews, heard Laharpe at the Lyceum, and Condorcet at the Academy of Sciences, stared at the envoys of Tippoo Saib, saw the royal family dine at Versailles, and kept a journal, in which he noted down adventures and speculations. Some parts of this journal are printed in the first volume of the work before us, and are certainly most characteristic. The worst vices of the writer had not yet shown themselves; but the weakness which was the parent of those vices appears in every line. His levity, his inconsistency, his servility, were already what they were to the last. All his opinions, all his feelings, spin round and round like a weathercock in a whirlwind. Nay, the very impressions which he receives through his senses are not the same two days together. He sees Louis the Sixteenth, and is so much blinded by loyalty as to find his majesty handsome. "I fixed my eyes," he says, "with a lively curiosity on his fine countenance, which I thought open and noble." The next time that the king appears, all is altered. His majesty's eyes are without the smallest expression; he has a vulgar laugh which seems like idiocy, an ignoble figure, an awkward gait, and the look of a big boy ill brought up. It is the same with more important questions. Barère is for the parliaments on the Monday and against the parliaments on the Tuesday, for feudality in the morning and against feudality in the afternoon. One day he admires the English constitution: then he shudders to think that, in the struggles by which that constitution had been obtained, the barbarous islanders had murdered a king, and gives the preference to the constitution of Bearn. Bearn, he says, has a sublime constitution, a beautiful constitution. There the nobility and clergy meet in one house and the Commons in another. If the houses differ, the king has the casting vote. A few weeks later we find him raving against the principles of this sublime and beautiful constitution. To admit deputies of the nobility and clergy into the legislature is, he says, neither more nor less than to admit enemies of the nation into the legislature.

In this state of mind, without one settled purpose or opinion, the slave of the last word, royalist, aristocrat, democrat, according to the prevailing sentiment of the coffee-house or drawing-room into which he had just looked, did Barère enter into public life. The States-General had been summoned. Barère went down to his own province, was there elected one of the representatives of the Third Estate, and returned to Paris in May, 1789.

A great crisis, often predicted, had at last arrived. In no country, we conceive, have intellectual freedom and political servitude existed together so long as in France, during the seventy or eighty years which preceded the last convocation of the Orders. Ancient abuses and new theories flourished in equal vigor side by side. The people, having no constitutional means of checking even the most flagitious misgovernment, were indemnified for oppression by being suffered to luxuriate in anarchical speculation, and to deny or ridicule every principle on which the institutions of the state reposed. Neither those who attribute the downfall of the old French institutions to the public grievances, nor those who attribute it to the doctrines of the philosophers, appear to us to have taken into their view more than one half of the subject. Grievances as heavy have often been endured without producing a revolution; doctrines as bold have often been propounded without producing a revolution. The question, whether the French nation was alienated from its old polity by the follies and vices of the Viziers and Sultanas who pillaged and disgraced it, or by the writings of Voltaire and Rousseau, seems to us as idle as the question whether it was fire or gunpowder that blew up the mills at Hounslow. Neither cause would have sufficed alone. Tyranny may last through ages where discussion is suppressed. Discussion may safely be left free by rulers who act on popular principles. But combine a press like that of London, with a government like that of St. Petersburg, and the inevitable effect will be an explosion that will shake the world. So it was in France. Despotism and License, mingling in unblended union, engendered that mighty revolution in which the lineaments of both parents were strangely blended. The long gestation was accomplished; and Europe saw, with mixed hope and terror, that agonizing travail and that portentous birth.

Among the crowd of legislators which at this conjuncture poured from all the provinces of France into Paris, Barère made no contemptible figure. The opinions which he for the moment professed were popular, yet not extreme. His character was fair; his personal advantages are said to have been considerable; and, from the portrait which is prefixed to these Memoirs, and which represents him as he appeared in the Convention, we should judge that his features must have been strikingly handsome, though we think that we can read in them cowardice and meanness very legibly written by the hand of God. His conversation was lively and easy; his manners remarkably good for a country lawyer. Women of rank and wit said he was the only man who, on his first arrival from a remote province, had that indescribable air which it was supposed that Paris alone could give. His eloquence, indeed, was by no means so much admired in the capital as it had been by the ingenious academicians of Montauban and Toulouse. His style was thought very bad; and very bad, if a foreigner may venture to judge, it continued to the last. It would, however, be unjust to deny that he had some talents for speaking and writing. His rhetoric, though deformed by every imaginable fault of taste, from bombast down to buffoonery, was not wholly without force and vivacity. He had also one quality which, in active life, often gives fourth-rate men an advantage over first-rate men. Whatever he could do, he could do without effort, at any moment, in any abundance, and on any side of any question. There was, indeed, a perfect harmony between his moral character and his intellectual character. His temper was that of a slave; his abilities were exactly those which qualified him to be a useful slave. Of thinking to purpose, he was utterly incapable; but he had wonderful readiness in arranging and expressing thoughts furnished by others.

In the National Assembly he had no opportunity of displaying the full extent either of his talents or of his vices. He was indeed eclipsed by much abler men. He went, as was his habit, with the stream, spoke occasionally with some success, and edited a journal called the Point du Jour, in which the debates of the Assembly were reported.

He at first ranked by no means among the violent reformers. He was not friendly to that new division of the French territory which was among the most important changes introduced by the revolution, and was especially unwilling to see his native province dismembered. He was entrusted with the task of framing Reports on the Woods and Forests. Louis was exceedingly anxious about this matter; for his majesty was a keen sportsman, and would much rather have gone without the Veto, or the prerogative of making peace and war, than without his hunting and shooting. Gentlemen of the royal household were sent to Barère, in order to intercede for the deer and pheasants. Nor was this intercession unsuccessful. The reports were so drawn, that Barère was afterwards accused of having dishonestly sacrificed the interests of the public to the tastes of the court. To one of these reports he had the inconceivable folly and bad taste to prefix a punning motto from Virgil, fit only for such essays as he had been in the habit of composing for the Floral Games—

“Si canimus sylvas, sylvæ sint Consule dignæ.”

This literary foppery was one of the few things in which he was consistent. Royalist or Girondist, Jacobin or Imperialist, he was always a Trissotin.

As the monarchical party became weaker and weaker, Barère gradually estranged himself more and more from it, and drew closer and closer to the republicans. It would seem that, during this transition, he was for a time closely connected with the family of Orleans. It is certain that he was entrusted with the guardianship of the celebrated Pamela, afterwards Lady Edward Fitzgerald; and it was asserted that he received during some years a pension of twelve thousand francs from the Palais Royal.

At the end of September, 1791, the labors of the National Assembly terminated, and those of the first and last Legislative Assembly commenced.

It had been enacted that no member of the National Assembly should sit in the Legislative Assembly; a preposterous and mischievous regulation, to which the disasters which followed must in part be ascribed. In England, what would be thought of a parliament, which did not contain one single person who had ever sat in parliament before! Yet it may safely be affirmed, that the number of Englishmen, who, never having taken any share in public affairs, are yet well qualified, by knowledge and observation, to be members of the legislature, is at least a hundred times as great as the number of Frenchmen who were so qualified in 1791. How, indeed, should it have been otherwise! In England, centuries of representative government have made all educated people in some measure statesmen. In France, the National Assembly had probably been composed of as good materials as were then to be found. It had undoubtedly removed a vast mass of abuses; some of its members had read and thought much about theories of government; and others had shown great oratorical talents. But that kind of skill which is required for the constructing, launching, and steering of a polity was lamentably wanting, for it is a kind of skill to which practice contributes more than books. Books are indeed useful to the politician, as they are useful to the navigator and to the surgeon. But the real navigator is formed on the waves; the real surgeon is formed at bedsides; and the conflicts of free states are the real school of constitutional statesmen. The National Assembly had, however, now served an apprenticeship of two laborious and eventful years. It had, indeed, by no means finished its education; but it was no longer, as on the day when it met, altogether rude to political functions. Its later proceedings contain abundant proof that the members had profited by their experience. Beyond all doubt, there was not in France any equal number of persons possessing in an equal degree the qualities necessary for the judicious direction of public affairs; and, just at this moment, these legislators, misled by a childish wish to display their own disinterestedness, deserted the duties which they had half learned, and which nobody else had learned at all, and left their hall to a second crowd of novices, who had still to master the first rudiments of political business. When Barère wrote his Memoirs, the absurdity of this Self-denying Ordinance had been proved by events, and was, we believe, acknowledged by all parties. He accordingly, with his usual mendacity, speaks of it in terms implying that he had opposed it. There was, he tells us, no good citizen who did not regret this fatal vote. Nay, all wise men, he says, wished the National Assembly to continue its sittings as the first Legislative Assembly. But no attention was paid to the wishes of the enlightened friends of liberty; and the generous but fatal suicide was perpetrated. Now the fact is, that Barère, far from opposing this ill-advised measure, was one of those who most eagerly supported it; that he described it from the tribune as wise and magnanimous; and that he assigned, as his reasons for taking this view, some of those phrases in which orators of his class delight, and which, on all men who have the smallest insight into politics, produce an effect very similar to that of ipecacuanha. “Those,” he said, “who have framed a constitution for their country, are, so to speak, out of the pale of that social state of which they are the authors; for creative power is not in the same sphere with that which it has created.”

M. Hippolyte Carnot has noticed this untruth, and attributes it to mere forgetfulness. We leave it to him to reconcile his very charitable supposition with what he elsewhere says of the remarkable excellence of Barère's memory.

Many members of the National Assembly were indemnified for the sacrifice of legislative power, by appointments in various departments of the public service. Of these fortunate persons Barère was one. A high Court of Appeal had just been instituted. This court was to sit at Paris; but its jurisdiction was to extend over the whole realm, and the departments were to choose the judges. Barère was nominated by the department of the Upper Pyrenees, and took his seat in the Palace of Justice. He asserts, and our readers may, if they choose, believe, that it was about this time in con-temptation to make him Minister of the Interior, and that, in order to avoid so grave a responsibility, he obtained permission to pay a visit to his native place. It is certain that he left Paris early in the year 1792, and passed some months in the south of France.

In the mean time, it became clear that the constitution of 1791 would not work. It was, indeed, not to be expected, that a constitution new both in its principles and its details would at first work easily. Had the chief magistrate enjoyed the entire confidence of the people, had he performed his part with the utmost zeal, fidelity, and ability, had the representative body included all the wisest statesmen of France, the difficulties might still have been found insuperable. But, in fact, the experiment was made under every disadvantage. The king, very naturally, hated the constitution. In the Legislative Assembly were men of genius and men of good intentions, but not a single man of experience. Nevertheless, if France had been suffered to settle her own affairs without foreign interference, it is possible that the calamities which followed might have been averted. The king who, with many good qualities, was sluggish and sensual, might have found compensation for his lost prerogatives in his immense civil list, in his palaces and hunting grounds, in soups, Perigord pies, and champagne. The people, finding themselves secure in the enjoyment of the valuable reforms which the National Assembly had, in the midst of all its errors, effected, would not have been easily excited by demagogues to acts of atrocity; or, if acts of atrocity had been committed, those acts would probably have produced a speedy and violent reaction. Had tolerable quiet been preserved during a few years, the constitution of 1791 might perhaps have taken root, might have gradually acquired the strength which time alone can give, and might, with some modifications which were undoubtedly needed, have lasted down to the present time. The European coalition against the Revolution extinguished all hope of such a result. The deposition of Louis was, in our opinion, the necessary consequence of that coalition. The question was now no longer, whether the king should have an absolute Veto or a suspensive Veto, whether there should be one chamber or two chambers, whether the members of the representative body should be re-eligible or not; but whether France should belong to the French. The independence of the nation, the integrity of the territory, were at stake; and we must say plainly, that we cordially approve of the conduct of those Frenchmen who, at that conjuncture, resolved, like our own Blake, to play the men for their country, under whatever form of government their country might fall.

It seems to us clear that the war with the Continental coalition was, on the side of France, at first a defensive war, and therefore a just war. It was not a war for small objects, or against despi-cable enemies. On the event were staked all the dearest interests of the French people. Foremost among the threatening powers appeared two great and martial monarchies, either of which, situated as France then was, might be regarded as a formidable assailant. It is evident that, under such circumstances, the French could not, without extreme imprudence, entrust the supreme administration of their affairs to any person whose attachment to the national cause admitted of doubt. Now, it is no reproach to the memory of Louis to say, that he was not attached to the national cause. Had he been so, he would have been something more than man. He had held absolute power, not by usurpation, but by the accident of birth and by the ancient polity of the kingdom. That power he had, on the whole, used with lenity. He had meant well by his people. He had been willing to make to them, of his own mere motion, concessions such as scarcely any other sovereign has ever made except under duress. He had paid the penalty of faults not his own, of the haughtiness and ambition of some of his predecessors, of the dissoluteness and baseness of others. He had been vanquished, taken captive, led in triumph, put in ward. He had escaped; he had been caught; he had been dragged back like a runaway galley-slave to the oar. He was still a state prisoner. His quiet was broken by daily affronts and lampoons. Accustomed from the cradle to be treated with profound reverence, he was now forced to command his feelings, while men who, a few months before, had been hackney writers or country attorneys, sat in his presence with covered heads, and addressed him in the easy tone of equality. Conscious of fair intentions, sensible of hard usage, he doubtless detested the Revolution; and, while charged with the conduct of the war against the confederates, pined in secret for the sight of the German eagles and the sound of the German drums. We do not blame him for this. But can we blame those who, being resolved to defend the work of the National Assembly against the interference of strangers, were not disposed to have him at their head in the fearful struggle which was approaching? We have nothing to say in defence or extenuation of the insolence, injustice, and cruelty, with which, after the victory of the republicans, he and his family were treated. But this we say, that the French had only one alternative, to deprive him of the powers of first magistrate, or to ground their arms and submit patiently to foreign dictation. The events of the tenth of August sprang inevitably from the league of Pillnitz. The king's palace was stormed; his guards were slaughtered. He was suspended from his regal functions; and the Legislative Assembly invited the nation to elect an extraordinary Convention, with the full powers which the conjuncture required. To this Convention the members of the National Assembly were eligible; and Barère was chosen by his own department.

The Convention met on the twenty-first of September, 1792. The first proceedings were unanimous. Royalty was abolished by acclamation. No objections were made to this great change, and no reasons were assigned for it. For certainly we cannot honor with the name of reasons such apophthegms, as that kings are in the moral world what monsters are in the physical world; and that the history of kings is the martyrology of nations. But though the discussion was worthy only of a debating-club of schoolboys, the resolution to which the Convention came seems to have been that which sound policy dictated. In saying this, we do not mean to express an opinion that a republic is, either in the abstract the best form of government, or is, under ordinary circumstances, the form of government best suited to the French people. Our own opinion is, that the best governments which have ever existed in the world have been limited monarchies; and that France, in particular, has never enjoyed so much prosperity and freedom as under a limited monarchy. Nevertheless, we approve of the vote of the Convention which abolished kingly government. The interference of foreign powers had brought on a crisis which made extraordinary measures necessary. Hereditary monarchy may be, and we believe that it is, a very useful institution in a country like France. And masts are very useful parts of a ship. But, if the ship is on her beam-ends, it may be necessary to cut the masts away. When once she has righted, she may come safe into port under jury rigging, and there be completely repaired. But, in the mean time, she must be hacked with unsparing hand, lest that which, under ordinary circumstances, is an essential part of her fabric, should, in her extreme distress, sink her to the bottom. Even so there are political emergencies in which it is necessary that governments should be mutilated of their fair proportions for a time, lest they be cast away forever; and with such an emergency the Convention had to deal. The first object of a good Frenchman should have been to save France from the fate of Poland. The first requisite of a government was entire devotion to the national cause. That requisite was wanting in Louis; and such a want, at such a moment, could not be supplied by any public or private virtues. If the king were set aside, the abolition of kingship necessarily followed. In the state in which the public mind then was, it would have been idle to think of doing what our ancestors did in 1688, and what the French Chamber of Deputies did in 1830. Such an attempt would have failed amidst universal derision and execration. It would have disgusted all zealous men of all opinions; and there were then few men who were not zealous. Parties fatigued by long conflict, and instructed by the severe discipline of that school in which alone mankind will learn, are disposed to listen to the voice of a mediator. But when they are in their first heady youth, devoid of experience, fresh for exertion, flushed with hope, burning with animosity, they agree only in spurning out of their way the daysman who strives to take his stand between them and to lay his hand upon them both. Such was in 1792 the state of France. On one side was the great name of the heir of Hugh Capet, the thirty-third king of the third race; on the other side was the great name of the republic. There was no rallying-point save these two. It was necessary to make a choice; and those, in our opinion, judged well who, waving for the moment all subordinate questions, preferred independence to subjugation, the natal soil to the emigrant camp.

As to the abolition of royalty, and as to the vigorous prosecution of the war, the whole Convention seemed to be united as one man. But a deep and broad gulf separated the representative body into two great parties.

On one side were those statesmen who are called, from the name of the department which some of them represented, the Girondists, and, from the name of one of their most conspicuous leaders, the Brissotines. In activity and practical ability, Brissot and Gensonné were the most conspicuous among them. In parliamentary eloquence, no Frenchman of that time can be considered as equal to Vergniaud. In a foreign country, and after the lapse of half a century, some parts of his speeches are still read with mournful admiration. No man, we are inclined to believe, ever rose so rapidly to such a height of oratorical excellence. His whole public life lasted barely two years. This is a circumstance which distinguishes him from our own greatest speakers, Fox, Burke, Pitt, Sheridan, Windham, Canning. Which of these celebrated men would now be remembered as an orator, if he had died two years after he first took his seat in the House of Commons? Condorcet brought to the Girondist party a different kind of strength. The public regarded him with justice as an eminent mathematician, and, with less reason, as a great master of ethical and political science; the philosophers considered him as their chief, as the rightful heir, by intellectual descent and by solemn adoption, of their deceased sovereign, D'Alembert. In the same ranks were found Guadet, Isnard, Barbaroux, Buzot, Louvet, too well known as the author of a very ingenious and very licentious romance, and more honorably distinguished by the generosity with which he pleaded for the unfortunate, and by the intrepidity with which he defied the wicked and powerful. Two persons whose talents were not brilliant, but who enjoyed a high reputation for probity and public spirit, Pétion and Roland, lent the whole weight of their names to the Girondist connexion. The wife of Roland brought to the deliberations of her husband's friends masculine courage and force of thought, tempered by womanly grace and vivacity. Nor was the splendor of a great military reputation wanting to this celebrated party. Du-mourier, then victorious over the foreign invaders, and at the height of popular favor, must be reckoned among the allies of the Gironde.

The errors of the Brissotines were undoubtedly neither few nor small; but when we fairly compare their conduct with the conduct of any other party which acted or suffered during the French Revolution, we are forced to admit their superiority in every quality except that single quality which, in such times, prevails over every other, decision. They were zealous for the great social reform which had been effected by the National Assembly; and they were right. For though that reform was, in some respects, carried too far, it was a blessing well worth even the fearful price which has been paid for it. They were resolved to maintain the independence of their country against foreign invaders; and they were right. For the heaviest of all yokes is the yoke of the stranger. They thought that, if Louis remained at their head, they could not carry on with the requisite energy the conflict against the European coalition. They therefore concurred in establishing a republican government; and here, again, they were right. For in that struggle for life and death, it would have been madness to trust a hostile or even a half-hearted leader.

Thus far they went along with the revolutionary movement. At this point they stopped; and, in our judgment, they were right in stopping, as they had been right in moving. For great ends, and under extraordinary circumstances, they had concurred in measures which, together with much good, had necessarily produced much evil; which had unsettled the public mind; which had taken away from government the sanction of prescription; which had loosened the very foundations of property and law. They thought that it was now their duty to prop what it had recently been their duty to batter. They loved liberty, but liberty associated with order, with justice, with mercy, and with civilization. They were republicans; but they were desirous to adorn their republic with all that had given grace and dignity to the fallen monarchy. They hoped that the humanity, the courtesy, the taste, which had done much in old times to mitigate the slavery of France, would now lend additional charms to her freedom. They saw with horror crimes, exceeding in atrocity those which had disgraced the infuriated religious factions of the sixteenth century, perpetrated in the name of reason and philanthropy. They demanded, with eloquent vehemence, that the authors of the lawless massacre which, just before the meeting of the Convention, had been committed in the prisons of Paris, should be brought to condign punishment. They treated with just contempt the pleas which have been set up for that great crime. They admitted that the public danger was pressing; but they denied that it justified a violation of those principles of morality on which all society rests. The independence and honor of France were indeed to be vindicated, but to be vindicated by triumphs and not by murders.

Opposed to the Girondists was a party, which, having been long execrated throughout the civilized world, has of late—such is the ebb and flow of opinion—found not only apologists, but even eulogists. We are not disposed to deny that some members of the Mountain were sincere and public-spirited men. But even the best of them, Carnot for example and Cambon, were far too unscrupulous as to the means which they employed for the purpose of attaining great ends. In the train of these enthusiasts followed a crowd, composed of all who, from sensual, sordid, or malignant motives, wished for a period of boundless license.

When the Convention met, the majority was with the Girondists, and Barère was with the majority. On the king's trial, indeed, he quitted the party with which he ordinarily acted, voted with the Mountain, and spoke against the prisoner with a violence such as few members even of the Mountain showed.

The conduct of the leading Girondists on that occasion was little to their honor. Of cruelty, indeed, we fully acquit them; but it is impossible to acquit them of criminal irresolution and disingenuousness. They were far, indeed, from thirsting for the blood of Louis; on the contrary, they were most desirous to protect him. But they were afraid that, if they went straight forward to their object, the sincerity of their attachment to republican institutions would be suspected. They wished to save the king's life, and yet to obtain all the credit of having been regicides. Accordingly, they traced out for themselves a crooked course, by which they hoped to attain both their objects. They first voted the king guilty. They then voted for referring the question respecting his fate to the whole body of the people. Defeated in this attempt to rescue him, they reluctantly, and with ill-suppressed shame and concern, voted for the capital sentence. Then they made a last attempt in his favor, and voted for respiting the execution. These zigzag politics produced the effect which any man conversant with public affairs might have foreseen. The Girondists, instead of attaining both their ends, failed of both. The Mountain justly charged them with having attempted to save the king by underhand means. Their own consciences told them, with equal justice, that their hands had been dipped in the blood of the most inoffensive and most unfortunate of men. The direct path was here, as usual, the path not only of honor but of safety. The principle on which the Girondists stood as a party was, that the season for revolutionary violence was over, and that the reign of law and order ought now to commence. But the proceeding against the king was clearly revolutionary in its nature. It was not in conformity with the laws. The only plea for it was, that all ordinary rules of jurisprudence and morality were suspended by the extreme public danger. This was the very plea which the Mountain urged in defence of the massacre of September, and to which, when so urged, the Girondists refused to listen. They, therefore, by voting for the death of the king, conceded to the Mountain the chief point at issue between the two parties. Had they given a manful vote against the capital sentence, the regicides would have been in a minority. It is probable that there would have been an immediate appeal to force. The Girondists might have been victorious. In the worst event, they would have fallen with unblemished honor. Thus much is certain, that their boldness and honesty could not possibly have produced a worse effect than was actually produced by their timidity and their stratagems.

Barère, as we have said, sided with the Mountain on this occasion. He voted against the appeal to the people, and against the respite. His demeanor and his language also were widely different from those of the Girondists. Their hearts were heavy, and their deportment was that of men oppressed by sorrow. It was Vergniaud's duty to proclaim the result of the roll-call. His face was pale, and he trembled with emotion, as in a low and broken voice he announced that Louis was condemned to death. Barère had not, it is true, yet attained to full perfection in the art of mingling jests and conceits with words of death; but he already gave promise of his future excellence in this high department of Jacobin oratory. He concluded his speech with a sentence worthy of his head and heart. "The tree of liberty," he said, "as an ancient author remarks, flourishes when it is watered with the blood of all classes of tyrants." M. Hippolyte Carnot has quoted this passage, in order, as we suppose, to do honor to his hero. We wish that a note had been added to inform us from what ancient author Barère quoted. In the course of our own small reading among the Greek and Latin writers, we have not happened to fall in with trees of liberty and watering-pots full of blood; nor can we, such is our ignorance of classical antiquity, even imagine an Attic or Roman orator employing imagery of that sort. In plain words, when Barère talked about an ancient author, he was lying, as he generally was when he asserted any fact, great or small. Why he lied on this occasion we cannot guess, unless indeed it was to keep his hand in.

It is not improbable that, but for one circumstance, Barère would, like most of those with whom he ordinarily acted, have voted for the appeal to the people and for the respite. But, just before the commencement of the trial, papers had been discovered which proved that, while a member of the National Assembly, he had been in communication with the Court respecting his Reports on the Woods and Forests. He was acquitted of all criminality by the Convention; but the fiercer Republicans considered him as a tool of the fallen monarch; and this reproach was long repeated in the journal of Marat, and in the speeches at the Jacobin club. It was natural that a man like Barère should, under such circumstances, try to distinguish himself among the crowd of regicides by peculiar ferocity. It was because he had been a royalist that he was one of the foremost in shedding blood.

The king was no more. The leading Girondists had, by their conduct towards him, lowered their character in the eyes both of friends and foes. They still, however, maintained the contest against the Mountain, called for vengeance on the assassins of September, and protested against the anarchical and sanguinary doctrines of Marat. For a time they seemed likely to prevail. As publicists and orators they had no rivals in the Convention. They had with them, beyond all doubt, the great majority both of the deputies and of the French nation. These advantages, it should seem, ought to have decided the event of the struggle. But the opposite party had compensating advantages of a different kind. The chiefs of the Mountain, though not eminently distinguished by eloquence or knowledge, had great audacity, activity, and determination. The Convention and France were against them; but the mob of Paris, the clubs of Paris, and the municipal government of Paris, were on the other side.

The policy of the Jacobins, in this situation, was to subject France to an aristocracy infinitely worse than that aristocracy which had emigrated with the Count of Artois—to an aristocracy not of birth, not of wealth, not of education, but of mere locality. They would not hear of privileged orders; but they wished to have a privileged city. That twenty-five millions of Frenchmen should be ruled by a hundred thousand gentlemen and clergymen, was insufferable; but that twenty-five millions of Frenchmen should be ruled by a hundred thousand Parisians, was as it should be. The qualification of a member of the new oligarchy was simply that he should live near the hall where the Convention met, and should be able to squeeze himself daily into the gallery during a debate, and now and then to attend with a pike for the purpose of blockading the doors. It was quite agreeable to the maxims of the Mountain, that a score of draymen from Santerre's brewery, or of devils from Hébert's printing-house, should be permitted to drown the voices of men commissioned to speak the sense of such cities as Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Lyons; and that a rabble of half-naked porters from the Faubourg St. Antoine, should have power to annul decrees for which the representatives of fifty or sixty departments had voted. It was necessary to find some pretext for so odious and absurd a tyranny. Such a pretext was found. To the old phrases of liberty and equality were added the sonorous watchwords, unity and indivisibility. A new crime was invented, and called by the name of federalism. The object of the Girondists, it was asserted, was to break up the great nation into little independent commonwealths, bound together only by a league like that which connects the Swiss cantons or the United States of America. The great obstacle in the way of this pernicious design was the influence of Paris. To strengthen the influence of Paris ought therefore to be the chief object of every patriot.

The accusation brought against the leaders of the Girondist party was a mere calumny. They were undoubtedly desirous to prevent the capital from domineering over the republic, and would gladly have seen the Convention removed for a time to some provincial town, or placed under the protection of a trusty guard, which might have overawed the Parisian mob; but there is not the slightest reason to suspect them of any design against the unity of the state. Barère, however, really was a federalist, and, we are inclined to believe, the only federalist in the Convention. As far as a man so unstable and servile can be said to have felt any preference for any form of government, he felt a preference for federal government. He was born under the Pyrenees; he was a Gascon of the Gascons, one of a people strongly distinguished by intellectual and moral character, by manners, by modes of speech, by accent, and by physiognomy, from the French of the Seine and of the Loire; and he had many of the peculiarities of the race to which he belonged. When he first left his own province he had attained his thirty-fourth year, and had acquired a high local reputation for eloquence and literature. He had then visited Paris for the first time. He had found himself in a new world. His feelings were those of a banished man. It is clear also that he had been by no means without his share of the small disappointments and humiliations so often experienced by men of letters who, elated by provincial applause, venture to display their powers before the fastidious critics of a capital. On the other hand, whenever he revisited the mountains among which he had been born, he found himself an object of general admiration. His dislike of Paris, and his partiality to his native district, were therefore as strong and durable as any sentiments of a mind like his could be. He long continued to maintain, that the ascendancy of one great city was the bane of France; that the superiority of taste and intelligence which it was the fashion to ascribe to the inhabitants of that city was wholly imaginary; and that the nation would never enjoy a really good government till the Alsatian people, the Breton people, the people of Bearn, the people of Provence, should have each an independent existence, and laws suited to its own tastes and habits. These communities he proposed to unite by a tie similar to that which binds together the grave Puritans of Connecticut, and the dissolute slave-drivers of New Orleans. To Paris he was unwilling to grant even the rank which Washington holds in the United States. He thought it desirable that the congress of the French federation should have no fixed place of meeting, but should sit sometimes at Rouen, sometimes at Bordeaux, sometimes at his own Toulouse.

Animated by such feelings, he was, till the close of May, 1793, a Girondist, if not an ultra-Girondist. He exclaimed against those impure and bloodthirsty men who wished to make the public danger a pretext for cruelty and rapine. "Peril," he said, "could be no excuse for crime. It is when the wind blows hard, and the waves run high, that the anchor is most needed; it is when a revolution is raging, that the great laws of morality are most necessary to the safety of a state." Of Marat he spoke with abhorrence and contempt; of the municipal authorities of Paris with just severity. He loudly complained that there were Frenchmen who paid to the Mountain that homage which was due to the Convention alone. When the establishment of the Revolutionary Tribunal was first proposed, he joined himself to Vergniaud and Buzot, who strongly objected to that odious measure. "It cannot be," exclaimed Barère, "that men really attached to liberty will imitate the most frightful excesses of despotism!" He proved to the Convention, after his fashion, out of Sallust, that such arbitrary courts may indeed, for a time, be severe only on real criminals, but must inevitably degenerate into instruments of private cupidity and revenge. When, on the tenth of March, the worst part of the population of Paris made the first unsuccessful attempt to destroy the Girondists, Barère eagerly called for vigorous measures of repression and punishment. On the second of April, another attempt of the Jacobins of Paris to usurp supreme dominion over the republic, was brought to the knowledge of the Convention; and again Barère spoke with warmth against the new tyranny which afflicted France, and declared that the people of the departments would never crouch beneath the tyranny of one ambitious city. He even proposed a resolution to the effect, that the Convention would exert against the demagogues of the capital the same energy which had been exerted against the tyrant Louis. We are assured that, in private as in public, he at this time uniformly spoke with strong aversion of the Mountain.

His apparent zeal for the cause of humanity and order had its reward. Early in April came the tidings of Dumourier's defection. This was a heavy blow to the Girondists. Dumourier was their general. His victories had thrown a lustre on the whole party; his army, it had been hoped, would, in the worst event, protect the deputies of the nation against the ragged pikemen of the garrrets of Paris. He was now a deserter and an exile; and those who had lately placed their chief reliance on his support were compelled to join with their deadliest enemies in execrating his treason. At this perilous conjuncture, it was resolved to appoint a Committee of Public Safety, and to arm that committee with powers, small indeed when compared with those it afterwards drew to itself, but still great and formidable. The moderate party, regarding Barère as a representative of their feelings and opinions, elected him a member. In his new situation he soon began to make himself useful. He brought to the deliberations of the Committee, not indeed the knowledge or the ability of a great statesman, but a tongue and a pen which, if others would only supply ideas, never paused for want of words. His mind was a mere organ of communication between other minds. It originated nothing; it retained nothing; but it transmitted everything. The post assigned to him by his colleagues was not really of the highest importance; but it was prominent, and drew the attention of all Europe. When a great measure was to be brought forward, when an account was to be rendered of an important event, he was generally the mouthpiece of the administration. He was therefore not unnaturally considered, by persons who lived at a distance from the seat of government, and above all by foreigners who, while the war raged, knew France only from Journals, as the head of that administration of which, in truth, he was only the secretary and the spokesman. The author of the History of Europe, in our own Annual Registers, appears to have been completely under this delusion.

The conflict between the hostile parties was meanwhile fast approaching to a crisis. The temper of Paris grew daily fiercer and fiercer. Delegates appointed by thirty-five of the forty-eight wards of the city appeared at the bar of the Convention, and demanded that Vergniaud, Brissot, Guadet, Gensonné, Barbaroux, Buzot, Pétion, Louvet, and many other deputies, should be expelled. This demand was disapproved by at least three-fourths of the Assembly, and, when known in the departments, called forth a general cry of indignation. Bordeaux declared that it would stand by its representatives, and would, if necessary, defend them by the sword against the tyranny of Paris. Lyons and Marseilles were animated by a similar spirit. These manifestations of public opinion gave courage to the majority of the Convention. Thanks were voted to the people of Bordeaux for their patriotic declaration, and a commission consisting of twelve members was appointed for the purpose of investigating the conduct of the municipal authorities of Paris; and was empowered to place under arrest such persons as should appear to have been concerned in any plot against the authority of the Convention. This measure was adopted on the motion of Barère.

A few days of stormy excitement and profound anxiety followed; and then came the crash. On the thirty-first of May the mob of Paris rose; the palace of the Tuileries was besieged by a vast array of pikes; the majority of the deputies, after vain struggles and remonstrances, yielded to violence, and suffered the Mountain to carry a decree for the suspension and arrest of the deputies whom the wards of the capital had accused.

During this contest, Barère had been tossed backwards and forwards between the two raging factions. His feelings, languid and unsteady as they always were, drew him to the Girondists; but he was awed by the vigor and determination of the Mountain. At one moment he held high and firm language, complained that the Convention was not free, and protested against the validity of any vote passed under coercion. At another moment he proposed to conciliate the Parisians by abolishing that commission of twelve which he had himself proposed only a few days before; and himself drew up a paper condemning the very measures which had been adopted at his own instance, and eulogizing the public spirit of the insurgents. To do him justice, it was not without some symptoms of shame that he read this document from the tribune, where he had so often expressed very different sentiments. It is said that, at some passages, he was even seen to blush. It may have been so; he was still in his novitiate of infamy.

Some days later he proposed that hostages for the personal safety of the accused deputies should be sent to the departments, and offered to be himself one of those hostages. Nor do we in the least doubt that the offer was sincere. He would, we firmly believe, have thought himself far safer at Bordeaux or Marseilles than at Paris. His proposition, however, was not carried into effect; and he remained in the power of the victorious Mountain.

This was the great crisis of his life. Hitherto he had done nothing inexpiable, nothing which marked him out as a much worse man than most of his colleagues in the Convention. His voice had generally been on the side of moderate measures. Had he bravely cast in his lot with the Girondists, and suffered with them, he would, like them, have had a not dishonorable place in history. Had he, like the great body of deputies who meant well, but who had not the courage to expose themselves to martyrdom, crouched quietly under the dominion of the triumphant minority, and suffered every motion of Robespierre and Billaud to pass unopposed, he would have incurred no peculiar ignominy. But it is probable that this course was not open to him. He had been too prominent among the adversaries of the Mountain, to be admitted to quarter without making some atonement. It was necessary that, if he hoped to find pardon from his new lords, he should not be merely a silent and passive slave. What passed in private between him and them cannot be accurately related; but the result was soon apparent. The Committee of Public Safety was renewed. Several of the fiercest of the dominant faction, Couthon for example, and St. Just, were substituted for more moderate politicians; but Barère was suffered to retain his seat at the Board.

The indulgence with which he was treated excited the murmurs of some stern and ardent zealots. Marat, in the very last words that he wrote, words not published till the dagger of Charlotte Corday had avenged France and mankind, complained that a man who had no principles, who was always on the side of the strongest, who had been a royalist, and who was ready, in case of a turn of fortune, to be a royalist again, should be entrusted with an important share in the administration.* But the chiefs of the Mountain judged more correctly. They knew indeed, as well as Marat, that Barère was a man utterly without faith or steadiness; that, if he could be said to have any political leaning, his leaning was not towards them; that he felt for the Girondist party that faint and wavering sort of preference of which alone his nature was susceptible; and that, if he had been at liberty to make his choice, he would rather have murdered Robespierre and Danton, than Vergniaud and Gensonné. But they justly appreciated that levity which made him incapable alike of earnest love and of earnest hatred, and that meanness which made it necessary to him to have a master. In truth, what the planters of Carolina and Louisiana say of black men with flat noses and woolly hair, was strictly true of Barère. The curse of Canaan was upon him. He was born a slave. Baseness was an instinct in him. The impulse which drove him from a party in adversity to a party in prosperity, was as irresistible as that which drives the cuckoo and the swallow towards the sun when the dark and cold months are approaching. The law which doomed him to be the humble attendant of stronger spirits resembled the law which binds the pilot-fish to the shark. "Ken ye," said a shrewd Scotch lord, who was asked his opinion of James the First, "Ken ye a John Ape? If I have Jacko by the collar, I can make him bite you; but if you have Jacko, you can make him bite me." Just such a creature was Barère. In the hands of the Girondists he would have been eager to proscribe the Jacobins; he was just as ready, in the gripe of the Jacobins, to proscribe the Girondists. On the fidelity of such a man, the heads of the Mountain could not, of course, reckon; but they valued their conquest as the very easy and not very delicate lover in Congreve's lively song valued the conquest of a prostitute of a different kind. Barère was, like Chloe, false and common; but he was, like Chloe, constant while possessed; and they asked no more. They needed a service which he was perfectly competent to perform. Destitute as he was of all the talents both of an active and of a speculative statesman, he could with great facility draw up a report, or make a speech on any subject and on any side. If other people would furnish facts and thoughts, he could always furnish phrases; and this talent was absolutely at the command of his owners for the time being. Nor had he excited any angry passion among those to whom he had hitherto been opposed. They felt no more hatred to him than they felt to the horses which dragged the cannon of the Duke of Brunswick and of the Prince of Saxe-Coburg. The horses had only done according to their kind, and would, if they fell into the hands of the French, drag with equal vigor and equal docility the guns of the republic, and therefore ought not merely to be spared, but to be well fed and curried. So was it with Barère. He was of a nature so low, that it might be doubted whether he could properly be an object of the hostility of reasonable beings. He had not been an enemy; he was not now a friend. But he had been an annoyance; and he would now be a help.

But though the heads of the Mountain pardoned this man, and admitted him into partnership with themselves, it was not without exacting pledges such as made it impossible for him, false and fickle as he was, ever again to find admission into the ranks which he had deserted. That was truly a terrible sacrament by which they admitted the apostate into their communion. They demanded of him that he should himself take the most prominent part in murdering his old friends. To refuse was as much as his life was worth. But what is life worth when it is only one long agony of remorse and shame? These, however, are feelings of which it is idle to talk, when we are considering the conduct of such a man as Barère. He undertook the task, mounted the tribune, and told the Convention that the time was come for taking the stern attitude of justice, and for striking at all conspirators without distinction. He then moved that Buzot, Barbaroux, Pétion, and thirteen other deputies, should be placed out of the pale of the law, or, in other words, beheaded without a trial; and that Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, and six others, should be impeached. The motion was carried without debate.

We have already seen with what effrontery Barère has denied, in these Memoirs, that he took any part against the Girondists. This denial, we think, was the only thing wanting to make his infamy complete. The most impudent of all lies was a fit companion for the foulest of all murders.

Barère, however, had not yet earned his pardon. The Jacobin party contained one gang which, even in that party, was preëminent in every mean and every savage vice, a gang so low-minded and so inhuman, that, compared with them, Robespierre might be called magnanimous and merciful. Of these wretches Hébert was perhaps the best representative. His favorite amusement was to torment and insult the miserable remains of that great family which, having ruled France during eight hundred years, had now become an object of pity to the humblest artisan or peasant. The influence of this man, and of men like him, induced the Committee of Public Safety to determine that * See the Publiciste of the 14th of July, 1793. Marat was stabbed on the evening of the 13th.

Marie Antoinette should be sent to the scaffold. Barère was again summoned to his duty. Only four days after he had proposed the decrees against the Girondist deputies he again mounted the tribune, in order to move that the queen should be brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal. He was improving fast in the society of his new allies. When he asked for the heads of Vergniaud and Pétion, he had spoken like a man who had some slight sense of his own guilt and degradation; he had said little, and that little had not been violent. The office of expatiating on the guilt of his old friends he had left to St. Just. Very different was Barère's second appearance in the character of an accuser. He now cried out for blood in the eager tones of the true and burning thirst, and raved against the Austrian woman with the virulence natural to a coward who finds himself at liberty to outrage that which he has feared and envied. We have already exposed the shameless mendacity with which, in these Memoirs, he attempts to throw the blame of his own guilt on the guiltless.

On the day on which the fallen queen was dragged, already more than half dead, to her doom, Barère regaled Robespierre and some other Jacobins at a tavern. Robespierre's acceptance of the invitation caused some surprise to those who knew how long and how bitterly it was his nature to hate. "Robespierre of the party!" muttered St. Just. "Barère is the only man whom Robespierre has forgiven." We have an account of this singular repast from one of the guests. Robespierre condemned the senseless brutality with which Hébert had conducted the proceedings against the Austrian woman, and, in talking on that subject, became so much excited that he broke his plate in the violence of his gesticulation. Barère exclaimed that the guillotine had cut a diplomatic knot which it might have been difficult to untie. In the intervals between the Beaune and the Champagne, between the ragout of thrushes and the partridge with truffles, he fervently preached his new political creed. "The vessel of the revolution," he said, "can float into port only on waves of blood. We must begin with the members of the National Assembly and of the Legislative Assembly. That rubbish must be swept away."

As he talked at table he talked in the Convention. His peculiar style of oratory was now formed. It was not altogether without ingenuity and liveliness. But, in any other age or country, it would have been thought unfit for the deliberations of a grave assembly, and still more unfit for state papers. It might, perhaps, succeed at a meeting of a Protestant Association in Exeter Hall, at a Repeal dinner in Ireland, after men had well drunk, or in an American oration on the fourth of July. No legislative body would now endure it. But in France, during the reign of the Convention, the old laws of composition were held in as much contempt as the old government or the old creed. Correct and noble diction belonged, like the etiquette of Versailles and the solemnities of Notre Dame, to an age which had passed away. Just as a swarm of ephemeral constitutions, democratic, directorial, and consular, sprang from the decay of the ancient monarchy; just as a swarm of new superstitions, the worship of the Goddess of Reason, and the fooleries of the Theo-philanthropists, sprang from the decay of the ancient church; even so, out of the decay of the ancient French eloquence, sprang new fashions of eloquence, for the understanding of which new grammars and dictionaries were necessary. The same innovating spirit which altered the common phrases of salutation, which turned hundreds of Johns and Peters into Scævolas and Aristogitons, and which expelled Sunday and Monday, January and February, Lady-day and Christmas, from the calendar, in order to substitute Decadi and Primidi, Nivose and Pluviöse, Feasts of Opinion and Feasts of the Supreme Being, changed all the forms of official correspondence. For the calm, guarded, and sternly courteous language which governments had long been accustomed to employ, were substituted puns, interjections, Ossianic rants, rhetoric worthy only of a schoolboy, scurrility worthy only of a fishwife. Of the phraseology which was now thought to be peculiarly well suited to a report or a manifesto, Barère had a greater command than any man of his time; and, during the short and sharp paroxysm of the revolutionary delirium, passed for a great orator. When the fit was over, he was considered as what he really was, a man of quick apprehension and fluent elocution, with no originality, with little information, and with a taste as bad as his heart. His reports were popularly called Carmagnoles. A few months ago, we should have had some difficulty in conveying to an English reader an exact notion of the state papers to which this appellation was given. Fortunately a noble and distinguished person, whom her majesty's ministers have thought qualified to fill the most important post in the empire, has made our task easy. Whoever has read Lord Ellenborough's proclamations is able to form a complete idea of a Carmagnole.

The effect which Barère's discourses at one time produced is not to be wholly attributed to the perversion of the national taste. The occasions on which he rose were frequently such as would have secured to the worst speaker a favorable hearing. When any military advantage had been gained, he was generally deputed by the Committee of Public Safety to announce the good news. The hall resounded with applause as he mounted the tribune, holding the despatches in his hand. Deputies and strangers listened with delight while he told them that victory was the order of the day; that the guineas of Pitt had been vainly lavished to hire machines six feet high, carrying guns; that the flight of the English leopard deserved to be celebrated by Tyrtæus; and that the saltpetre dug out of the cellars of Paris had been turned into thunder, which would crush the Titan brethren, George and Francis.

Meanwhile, the trial of the accused Girondists, who were under arrest at Paris, came on. They flattered themselves with a vain hope of escape. They placed some reliance on their innocence, and some reliance on their eloquence. They thought that shame would suffice to restrain any man, however violent and cruel, from publicly committing the flagrant iniquity of condemning them to death. The Revolutionary Tribunal was new to its functions. No member of the Convention had yet been executed; and it was probable that the boldest Jacobin would shrink from being the first to violate the sanctity which was supposed to belong to the representatives of the people.

The proceedings lasted some days. Gensonné and Brissot defended themselves with great ability and presence of mind against the vile Hébert and Chaumette, who appeared as accusers. The eloquent voice of Vergniaud was heard for the last time. He pleaded his own cause, and that of his friends, with such force of reason and elevation of sentiment that a murmur of pity and admiration rose from the audience. Nay, the court itself, not yet accustomed to riot in daily carnage, showed signs of emotion. The sitting was adjourned, and a rumor went forth that there would be an acquittal. The Jacobins met, breathing vengeance. Robespierre undertook to be their organ. He rose on the following day in the Convention, and proposed a decree of such atrocity, that even among the acts of that year it can hardly be paralleled. By this decree the tribunal was empowered to cut short the defence of the prisoners, to pronounce the case clear, and to pass immediate judgment. One deputy made a faint opposition. Barère instantly sprang up to support Robespierre—Barère, the federalist; Barère, the author of that Commission of Twelve which was among the chief causes of the hatred borne by Paris to the Girondists; Barère, who in these Memoirs denies that he ever took any part against the Girondists; Barère, who has the effrontery to declare that he greatly loved and esteemed Vergniaud. The decree was passed; and the tribunal, without suffering the prisoners to conclude what they had to say, pronounced them guilty.

The following day was the saddest in the sad history of the Revolution. The sufferers were so innocent, so brave, so eloquent, so accomplished, so young. Some of them were graceful and handsome youths of six or seven and twenty. Vergniaud and Gensonné were little more than thirty. They had been only a few months engaged in public affairs. In a few months the fame of their genius had filled Europe; and they were to die for no crime but this, that they had wished to combine order, justice, and mercy with freedom. Their great fault was want of courage. We mean want of political courage—of that courage which is proof to clamor and obloquy, and which meets great emergencies by daring and decisive measures. Alas! they had but too good an opportunity of proving, that they did not want courage to endure with manly cheerfulness the worst that could be inflicted by such tyrants as St. Just, and such slaves as Barère.

They were not the only victims of the noble cause. Madame Rowland followed them to the scaffold with a spirit as heroic as their own. Her husband was in a safe hiding-place, but could not bear to survive her. His body was found on the high-road, near Rouen. He had fallen on his sword. Condorcet swallowed opium. At Bordeaux, the steel fell on the necks of the bold and quick-witted Guadet, and of Barbaroux, the chief of those enthusiasts from the Rhone whose valor, in the great crisis of the tenth of August, had turned back the tide of battle from the Louvre to the Tuileries. In a field near the Garonne was found all that the wolves had left of Pétion, once honored, greatly indeed beyond his deserts, as the model of republican virtue. We are far from regarding even the best of the Girondists with unmixed admiration; but history owes to them this honorable testimony, that, being free to choose whether they would be oppressors or victims, they deliberately and firmly resolved rather to suffer injustice than to inflict it.

And now began that strange period known by the name of the Reign of Terror. The Jacobins had prevailed. This was their hour, and the power of darkness. The Convention was subjugated, and reduced to profound silence on the highest questions of state. The sovereignty passed to the Committee of Public Safety. To the edicts framed by that Committee, the representative assembly did not venture to offer even the species of opposition which the ancient Parliament had frequently offered to the mandates of the ancient kings. Six persons held the chief power in the small cabinet which now domineered over France—Robespierre, St. Just, Couthon, Collot, Billaud, and Barère.

To some of these men, and of those who adhered to them, it is due to say, that the fanaticism which had emancipated them from the restraints of justice and compassion, had emancipated them also from the dominion of vulgar cupidity and of vulgar fear; that, while hardly knowing where to find an assignat of a few francs to pay for a dinner, they expended with strict integrity the immense revenue which they collected by every art of rapine; and that they were ready, in support of their cause, to mount the scaffold with as much indifference as they showed when they signed the death-warrants of aristocrats and priests. But no great party can be composed of such materials as these. It is the inevitable law, that such zealots as we have described shall collect around them a multitude of slaves, of cowards, and of libertines, whose savage tempers and licentious appetites, withheld only by the dread of law and magistracy from the worst excesses, are called into full activity by the hope of impunity. A faction which, from whatever motive, relaxes the great laws of morality, is certain to be joined by the most immoral part of the community. This has been repeatedly proved in religious wars. The war of the Holy Sepulchre, the Albigensian war, the Huguenot war, the 'Thirty Years' war, all originated in pious zeal. That zeal inflamed the champions of the church to such a point, that they regarded all generosity to the vanquished as a sinful weakness. The infidel, the heretic, was to be run down like a mad dog. No outrage committed by the Catholic warrior on the miscreant enemy could deserve punishment. As soon as it was known that boundless license was thus given to barbarity and dissoluteness, thousands of wretches who cared nothing for the sacred cause, but who were eager to be exempted from the police of peaceful cities, and the discipline of well-governed camps, flocked to the standard of the faith. The men who had set up that standard were sincere, chaste, regardless of lucre, and perhaps, where only themselves were concerned not unforgiving; but round that standard were assembled such gangs of rogues, ravishers, plunderers, and ferocious bravoos, as were scarcely ever found under the flag of any state engaged in a mere temporal quarrel. In a very similar way was the Jacobin party composed. There was a small nucleus of enthusiasts; round that nucleus was gathered a vast mass of ignoble depravity; and in all that mass, there was nothing so depraved and so ignoble as Barère.

Then came those days, when the most barbarous of all codes was administered by the most barbarous of all tribunals; when no man could greet his neighbors, or say his prayers, or dress his hair, without danger of committing a capital crime; when spies lurked in every corner; when the guillotine was long and hard at work every morning; when the jails were filled as close as the hold of a slave-ship; when the gutters ran foaming with blood into the Seine; when it was death to be great-niece of a captain of the royal guards, or half-brother of a doctor of the Sorbonne, to express a doubt whether assignats would not fall, to hint that the English had been victorious in the action of the First of June, to have a copy of one of Burke's pamphlets locked up in a desk, to laugh at a Jacobin for taking the name of Cassius or Timoleon, or to call the Fifth Sans-culottide by its old superstitious name of St. Matthew's-Day. While the daily waggon-loads of victims were carried to their doom through the streets of Paris, the Proconsuls whom the sovereign Committee had sent forth to the departments, revelled in an extravagance of cruelty unknown even in the capital. The knife of the deadly machine rose and fell too slow for their work of slaughter. Long rows of captives were mowed down with grape-shot. Holes were made in the bottom of crowded barges. Lyons was turned into a desert. At Arras even the cruel mercy of a speedy death was denied to the prisoners. All down the Loire, from Saumur to the sea, great flocks of crows and kites feasted on naked corpses, twined together in hideous embraces. No mercy was shown to sex or age. The number of young lads and of girls of seventeen who were murdered by that execrable government, is to be reckoned by hundreds. Babies torn from the breast were tossed from pike to pike along the Jacobin ranks. One champion of liberty had his pockets well stuffed with ears. Another swagged about with the finger of a little child in his hat. A few months had sufficed to degrade France below the level of New Zealand.

It is absurd to say, that any amount of public danger can justify a system like this, we do not say on Christian principles, we do not say on the principles of a high morality, but even on principles of Machiavelian policy. It is true that great emergencies call for activity and vigilance; it is true that they justify severity which, in ordinary times, would deserve the name of cruelty. But indiscriminate severity can never, under any circumstances, be useful. It is plain that the whole efficacy of punishment depends on the care with which the guilty are distinguished. Punishment which strikes the guilty and the innocent promiscuously operates merely like a pestilence or a great convulsion of nature, and has no more tendency to prevent offences, than the cholera, or an earthquake like that of Lisbon, would have. The energy for which the Jacobin administration is praised was merely the energy of the Malay who maddens himself with opium, draws his knife, and runs a-muck through the streets, slashing right and left at friends and foes. Such has never been the energy of truly great rulers; of Elizabeth, for example, of Oliver, or of Frederick. They were not, indeed, scrupulous. But had they been less scrupulous than they were, the strength and amplitude of their minds would have preserved them from crimes such as those which the small men of the Committee of Public Safety took for daring strokes of policy. The great Queen who so long held her own against foreign and domestic enemies, against temporal and spiritual arms; the great Protector who governed with more than regal power, in despite both of royalists and republicans; the great King, who, with a beaten army and an exhausted treasury, defended his little dominions to the last against the united efforts of Russia, Austria, and France; with what scorn would they have heard that it was impossible for them to strike a salutary terror into the disaffected, without sending school-boys and school-girls to death by cart-loads and boat-loads!

The popular notion is, we believe, that the leading Terrorists were wicked men, but, at the same time, great men. We can see nothing great about them but their wickedness. That their policy was daringly original is a vulgar error. Their policy is as old as the oldest accounts which we have of human misgovernment. It seemed new in France, and in the eighteenth century, only because it had been long disused, for excellent reasons, by the enlightened part of mankind. But it has always prevailed, and still prevails, in savage and half savage nations, and is the chief cause which prevents such nations from making advances towards civilization. Thousands of deys, of beys, of pachas, of rajahs, of nabobs, have shown themselves as great masters of statecraft as the members of the Committee of Public Safety. Djeddar, we imagine, was superior to any of them in their own line. In fact, there is not a petty tyrant in Asia or Africa so dull or so unlearned as not to be fully qualified for the business of Jacobin police and Jacobin finance. To behead people by scores without caring whether they are guilty or innocent; to wring money out of the rich by the help of jailers and executioners; to rob the public creditor, and to put him to death if he remonstrates; to take loaves by force out of the bakers' shops; to clothe and mount soldiers by seizing on one man's wool and linen, and on another man's horses and saddles, without compensation, is of all modes of governing the simplest and most obvious. Of its morality we at present say nothing. But surely it requires no capacity beyond that of a barbarian or a child. By means like those which we have described, the Committee of Public Safety undoubtedly succeeded, for a short time, in enforcing profound submission, and in raising immense funds. But to enforce submission by butchery, and to raise funds by spoliation, is not statesmanship. The real statesman is he who, in troubled times, keeps down the turbulent without unnecessarily harassing the well-affected; and who, when great pecuniary resources are needed, provides for the public exigencies without violating the security of property, and drying up the sources of future prosperity. Such a statesman, we are confident, might, in 1793, have preserved the independence of France, without shedding a drop of innocent blood, without plundering a single warehouse. Unhappily, the Republic was subject to men who were mere demagogues, and in no sense statesmen. They could declaim at a club. They could lead a rabble to mischief. But they had no skill to conduct the affairs of an empire. The want of skill they supplied for a time by atrocity and blind violence. For legislative ability, fiscal ability, military ability, diplomatic ability, they had one substitute, the guillotine. Indeed their exceeding ignorance, and the barrenness of their invention, are the best excuse for their murders and robberies. We really believe that they would not have cut so many throats, and picked so many pockets, if they had known how to govern in any other way.

That, under their administration, the war against the European Coalition was successfully conducted, is true. But that war had been successfully conducted before their elevation, and continued to be successfully conducted after their fall. Terror was not the order of the day when Brussels opened its gates to Dumourier. Terror had ceased to be the order of the day when Piedmont and Lombardy were conquered by Bonaparte. The truth is, that France was saved, not by the Committee of Public Safety, but by the energy, patriotism, and valor of the French people. Those high qualities were victorious in spite of the incapacity of rulers whose administration was a tissue, not merely of crimes, but of blunders.

We have not time to tell how the leaders of the savage faction at length began to avenge mankind on each other; how the craven Hébert was dragged wailing and trembling to his doom; how the nobler Danton, moved by a late repentance, strove in vain to repair the evil which he had wrought, and half redeemed the great crime of September, by manfully encountering death in the cause of mercy.

Our business is with Barère. In all those things he was not only consenting, but eagerly and joyously forward. Not merely was he one of the guilty administration. He was the man to whom was especially assigned the office of proposing and defending outrages on justice and humanity, and of furnishing to atrocious schemes an appropriate garb of atrocious rodomontade. Barère first proclaimed from the tribune of the Convention, that terror must be the order of the day. It was by Barère that the Revolutionary Tribunal of Paris was provided with the aid of a public accuser worthy of such a court, the infamous Fouquier Tinville. It was Barère who, when one of the old members of the National Assembly had been absolved by the Revolutionary Tribunal, gave orders that a fresh jury should be summoned. "Acquit one of the National Assembly!" he cried. "The tribunal is turning against the Revolution." It is unnecessary to say that the prisoner's head was soon in the basket. It was Barère who moved that the city of Lyons should be destroyed. "Let the plough," he cried from the tribune, "pass over her. Let her name cease to exist. The rebels are conquered; but are they all exterminated? No weakness. No mercy. Let every one be smitten. Two words will suffice to tell the whole. Lyons made war on liberty; Lyons is no more." When Toulon was taken Barère came forward to announce the event. "The conquest," said the apostate Brissotine, "won by the Mountain over the Brissotines, must be commemorated by a mark set on the place where Toulon once stood. The national thunder must crush the house of every trader in the town." When Camille Desmoulins, long distinguished among the republicans by zeal and ability, dared to raise his eloquent voice against the Reign of Terror, and to point out the close analogy between the government which then oppressed France and the government of the worst of the Cæsars, Barère rose to complain of the weak compassion which tried to revive the hopes of the aristocracy. "Whoever," he said, "is nobly born, is a man to be suspected. Every priest, every frequenter of the old court, every lawyer, every banker, is a man to be suspected. Every person who grumbles at the course which the Revolution takes, is a man to be suspected. There are whole castes already tried and condemned. There are callings which carry their doom with them. There are relations of blood which the law regards with an evil eye. Republicans of France!" yelled the renegade Girondist, the old enemy of the Mountain—"Republicans of France! the Brissotines led you by gentle means to slavery. The Mountain leads you by strong measures to freedom. Oh! who can count the evils which a false compassion may produce!" When the friends of Danton mustered courage to express a wish that the Convention would at least hear him, in his own defence, before it sent him to certain death, the voice of Barère was the loudest in opposition to their prayer. When the crimes of Lebon, one of the worst, if not the very worst, of the vicegerents of the Committee of Public Safety, had so maddened the people of the Department of the North, that they resorted to the desperate expedient of imploring the protection of the Convention, Barère pleaded the cause of the accused tyrant, and threatened the petitioners with the utmost vengeance of the government. "These charges," he said, "have been suggested by wily aristocrats. The man who crushes the enemies of the people, though he may be hurried by his zeal into some excesses, can never be a proper object of censure. The proceedings of Lebon may have been a little harsh as to form." One of the small irregularities thus gently censured was this: Lebon kept a wretched man a quarter of an hour under the knife of the guillotine, in order to torment him, by reading to him, before he was dispatched, a letter, the contents of which were supposed to be such as would aggravate even the bitterness of death. "But what," proceeded Barère, "is not permitted to the hatred of a republican against aristocracy? How many generous sentiments atone for what may perhaps seem acrimonious in the prosecution of public enemies? Revolutionary measures are always to be spoken of with respect. Liberty is a virgin whose veil it is not lawful to lift."

After this, it would be idle to dwell on facts which would indeed, of themselves, suffice to render a name infamous, but which make no perceptible addition to the great infamy of Barère. It would be idle, for example, to relate how he, a man of letters, a member of an Academy of Inscriptions, was foremost in that war against learning, art, and history, which disgraced the Jacobin government; how he recommended a general conflagration of libraries; how he proclaimed that all records of events anterior to the Revolution ought to be destroyed; how he laid waste the abbey of St. Denis, pulled down monuments consecrated by the veneration of ages, and scattered on the wind the dust of ancient kings. He was, in truth, seldom so well employed as when he turned for a moment from making war on the living to make war on the dead.

Equally idle would it be to dilate on his sensual excesses. That in Barère, as in the whole breed of Neros, Caligulas, and Domitians, whom he resembled, voluptuousness was mingled with cruelty; that he withdrew, twice in every decade, from the work of blood to the smiling gardens of Clichy, and there forgot public cares in the madness of wine, and in the arms of courtesans, has often been repeated. M. Hippolyte Carnot does not altogether deny the truth of these stories, but justly observes that Barère's dissipation was not carried to such a point as to interfere with his industry. Nothing can be more true. Barère was by no means so much addicted to debauchery as to neglect the work of murder. It was his boast that, even during his hours of recreation, he cut out work for the Revolutionary Tribunal. To those who expressed a fear that his exertions would hurt his health, he gaily answered that he was less busy than they thought. "The guillotine," he said, "does all; the guillotine governs." For ourselves, we are much more disposed to look indulgently on the pleasures which he allowed to himself, than on the pain which he inflicted on his neighbors.

"Atque utinam his potius nugis tota illa dedisset Tempora sævitæ, claras quibus abstulit urbi Illustresque animas, impune ac vindice nullo."

An immoderate appetite for sensual gratifications is undoubtedly a blemish on the fame of Henry the Fourth, of Lord Somers, of Mr. Fox. But the vices of honest men are the virtues of Barère.

And now Barère had become a really cruel man. It was from mere pusillanimity that he had perpetrated his first great crimes. But the whole history of our race proves that the taste for the misery of others is a taste which minds not naturally ferocious may too easily acquire, and which, when once acquired, is as strong as any of the propensities with which we are born. A very few months had sufficed to bring this man into a state of mind in which images of despair, wailing, and death, had an exhilarating effect on him, and inspired him as wine and love inspire men of free and joyous natures. The cart creaking under its daily freight of victims, ancient men, and lads, and fair young girls—the binding of the hands, the thrusting of the head out of the little national sash-window, the crash of the axe, the pool of blood beneath the scaffold, the heads rolling by scores in the panier—these things were to him what Lalage and a cask of Falernian were to Horace, what Rosette and a bottle of iced champagne are to De Béranger. As soon as he began to speak of slaughter, his heart seemed to be enlarged, and his fancy to become unusually fertile of conceits and gasconades. Robespierre, St. Just, and Billaud, whose barbarity was the effect of earnest and gloomy hatred, were, in his view, men who made a toil of a pleasure. Cruelty was no such melancholy business, to be gone about with an austere brow and a whining tone : it was a recreation, fitly accompanied by singing and laughing. In truth, Robespierre and Barère might be well compared to the two renowned hangmen of Louis the Eleventh. They were alike insensible of pity, alike bent on havoc. But, while they murdered, one of them frowned and canted, the other grinned and joked. For our own part, we prefer Jean qui pleure to Jean qui rit.

In the midst of the funereal gloom which overhung Paris, a gaiety stranger and more ghastly than the horrors of the prison and the scaffold distinguished the dwelling of Barère. Every morning a crowd of suitors assembled to implore his protection. He came forth in his rich dressing-gown, went round the antechamber, dispensed smiles and promises among the obsequious crowd, addressed himself with peculiar animation to every handsome woman who appeared in the circle, and complimented her in the florid style of Gascony on the bloom of her cheeks and the lustre of her eyes. When he had enjoyed the fear and anxiety of his suppliants he dismissed them, and flung all their memorials unread into the fire. This was the best way, he conceived, to prevent arrears of business from accumulating. Here he was only an imitator. Cardinal Dubois had been in the habit of clearing his table of papers in the same way. Nor was this the only point in which we could point out a resemblance between the worst statesman of the monarchy and the worst statesman of the republic.

Of Barère's peculiar vein of pleasantry a notion may be formed from an anecdote which one of his intimate associates, a juror of the revolutionary tribunal, has related. A courtesan, who bore a conspicuous part in the orgies of Clichy, implored Barère to use his power against a head-dress which did not suit her style of face, and which a rival beauty was trying to bring into fashion. One of the magistrates of the capital was summoned, and received the necessary orders. Aristocracy, Barère said, was again rearing its front. These new wigs were counter-revolutionary. He had reason to know that they were made out of the long fair hair of handsome aristocrats who had died by the national chopper. Every lady who adorned herself with the relics of criminals might justly be suspected of incivism. This ridiculous lie imposed on the authorities of Paris. Female citizens were solemnly warned against the obnoxious ringlets, and were left to choose between their head-dresses and their heads. Barère's delight at the success of this facetious fiction was quite extravagant ; he could not tell the story without going into such convulsions of laughter as made his hearers hope that he was about to choke. There was something peculiarly tickling and exhilarating to his mind in this grotesque combination of the frivolous with the horrible, of false locks and curling-irons with spouting arteries and reeking hatchets.

But though Barère succeeded in earning the honorable nicknames of the Witling of Terror, and the Anacreon of the Guillotine, there was one place where it was long remembered to his disadvantage, that he had, for a time, talked the language of humanity and moderation. That place was the Jacobin Club. Even after he had borne the chief part in the massacre of the Girondists, in the murder of the queen, in the destruction of Lyons, he durst not show himself within that sacred precinct. At one meeting of the society, a member complained that the committee to which the supreme direction of affairs was entrusted, after all the changes which had been made, still contained one man who was not trustworthy. Robespierre, whose influence over the Jacobins was boundless, undertook the defence of his colleague, owned there was some ground for what had been said, but spoke highly of Barère's industry and aptitude for business. This seasonable interposition silenced the accuser ; but it was long before the neophyte could venture to appear at the club.

At length a masterpiece of wickedness, unique, we think, even among Barère's great achievements, obtained his full pardon even from that rigid conclave. The insupportable tyranny of the Committee of Public Safety had at length brought the minds of men, and even of women, into a fierce and hard temper, which defied or welcomed death. The life which might be any morning taken away, in consequence of the whisper of a private enemy, seemed of little value. It was something to die after smiting one of the oppressors ; it was something to bequeath to the surviving tyrants a terror not inferior to that which they had themselves inspired. Human nature, hunted and worried to the utmost, now turned furiously to bay. Fouquier Tinville was afraid to walk the streets ; a pistol was snapped at Collot D'Herbois ; a young girl, animated apparently by the spirit of Charlotte Corday, attempted to obtain an interview with Robespierre. Suspicions arose ; she was searched ; and two knives were found about her. She was questioned, and spoke of the Jacobin domination with resolute scorn and aversion. It is unnecessary to say that she was sent to the guillotine. Barère declared from the tribune that the cause of these attempts was evident. Pitt and his guineas had done the whole. The English Government had organized a vast system of murder, had armed the hand of Charlotte Corday, and had now, by similar means, attacked two of the most eminent friends of liberty in France. It is needless to say, that these imputations were not only false, but destitute of all show of truth. Nay, they were demonstrably absurd ; for the assassins to whom Barère referred rushed on certain death, a sure proof that they were not hirelings. The whole wealth of England would not have bribed any sane person to do what Charlotte Corday did. But when we consider her as an enthusiast, her conduct is perfectly natural. Even those French writers who are childish enough to believe that the English Government contrived the infernal machine, and strangled the Emperor Paul, have fully acquitted Mr. Pitt of all share in the death of Marat and in the attempt on Robespierre. Yet on calumnies so futile as those which we have mentioned, did Barère ground a motion at which all Christendom stood aghast. He proposed a decree that no quarter should be given to any English or Hanoverian soldier.* His Carnagole was worthy of the proposition with which it concluded. "That one Englishman should be spared, that for the slaves of George, for the human machines of York, the vocabulary of our armies should contain such a word as generosity, this is what the National Convention cannot endure. War to the death against every English soldier. If last year, at Dunkirk, quarter had been refused to them when they asked it on their knees, if our troops had exterminated them all, instead of suffering them to infest our fortresses by their presence, the English Government would not have renewed its attack on our frontiers this year. It is only the dead man who never comes back. What is this moral pestilence which has introduced into our armies false ideas of humanity? That the English were to be treated with indulgence was the philanthropic notion of the Brissotines; it was the patriotic practice of Dumourier. But humanity consists in exterminating our enemies. No mercy to the execrable Englishman. Such are the sentiments of the true Frenchman; for he knows that he belongs to a nation revolutionary as nature, powerful as freedom, ardent as the saltpetre which she has just torn from the entrails of the earth. Soldiers of liberty, when victory places Englishmen at your mercy, strike! None of them must return to the servile soil of Great Britain; none must pollute the free soil of France."

The convention, thoroughly tamed and silenced, acquiesced in Barère's motion without debate.

* M. Hippolyte Carnot does his best to excuse this decree. His abuse of England is merely laughable. England has managed to deal with enemies of a very different sort from either himself or his hero. One disgraceful blunder, however, we think it right to notice.

M. Hippolyte Carnot asserts that a motion similar to that of Barère was made in the English Parliament by the late Lord Fitzwilliam. This assertion is false. We defy M. Hippolyte Carnot to state the date and terms of the motion of which he speaks. We do not accuse him of intentional misrepresentation; but we confidently accuse him of extreme ignorance and temerity. Our readers will be amused to learn on what authority he has ventured to publish such a fable. He quotes, not the Journals of the Lords, not the Parliamentary Debates; but a ranting message of the Executive Directory to the Five Hundred, a message, too, the whole meaning of which he has utterly misunderstood.

And now at last the doors of the Jacobin Club were thrown open to the disciple who had surpassed his masters. He was admitted a member by acclamation, and was soon selected to preside.

For a time he was not without hope that his decree would be carried into full effect. Intelligence arrived from the seat of war of a sharp contest between some French and English troops, in which the republicans had the advantage, and in which no prisoners had been made. Such things happen occasionally in all wars. Barère, however, attributed the ferocity of this combat to his darling decree, and entertained the Convention with another Carnagole.

"The Republicans," he said, "saw a division in red uniform at a distance. The red-coats are attacked with the bayonet. Not one of them escapes the blows of the republicans. All the red-coats have been killed. No mercy, no indulgence, has been shown towards the villains. Not an Englishman whom the Republicans could reach is now living. How many prisoners should you guess that we have made! One single prisoner is the result of this great day."

And now this bad man's craving for blood had become insatiable. The more he quaffed, the more he thirsted. He had begun with the English; but soon he came down with a proposition for new massacres. "All the troops," he said, "of the coalesced tyrants in garrison at Condé, Valenciennes, Le Quesnoy, and Landrecies, ought to be put to the sword unless they surrender at discretion in twenty-four hours. The English, of course, will be admitted to no capitulation whatever. With the English we have no treaty but death. As to the rest, surrender at discretion in twenty-four hours, or death, these are our conditions. If the slaves resist, let them feel the edge of the sword." And then he waxed facetious. "On these terms the Republic is willing to give them a lesson in the art of war." At that jest, some hearers, worthy of such a speaker, set up a laugh. Then he became serious again. "Let the enemy perish," he cried; "I have already said it from this tribune. It is only the dead man who never comes back. Kings will not conspire against us in the grave. Armies will not fight against us when they are annihilated. Let our war with them be a war of extermination. What pity is due to slaves whom the Emperor leads to war under the cane; whom the king of Prussia beats to the shambles with the flat of the sword; and whom the Duke of York makes drunk with rum and gin!" And at the rum and gin the Mountain and the galleries laughed again.

If Barère had been able to effect his purpose, it is difficult to estimate the extent of the calamity which he would have brought on the human race. No government, however averse to cruelty, could, in justice to its own subjects, have given quarter to enemies who gave none. Retaliation would have been, not merely justifiable but a sacred duty.

It would have been necessary for Howe and Nelson to make every French sailor whom they took walk the plank. England has no peculiar reason to dread the introduction of such a system. On the contrary, the operation of Barère's new law of war would have been more unfavorable to his countrymen than to ours; for we believe that, from the beginning to the end of the war, there never was a time at which the number of French prisoners in England was not greater than the number of English prisoners in France; and so, we apprehend, it will be in all wars while England retains her maritime superiority. Had the murderous decree of the Convention been in force from 1791 to 1815, we are satisfied that, for every Englishman slain by the French, at least three Frenchmen would have been put to the sword by the English. It is, therefore, not as Englishmen, but as members of the great society of mankind, that we speak with indignation and horror of the change which Barère attempted to introduce. The mere slaughter would have been the smallest part of the evil. The butchering of a single unarmed man in cold blood, under an act of the legislature, would have produced more evil than the carnage of ten such fields as Albuera. Public law would have been subverted from the foundations; national enmities would have been inflamed to a degree of rage which happily it is not easy for us to conceive; cordial peace would have been impossible. The moral character of the European nations would have been rapidly and deeply corrupted; for in all countries those men whose calling is to put their lives in jeopardy for the defence of the public weal, enjoy high consideration, and are considered as the best arbitrators on points of honor and manly bearing. With the standard of morality established in the military profession, the general standard of morality must to a great extent sink or rise. It is, therefore, a fortunate circumstance, that during a long course of years, respect for the weak, and clemency towards the vanquished, have been considered as qualities not less essential to the accomplished soldier than personal courage. How long would this continue to be the case, if the slaying of prisoners were a part of the daily duty of the warrior? What man of kind and generous nature would, under such a system, willingly bear arms? Who, that was compelled to bear arms, would long continue kind and generous? And is it not certain that, if barbarity towards the helpless became the characteristic of military men, the taint must rapidly spread to civil and to domestic life, and must show itself in all the dealings of the strong with the weak, of husbands with wives, of employers with workmen, of creditors with debtors?

But, thank God, Barère's decree was a mere dead letter. It was to be executed by men very different from those who, in the interior of France, were the instruments of the Committee of Public Safety, who prated at Jacobin Clubs, and ran to Fouquier Tinville with charges of incivism against women whom they could not seduce, and bankers from whom they could not extort money. The warriors who, under Hoche, had guarded the walls of Dunkirk, and who, under Kleber, had made good the defence of the wood of Monceaux, shrank with horror from an office more degrading than that of the hangman. "The Convention," said an officer to his men, "has sent orders that all the English prisoners shall be shot." "We will not shoot them," answered a stout-hearted sergeant. "Send them to the Convention. If the deputies take pleasure in killing a prisoner, they may kill him themselves, and eat him too, like savages as they are." This was the sentiment of the whole army. Bonaparte, who thoroughly understood war, who at Jaffa and elsewhere gave ample proof that he was not unwilling to strain the laws of war to their utmost rigor, and whose hatred of England amounted to a folly, always spoke of Barère's decree with loathing, and boasted that the army had refused to obey the Convention.

Such disobedience on the part of any other class of citizens would have been instantly punished by wholesale massacre; but the Committee of Public Safety was aware that the discipline which had tamed the unwarlike population of the fields and cities might not answer in camps. To fling people by scores out of a boat, and, when they catch hold of it, to chop off their fingers with a hatchet, is undoubtedly a very agreeable pastime for a thorough-bred Jacobin, when the sufferers are, as at Nantes, old confessors, young girls, or women with child. But such sport might prove a little dangerous if tried upon grim ranks of grenadiers, marked with the scars of Hondschoote, and singed by the smoke of Fleurus.

Barère, however, found some consolation. If he could not succeed in murdering the English and the Hanoverians, he was amply indemnified by a new and vast slaughter of his own countrymen and countrywomen. If the defence which has been set up for the members of the Committee of Public Safety had been well founded, if it had been true that they governed with extreme severity only because the republic was in extreme peril, it is clear that the severity would have diminished as the peril diminished. But the fact is, that those cruelties for which the public danger is made a plea, became more and more enormous as the danger became less and less, and reached the full height when there was no longer any danger at all. In the autumn of 1793, there was undoubtedly reason to apprehend that France might be unable to maintain the struggle against the European coalition. The enemy was triumphant on the frontiers. More than half the departments disowned the authority of the Convention. But at that time eight or ten necks a day were thought an ample allowance for the guillotine of the capital. In the summer of 1794, Bordeaux, Toulon, Caen, Lyons, Marseilles, had submitted to the ascendancy of Paris. The French arms were victorious under the Pyrenees and on the Sambre. Brussels had fallen. Prussia had announced her intention of withdrawing from the contest. The republic, no longer content with defending her own independence, was beginning to meditate conquest beyond the Alps and the Rhine. She was now more formidable to her neighbors than ever Louis the Fourteenth had been. And now the Revolutionary Tribunal of Paris was not content with forty, fifty, sixty heads in a morning. It was just after a series of victories which destroyed the whole force of the single argument which has been urged in defence of the system of Terror, that the Committee of Public Safety resolved to infuse into that system an energy hitherto unknown. It was proposed to reconstruct the Revolutionary Tribunal, and to collect in the space of two pages the whole revolutionary jurisprudence. Lists of twelve judges and fifty jurors were made out from among the fiercest Jacobins. The substantive law was simply this, that whatever the tribunal should think pernicious to the republic was a capital crime. The law of evidence was simply this, that whatever satisfied the jurors was sufficient proof. The law of procedure was of a piece with everything else. There was to be an advocate against the prisoner, and no advocate for him. It was expressly declared that, if the jurors were in any manner convinced of the guilt of the prisoner, they might convict him without hearing a single witness. The only punishment which the court could inflict was death.

Robespierre proposed this decree. When he had read it, a murmur rose from the Convention. The fear which had long restrained the deputies from opposing the Committee was overcome by a stronger fear. Every man felt the knife at his throat. "The decree," said one, "is of grave importance. I move that it be printed, and that the debate be adjourned. If such a measure were adopted without time for consideration, I would blow my brains out at once." The motion for adjournment was seconded. Then Barère sprang up. "It is impossible," he said, "that there can be any difference of opinion among us as to a law like this, a law so favorable in all respects to patriots; a law which insures the speedy punishment of conspirators. If there is to be an adjournment, I must insist that it shall not be for more than three days." The opposition was overawed; the decree was passed; and, during the six weeks which followed, the havoc was such as had never been known before.

And now the evil was beyond endurance. That timid majority which had for a time supported the Girondists, and which had, after their fall, contented itself with registering in silence the decrees of the Committee of Public Safety, at length drew courage from despair. Leaders of bold and firm character were not wanting, men such as Fouché and Tallien, who, having been long conspicuous among the chiefs of the Mountain, now found that their own lives, or lives still dearer to them than their own, were in extreme peril. Nor could it be longer kept secret that there was a schism in the despotic committee. On one side were Robespierre, St. Just, and Couthon; on the other, Collot and Billaud. Barère leaned towards these last, but only leaned towards them. As was ever his fashion when a great crisis was at hand, he fawned alternately on both parties, struck alternately at both, and held himself in readiness to chant the praises or to sign the death-warrant of either. In any event his Carmagnole was ready. The tree of liberty, the blood of traitors, the dagger of Brutus, the guineas of perfidious Albion, would do equally well for Billaud and for Robespierre.

The first attack which was made on Robespierre was indirect. An old woman named Catharine Théot, half maniac, half impostor, was protected by him, and exercised a strange influence over his mind; for he was naturally prone to superstition, and, having abjured the faith in which he had been brought up, was looking about for something to believe. Barère drew up a report against Catharine, which contained many facetious conceits, and ended as might be expected, with a motion for sending her and some other wretched creatures of both sexes to the Revolutionary Tribunal, or, in other words, to death. This report, however, he did not dare to read to the Convention himself. Another member, less timid, was induced to father the cruel buffoonery; and the real author enjoyed in security the dismay and vexation of Robespierre.

Barère now thought that he had done enough on one side, and that it was time to make his peace with the other. On the seventh of Thermidor, he pronounced in the Convention a panegyric on Robespierre. "That representative of the people," he said, "enjoys a reputation for patriotism, earned by five years of exertion, and by unalterable fidelity to the principles of independence and liberty." On the eighth of Thermidor, it became clear that a decisive struggle was at hand. Robespierre struck the first blow. He mounted the tribune, and uttered a long invective on his opponents. It was moved that his discourse should be printed; and Barère spoke for the printing. The sense of the Convention soon appeared to be the other way, and Barère apologized for his former speech, and implored his colleagues to abstain from disputes which could be agreeable only to Pitt and York. On the next day, the ever-memorable ninth of Thermidor, came the real tug of war. Tallien, bravely taking his life in his hand, led the onset. Billaud followed; and then all that infinite hatred which had long been kept down by terror burst forth, and swept every barrier before it. When at length the voice of Robespierre, drowned by the president's bell, and by shouts of "Down with the tyrant!" had died away in hoarse gasping, Barère arose. He began with timid and doubtful phrases, watched the effect of every word he uttered, and, when the feeling of the Assembly had been unequivocally manifested, declared against Robespierre. But it was not till the people out of doors, and especially the gunners of Paris, had espoused the cause of the Convention, that Barère felt quite at ease. Then he sprang to the tribune, poured forth a Carmagnole about Pisistratus and Catiline, and concluded by moving that the heads of Robespierre and Robespierre's accomplices should be cut off without a trial. The motion was carried. On the following morning the vanquished members of the Committee of Public Safety and their principal adherents suffered death. It was exactly one year since Barère had commenced his career of slaughter, by moving the proscription of his old allies the Girondists. We greatly doubt whether any human being has ever succeeded in packing more wickedness into the space of three hundred and sixty-five days.

The ninth of Thermidor is one of the great epochs in the history of Europe. It is true that the three members of the Committee of Public Safety who triumphed, were by no means better men than the three who fell. Indeed, we are inclined to think that of these six statesmen the least bad were Robespierre and St. Just, whose cruelty was the effect of sincere fanaticism operating on narrow understandings and acrimonious tempers. The worst of the six was, beyond all doubt, Barère, who had no faith in any part of the system which he upheld by persecution; who, while he sent his fellow-creatures to death for being the third consins of royalists, had not in the least made up his mind that a republic was better than a monarchy; who, while he slew his old friends for federalism, was himself far more a federalist than any of them; who had become a murderer merely for his safety, and who continued to be a murderer merely for his pleasure.

The tendency of the vulgar is to embody everything. Some individual is selected, and often selected very injudiciously, as the representative of every great movement of the public mind, of every great revolution in human affairs; and on this individual are concentrated all the love and all the hatred, all the admiration and all the contempt, which he ought rightfully to share with a whole party, a whole sect, a whole nation, a whole generation. Perhaps no human being has suffered so much from this propensity of the multitude as Robespierre. He is regarded not merely as what he was, an envious, malevolent zealot; but as the incarnation of Terror, as Jacobinism personified. The truth is, that it was not by him that the system of terror was carried to the last extreme. The most horrible days in the history of the revolutionary tribunal of Paris, were those which immediately preceded the ninth of Thermidor. Robespierre had then ceased to attend the meetings of the sovereign Committee; and the direction of affairs was really in the hands of Billaud, of Collot, and of Barère.

It had never occurred to those three tyrants, that in overthrowing Robespierre, they were overthrowing that system of Terror to which they were more attached than he had ever been. Their object was to go on slaying even more mercilessly than before. But they had misunderstood the nature of the great crisis which had at last arrived. The yoke of the Committee was broken forever. The Convention had regained its liberty, had tried its strength, had vanquished and punished its enemies. A great reaction had commenced. Twenty-four hours after Robespierre had ceased to live, it was moved and carried, amidst loud bursts of applause, that the sittings of the Revolutionary Tribunal should be suspended. Billaud was not at that moment present. He entered the hall soon after, learned with indignation what had passed, and moved that the vote should be rescinded. But loud cries of "No, no!" rose from those benches which had lately paid mute obedience to his commands. Barère came forward on the same day, and adjured the Convention not to relax the system of terror. "Beware, above all things," he cried, "of that fatal moderation which talks of peace and of clemency. Let aristocracy know, that here she will find only enemies sternly bent on vengeance, and judges who have no pity." But the day of the Carmagnoles was over: the restraint of fear had been relaxed; and the hatred with which the nation regarded the Jacobin dominion broke forth with ungovernable violence. Not more strongly did the tide of public opinion run against the old monarchy and aristocracy, at the time of the taking of the Bastille, than it now ran against the tyranny of the Mountain. From every dungeon the prisoners came forth, as they had gone in, by hundreds. The decree which forbade the soldiers of the republic to give quarter to the English, was repealed by an unanimous vote, amidst loud acclamations; nor, passed as it was, disobeyed as it was, and rescinded as it was, can it be with justice considered as a blemish on the fame of the French nation. The Jacobin club was refractory. It was suppressed without resistance. The surviving Girondist deputies, who had concealed themselves from the vengeance of their enemies in caverns and garrets, were readmitted to their seats in the Convention. No day passed without some signal reparation of injustice; no street in Paris was without some trace of the recent change. In the theatre, the bust of Marat was pulled down from its pedestal and broken in pieces, amidst the applause of the audience. His carcass was ejected from the Pantheon. The celebrated picture of his death, which had hung in the hall of the Convention, was removed. The savage inscriptions with which the walls of the city had been covered disappeared; and in place of death and terror, humanity, the watchword of the new rulers, was everywhere to be seen. In the mean time, the gay spirit of France, recently subdued by oppression, and now elated by the joy of a great deliverance, wanted in a thousand forms. Art, taste, luxury, revived. Female beauty regained its empire—an empire strengthened by the remembrance of all the tender and all the sublime virtues which women, delicately bred and reputed frivolous, had displayed during the evil days. Refined manners, chivalrous sentiments, followed in the train of love. The dawn of the Arctic summer day after the Arctic winter night, the great unsealing of the waters, the awakening of animal and vegetable life, the sudden softening of the air, the sudden blooming of the flowers, the sudden bursting of whole forests into verdure, is but a feeble type of that happiest and most genial of revolutions, the revolution of the ninth of Thermidor.

But, in the midst of the revival of all kind and generous sentiments, there was one portion of the community against which mercy itself seemed to cry out for vengeance. The chiefs of the late government and their tools were now never named but as the men of blood, the drinkers of blood, the cannibals. In some parts of France, where the creatures of the Mountain had acted with peculiar barbarity, the populace took the law into its own hands, and meted out justice to the Jacobins with the true Jacobin measure; but at Paris the punishments were inflicted with order and decency, and were few when compared with the number, and lenient when compared with the enormity, of the crimes. Soon after the ninth of Thermidor, two of the vilest of mankind, Fouquier Tinville, whom Barère had placed at the Revolutionary Tribunal, and Lebon, whom Barère had defended in the Convention, were placed under arrest. A third miscreant soon shared their fate, Carrier, the tyrant of Nantes. The trials of these men brought to light horrors surpassing anything that Suetonius and Lampridius have related of the worst Cæsars. But it was impossible to punish subordinate agents who, bad as they were, had only acted in accordance with the spirit of the government which they served, and, at the same time, to grant impunity to the heads of the wicked administration. A cry was raised, both within and without the Convention, for justice on Collot, Billaud, and Barère.

Collot and Billaud, with all their vices, appear to have been men of resolute natures. They made no submission; but opposed to the hatred of mankind, at first a fierce resistance, and afterwards a dogged and sullen endurance. Barère, on the other hand, as soon as he began to understand the real nature of the revolution of Thermidor, attempted to abandon the Mountain, and to obtain admission among his old friends of the moderate party. He declared everywhere that he had never been in favor of severe measures; that he was a Girondist; that he had always condemned and lamented the manner in which the Brissotine deputies had been treated. He now preached mercy from that tribune from which he had recently preached extermination. "The time," he said, "has come at which our clemency may be indulged without danger. We may now safely consider temporary imprisonment as an adequate punishment for political misdemeanors." It was only a fortnight since, from the same place, he had declaimed against the moderation which dared even to talk of clemency; it was only a fortnight since he had ceased to send men and women to the guillotine of Paris, at the rate of three hundred a week. He now wished to make his peace with the moderate party at the expense of the Terrorists, as he had, a year before, made his peace with the Terrorists at the expense of the moderate party. But he was disappointed. He had left himself no retreat. His face, his voice, his rants, his jokes, had become hateful to the Convention. When he spoke he was interrupted by murmurs. Bitter reflections were daily cast on his cowardice and perfidy. On one occasion Carnot rose to give an account of a victory, and so far forgot the gravity of his character, as to indulge in the sort of oratory which Barère had affected on similar occasions. He was interrupted by cries of "No more Carmagnoles!" "No more of Barère's puns!"

At length, five months after the revolution of Thermidor, the Convention resolved that a committee of twenty-one members should be appointed to examine into the conduct of Billaud, Collot, and Barère. In some weeks the report was made. From that report we learn that a paper had been discovered, signed by Barère, and containing a proposition for adding the last improvement to the system of terror. France was to be divided into circuits; itinerant revolutionary tribunals, composed of trusty Jacobins, were to move from department to department; and the guillotine was to travel in their train.

Barère, in his defence, insisted that no speech or motion which he had made in the Convention could, without a violation of the freedom of debate, be treated as a crime. He was asked how he could resort to such a mode of defence, after putting to death so many deputies on account of opinions expressed in the Convention. He had nothing to say, but that it was much to be regretted that the sound principle had ever been violated.

He arrogated to himself a large share of the merit of the revolution of Thermidor. The men who had risked their lives to effect that revolution, and who knew that, if they had failed, Barère would, in all probability, have moved the decree for beheading them without a trial, and have drawn up a proclamation announcing their guilt and their punishment to all France, were by no means disposed to acquiesce in his claims. He was reminded that, only forty-eight hours before the decisive conflict, he had, in the tribune, been profuse of adulation to Robespierre. His answer to this reproach is worthy of himself. "It was necessary," he said, "to dissemble. It was necessary to flatter Robespierre's vanity, and, by panegyric, to impel him to the attack. This was the motive which induced me to load him with those praises of which you complain. Who ever blamed Brutus for dissembling with Tarquin?"

The accused triumvirs had only one chance of escaping punishment. There was severe distress at that moment among the working people of the capital. This distress the Jacobins attributed to the reaction of Thermidor, to the lenity with which the aristocrats were now treated, and to the measures which had been adopted against the chiefs of the late administration. Nothing is too absurd to be believed by a populace which has not breakfasted, and which does not know how it is to dine. The rabble of the Faubourg St. Antoine rose, menaced the deputies, and demanded with loud cries the liberation of the persecuted patriots. But the Convention was no longer such as it had been, when similar means were employed too successfully against the Girondists. Its spirit was roused. Its strength had been proved. Military means were at its command. The tumult was suppressed, and it was decreed that same evening that Corlot, Billaud, and Barère should instantly be removed to a distant place of confinement.

The next day the order of the Convention was executed. The account which Barère has given of his journey is the most interesting and the most trustworthy part of these Memoirs. There is no witness so infamous that a court of justice will not take his word against himself; and even Barère may be believed when he tells us how much he was hated and despised.

The carriage in which he was to travel passed, surrounded by armed men, along the street of St. Honoré. A crowd soon gathered round it, and increased every moment. On the long flight of steps before the church of St. Roch stood rows of eager spectators. It was with difficulty that the coach could make its way through those who hung upon it, hooting, cursing, and striving to burst the doors. Barère thought his life in danger, and was conducted at his own request to a public office, where he hoped that he might find shelter till the crowd should disperse. In the mean time, another discussion on his fate took place in the Convention. It was proposed to deal with him as he had dealt with better men, to put him out of the pale of the law, and to deliver him at once without any trial to the headsman. But the humanity which, since the ninth of Thermidor, had generally directed the public counsels, restrained the deputies from taking this course.

It was now night; and the streets gradually became quiet. The clock struck twelve; and Barère, under a strong guard, again set forth on his journey. He was conducted over the river to the place where the Orleans road branches off from the southern boulevard. Two travelling carriages stood there. In one of them was Billaud, attended by two officers; in the other, two more officers were waiting to receive Barère. Collet was already on the road.

At Orleans, a city which had suffered cruelly from the Jacobin tyranny, the three deputies were surrounded by a mob bent on tearing them to pieces. All the national guards of the neighborhood were assembled; and this force was not greater than the emergency required; for the multitude pursued the carriages far on the road to Blois.

At Amboise the prisoners learned that Tours was ready to receive them. The stately bridge was occupied by a throng of people, who swore that the men under whose rule the Loire had been choked with corpses, should have full personal experience of the nature of a noyade. In consequence of this news, the officers who had charge of the criminals made such arrangements that the carriages reached Tours at two in the morning, and drove straight to the post-house. Fresh horses were instantly ordered, and the travellers started again at full gallop. They had in truth not a moment to lose; for the alarm had been given; lights were seen in motion; and the yells of a great multitude, disappointed of its revenge, mingled with the sound of the departing wheels.

At Poitiers there was another narrow escape. As the prisoners quitted the post-house, they saw the whole population pouring in fury down the steep declivity on which the city is built. They passed near Niort, but could not venture to enter it. The inhabitants came forth with threatening aspect, and vehemently cried to the postilions to stop; but the postilions urged the horses to full speed, and soon left the town behind. Through such dangers the men of blood were brought in safety to Rochelle.

Oléron was the place of their destination, a dreary island beaten by the raging waves of the Bay of Biscay. The prisoners were confined in the castle; each had a single chamber, at the door of which a guard was placed; and each was allowed the ration of a single soldier. They were not allowed to communicate either with the garrison or with the population of the island; and soon after their arrival they were denied the indulgence of walking on the ramparts. The only place where they were suffered to take exercise was the esplanade where the troops were drilled.

They had not been long in this situation when news came that the Jacobins of Paris had made a last attempt to regain ascendancy in the state, that the hall of the Convention had been forced by a furious crowd, that one of the deputies had been murdered and his head fixed on a pike, that the life of the President had been for a time in imminent danger, and that some members of the legislature had not been ashamed to join the rioters. But troops had arrived in time to prevent the massacre. The insurgents had been put to flight; the inhabitants of the disaffected quarters of the capital had been disarmed; the guilty deputies had suffered the just punishment of their treason; and the power of the Mountain was broken forever. These events strengthened the aversion with which the system of Terror and the authors of that system were regarded. One member of the Convention had moved that the three prisoners of Oléron should be put to death; another, that they should be brought back to Paris, and tried by a council of war. These propositions were rejected. But something was conceded to the party which called for severity. A vessel, which had been fitted out with great expedition at Rochefort, touched at Oléron, and it was announced to Collot and Billaud that they must instantly go on board. They were forthwith conveyed to Guiana, where Collot soon drank himself to death with brandy. Billaud lived many years, shunning his fellow-creatures and shunned by them: and diverted his lonely hours by teaching parrots to talk. Why a distinction was made between Barère and his companions in guilt, neither he nor any other writer, as far as we know, has explained. It does not appear that the distinction was meant to be at all in his favor; for orders soon arrived from Paris, that he should be brought to trial for his crimes before the criminal court of the department of the Upper Charente. He was accordingly brought back to the continent, and confined during some months at Saintes, in an old convent which had lately been turned into a jail.

While he lingered here, the reaction which had followed the great crisis of Thermidor met with a temporary check. The friends of the house of Bourbon, presuming on the indulgence with which they had been treated after the fall of Robespierre, not only ventured to avow their opinions with little disguise, but at length took arms against the Convention, and were not put down till much blood had been shed in the streets of Paris. The vigilance of the public authorities was therefore now directed chiefly against the Royalists, and the rigor with which the Jacobins had lately been treated was somewhat relaxed. The Convention, indeed, again resolved that Barère should be sent to Guiana. But this decree was not carried into effect. The prisoner, probably with the connivance of some powerful persons, made his escape from Saintes and fled to Bordeaux, where he remained in concealment during some years. There seems to have been a kind of understanding between him and the government, that, as long as he hid himself, he should not be found, but that, if he obtruded himself on the public eye, he must take the consequences of his rashness.

While the constitution of 1795, with its Executive Directory, its Council of Elders, and its Council of Five Hundred, was in operation, he continued to live under the ban of the law. It was in vain that he solicited, even at moments when the politics of the Mountain seemed to be again in the ascendant, a remission of the sentence pronounced by the Convention. Even his fellow-regicides, even the authors of the slaughter of Vendémiaire and of the arrests of Fructidor, were ashamed of him.

About eighteen months after his escape from prison, his name was again brought before the world. In his own province he still retained some of his early popularity. He had, indeed, never been in that province since the downfall of the monarchy. The mountaineers of Gascony were far removed from the seat of government, and were but imperfectly informed of what passed there. They knew that their countryman had played an important part, and that he had on some occasions promoted their local interests; and they stood by him in his adversity and in his disgrace, with a constancy which presents a singular contrast to his own abject fickleness. All France was amazed to learn that the department of the Upper Pyrenees had chosen the proscribed tyrant a member of the Council of Five Hundred. The council which, like our House of Commons, was the judge of the election of its own members, refused to admit him. When his name was read from the roll, a cry of indignation rose from the benches. "Which of you," exclaimed one of the members, "would sit by the side of such a monster!"—"Not I, not I!" answered a crowd of voices. One deputy declared, that he would vacate his seat if the hall were polluted by the presence of such a wretch. The election was declared null, on the ground that the person elected was a criminal skulking from justice; and many severe reflections were thrown on the lenity which suffered him to be still at large.

He tried to make his peace with the Directory, by writing a bulky libel on England, entitled, The Liberty of the Seas. He seems to have confidently expected that this work would produce a great effect. He printed three thousand copies, and, in order to defray the expense of publication, sold one of his farms for the sum of ten thousand francs. The book came out; but nobody bought it, in consequence, if Barère is to be believed, of the villany of Mr. Pitt, who bribed the Directory to order the Reviewers not to notice so formidable an attack on the maritime greatness of perfidious Albion.

Barère had been about three years at Bordeaux when he received intelligence that the mob of the town designed him the honor of a visit on the ninth of Thermidor, and would probably administer to him what he had, in his defence of his friend Lebon, described as substantial justice under forms a little harsh. It was necessary for him to disguise himself in clothes such as were worn by the carpenters of the dock. In this garb, with a bundle of wood shavings under his arm, he made his escape into the vineyards which surround the city, lurked during some days in a peasant's hut, and, when the dreaded anniversary was over, stole back into the city. A few months later he was again in danger. He now thought that he should be nowhere so safe as in the neighborhood of Paris. He quitted Bordeaux, hastened undetected through those towns where four years before his life had been in extreme danger, passed through the capital in the morning twilight, when none were in the streets except shop-boys taking down the shutters, and arrived safe at the pleasant village of St. Ouen on the Seine. Here he remained in seclusion during some months. In the mean time Bonaparte returned from Egypt, placed himself at the head of a coalition of discontented parties, covered his designs with the authority of the Elders, drove the Five Hundred out of their hall at the point of the bayonet, and became absolute monarch of France under the name of First Consul.

Barère assures us that these events almost broke his heart; that he could not bear to see France again subject to a master; and that, if the representatives had been worthy of that honorable name, they would have arrested the ambitious general who insulted them. These feelings, however, did not prevent him from soliciting the protection of the new government, and from sending to the First Consul a handsome copy of the Essay on the Liberty of the Seas.

The policy of Bonaparte was to cover all the past with a general oblivion. He belonged half to the Revolution and half to the reaction. He was an upstart, and a sovereign; and had therefore something in common with the Jacobin, and something in common with the Royalist. All, whether Jacobins or Royalists, who were disposed to support his government, were readily received—all, whether Jacobins or Royalists, who showed hostility to his government, were put down and punished. Men who had borne a part in the worst crimes of the Reign of Terror, and men who had fought in the army of Condé, were to be found close together, both in his antechambers and in his dungeons. He decorated Fouché and Maury with the same cross. He sent Aréna and Georges Cadoudal to the same scaffold. From a government acting on such principles, Barère easily obtained the indulgence which the Directory had constantly refused to grant. The sentence passed by the Convention was remitted, and he was allowed to reside at Paris. His pardon, it is true, was not granted in the most honorable form; and he remained, during some time, under the special supervision of the police. He hastened, however, to pay his court at the Luxembourg palace, where Bonaparte then resided, and was honored with a few dry and careless words by the master of France.

Here begins a new chapter of Barère's history. What passed between him and the Consular government cannot, of course, be so accurately known to us as the speeches and reports which he made in the Convention. It is, however, not difficult, from notorious facts, and from the admissions scattered over these lying Memoirs, to form a tolerably accurate notion of what took place. Bonaparte wanted to buy Barère: Barère wanted to sell himself to Bonaparte. The only question was one of price; and there was an immense interval between what was offered and what was demanded.

Bonaparte, whose vehemence of will, fixedness of purpose, and reliance on his own genius, were not only great, but extravagant, looked with scorn on the most effeminate and dependent of human minds. He was quite capable of perpetrating crimes under the influence either of ambition or of revenge; but he had no touch of that accursed monomania, that craving for blood and tears, which raged in some of the Jacobin chiefs. To proscribe the Terrorists would have been wholly inconsistent with his policy; but of all the classes of men whom his comprehensive system included, he liked them the least; and Barère was the worst of them. This wretch had been branded with infamy, first by the Convention, and then by the Council of Five Hundred. The inhabitants of four or five great cities had attempted to tear him limb from limb. Nor were his vices redeemed by eminent talents for administration or legislation. It would be unwise to place in any honorable or important post a man so wicked, so odious, and so little qualified to discharge high political duties. At the same time, there was a way in which it seemed likely that he might be of use to the government. The First Consul, as he afterwards acknowledged, greatly overrated Barère's powers as a writer. The effect which the Reports of the Committee of Public Safety had produced by the camp-fires of the Republican armies had been great. Napoleon himself, when a young soldier, had been delighted by those compositions, which had much in common with the rhapsodies of his favorite poet, Macpherson. The taste, indeed, of the great warrior and statesman was never very pure. His bulletins, his general orders, and his proclamations, are sometimes, it is true, masterpieces in their kind; but we too often detect, even in his best writing, traces of Fingal, and of the Carmagnoles. It is not strange, therefore, that he should have been desirous to secure the aid of Barère's pen. Nor was this the only kind of assistance which the old member of the Committee of Public Safety might render to the Consular government. He was likely to find admission into the gloomy dens in which those Jacobins whose constancy was to be overcome by no reverse, or whose crimes admitted of no expiation, hid themselves from the curses of mankind. No enterprise was too bold or too atrocious for minds crazed by fanaticism, and familiar with misery and death. The government was anxious to have information of what passed in their secret councils; and no man was better qualified to furnish such information than Barère.

For these reasons the First Consul was disposed to employ Barère as a writer and as a spy. But Barère—was it possible that he would submit to such a degradation? Bad as he was, he had played a great part. He had belonged to that class of criminals who fill the world with the renown of their crimes; he had been one of a cabinet which had ruled France with absolute power, and made war on all Europe with signal success. Nay, he had been, though not the most powerful, yet, with the single exception of Robespierre, the most conspicuous member of that cabinet. His name had been a household word at Moscow and at Philadelphia, at Edinburgh and at Cadiz. The blood of the Queen of France, the blood of the greatest orators and philosophers of France, was on his hands. He had spoken; and it had been decreed that the plough should pass over the great city of Lyons. He had spoken again; and it had been decreed that the streets of Toulon should be razed to the ground. When depravity is placed so high as his, the hatred which it inspires is mingled with awe. His place was with great tyrants, with Critias and Sylla, with Eccelesio and Borgia; not with hireling scribblers and police runners.

"Virtue, I grant you, is an empty boast;
But shall the dignity of vice be lost?"

So sang Pope; and so felt Barère. When it was proposed to him to publish a Journal in defence of the Consular government, rage and shame inspired him for the first and last time with something like courage. He had filled as large a space in the eyes of mankind as Mr. Pitt or General Washington; and he was coolly invited to descend at once to the level of Mr. Lewis Goldsmith. He saw, too, with agonies of envy, that a wide distinction was made between himself and the other statesmen of the Revolution who were summoned to the aid of the government. Those statesmen were required, indeed, to make large sacrifices of principle; but they were not called on to sacrifice what, in the opinion of the vulgar, constitutes personal dignity. They were made tribunes and legislators, ambassadors and counsellors of state, ministers, senators, and consuls. They might reasonably expect to rise with the rising fortunes of their master; and, in truth, many of them were destined to wear the badge of his Legion of Honor and of his order of the Iron Crown; to be arch-chancellors and arch-treasurers, counts, dukes, and princes. Barère, only six years before, had been far more powerful, far more widely renowned, than any of them; and now, while they were thought worthy to represent the majesty of France at foreign courts, while they received crowds of suitors in gilded ante-chambers, he was to pass his life in measuring paragraphs, and scolding correctors of the press. It was too much. Those lips which had never before been able to fashion themselves to a No, now murmured expostulation and refusal. "I could not"—these are his own words—"abase myself to such a point as to serve the First Consul merely in the capacity of a journalist, while so many insignificant, low, and servile people, such as the Treilhards, the Roderers, the Lebruns, the Marcets, and others whom it is superfluous to name, held the first place in this government of upstarts."

This outbreak of spirit was of short duration. Napoleon was inexorable. It is said indeed that he was, for a moment, half inclined to admit Barère into the Council of State; but the members of that body remonstrated in the strongest terms, and declared that such a nomination would be a disgrace to them all. This plan was therefore relinquished. Thenceforth Barère's only chance of obtaining the patronage of the government was to subdue his pride, to forget that there had been a time when, with three words, he might have had the heads of the three Consuls, and to betake himself, humbly and industriously, to the task of composing lampoons on England and panegyrics on Bonaparte.

It has been often asserted, we know not on what grounds, that Barère was employed by the government, not only as a writer, but as a censor of the writings of other men. This imputation he vehemently denies in his Memoirs; but our readers will probably agree with us in thinking, that his denial leaves the question exactly where it was.

Thus much is certain, that he was not restrained from exercising the office of censor by any scruple of conscience or honor; for he did accept an office, compared with which that of censor, odious as it is, may be called an august and beneficent magistracy. He began to have what are delicately called relations with the police. We are not sure that we have formed, or that we can convey, an exact notion of the nature of Barère's new calling. It is a calling unknown in our country. It has indeed often happened in England, that a plot has been revealed to the government by one of the conspirators. The informer has sometimes been directed to carry it fair towards his accomplices, and to let the evil design come to full maturity. As soon as his work is done, he is generally snatched from the public gaze, and sent to some obscure village, or to some remote colony. The use of spies, even to this extent, is in the highest degree unpopular in England; but a political spy by profession, is a creature from which our island is as free as it is from wolves. In France the race is well known, and was never more numerous, more greedy, more cunning, or more savage, than under the government of Bonaparte.

Our idea of a gentleman in relations with the Consular and Imperial police may perhaps be incorrect. Such as it is, we will try to convey it to our readers. We image to ourselves a well-dressed person, with a soft voice and affable manners. His opinions are those of the society in which he finds himself, but a little stronger. He often complains, in the language of honest indignation, that what passes in private conversation finds its way strangely to the government, and cautions his associates to take care what they say when they are not sure of their company. As for himself, he owns that he is indiscreet. He can never refrain from speaking his mind; and that is the reason that he is not prefect of a department.

In a gallery of the Palais Royal he overhears two friends talking earnestly about the king and the Count of Artois. He follows them into a coffee-house, sits at the table next to them, calls for his half-dish and his small glass of cognac, takes up a Journal, and seems occupied with the news. His neighbors go on talking without restraint, and in the style of persons warmly attached to the exiled family. They depart, and he follows them half round the boulevards till he fairly tracks them to their apartments, and learns their names from the porters. From that day every letter addressed to either of them is sent from the post-office to the police, and opened. Their correspondents become known to the government, and are carefully watched. Six or eight honest families, in different parts of France, find themselves at once under the frown of power, without being able to guess what offence they have given. One person is dismissed from a public office; another learns with dismay that his promising son has been turned out of the Polytechnic school.

Next, the indefatigable servant of the state falls in with an old republican, who has not changed with the times, who regrets the red cap and the tree of liberty, who has not unlearned the Thee and Thou, and who still subscribes his letters with "Health and Fraternity." Into the ears of this sturdy politician our friend pours forth a long series of complaints. What evil times! What a change since the days when the Mountain governed France! What is the First Consul but a king under a new name? What is this Legion of Honor but a new aristocracy? The old superstition is reviving with the old tyranny. There is a treaty with the Pope, and a provision for the clergy. Emigrant nobles are returning in crowds, and are better received at the Tuileries than the men of the tenth of August. This cannot last. What is life without liberty! What terrors has death to the true patriot! The old Jacobin catches fire, bestows and receives the fraternal hug, and hints that there will soon be great news, and that the breed of Harmodius and Brutus is not quite extinct. The next day he is close prisoner, and all his papers are in the hands of the government.

To this vocation,—a vocation compared with which the life of a beggar, of a pickpocket, of a pimp, is honorable,—did Barère now descend. It was his constant practice, as often as he enrolled himself in a new party, to pay his footing with the heads of old friends. He was at first a Royalist; and he made atonement by watering the tree of liberty with the blood of Louis. He was then a Girondist; and he made atonement by murdering Vergniaud and Gensonné. He fawned on Robespierre up to the eighth of Thermidor; and he made atonement by moving, on the ninth, that Robespierre should be beheaded without a trial. He was now enlisted in the service of the new monarchy; and he proceeded to atone for his republican heresies by sending republican throats to the guillotine.

Among his most intimate associates was a Gascon named Demerville, who had been employed in an office of high trust under the Committee of Public Safety. This man was fanatically attached to the Jacobin system of politics, and, in conjunction with other enthusiasts of the same class, formed a design against the First Consul. A hint of this design escaped him in conversation with Barère. Barère carried the intelligence to Lannes, who commanded the Consular Guards. Demerville was arrested, tried, and beheaded; and among the witnesses who appeared against him was his friend Barère.

The account which Barère has given of these transactions is studiously confused and grossly dishonest. We think, however, that we can discern, through much falsehood and much artful obscurity, some truths which he labors to conceal. It is clear to us that the government suspected him of what the Italians call a double treason. It was natural that such a suspicion should attach to him. He had, in times not very remote, zealously preached the Jacobin doctrine, that he who smites a tyrant deserves higher praise than he who saves a citizen. Was it possible that the member of the Committee of Public Safety, the king-killer, the queen-killer, could in earnest mean to deliver his old confederates, his bosom friends, to the executioner, solely because they had planned an act which, if there were any truth in his own Cannagnoles, was in the highest degree virtuous and glorious? Was it not more probable that he was really concerned in the plot, and that the information which he gave was merely intended to lull or mislead the police? Accordingly spies were set on the spy. He was ordered to quit Paris, and not to come within twenty leagues till he received further orders. Nay, he ran no small risk of being sent, with some of his old friends, to Madagascar.

He made his peace, however, with the government so far, that he was not only permitted, during some years, to live unmolested, but was employed in the lowest sort of political drudgery. In the summer of 1803, while he was preparing to visit the south of France, he received a letter which deserves to be inserted. It was from Duroc, who is well known to have enjoyed a large share of Napoleon's confidence and favor.

"The First Consul, having been informed that citizen Barère is about to set out for the country, desires that he will stay at Paris.

"Citizen Barère will every week draw up a report on the state of public opinion on the proceedings of the government, and generally on everything which, in his judgment, it will be interesting to the First Consul to learn.

"He may write with perfect freedom.

"He will deliver his reports under seal into General Duroc's own hand, and General Duroc will deliver them to the First Consul. But it is absolutely necessary that nobody should suspect that this species of communication takes place; and, should any such suspicion get abroad, the First Consul will cease to receive the reports of citizen Barère.

"It will also be proper that citizen Barère should frequently insert in the journals articles tending to animate the public mind, particularly against the English."

During some years Barère continued to discharge the functions assigned to him by his master. Secret reports, filled with the talk of coffee-houses, were carried by him every week to the Tuileries. His friends assure us that he took especial pains to do all the harm in his power to the returned emigrants. It was not his fault if Napoleon was not apprized of every murmur and every sarcasm which old marquesses who had lost their estates, and old clergymen who had lost their benefices, uttered against the imperial system. M. Hippolyte Carnot, we grieve to say, is so much blinded by party spirit, that he seems to reckon this dirty wickedness among his hero's titles to public esteem.

Barère was, at the same time, an indefatigable journalist and pamphleteer. He set up a paper directed against England, and called the Mémorial Antibritannique. He planned a work entitled, "France made great and illustrious by Napoleon." When the Imperial government was established, the old regicide made himself conspicuous even among the crowd of flatterers by the peculiar fulsomeness of his adulation. He translated into French a contemptible volume of Italian verses, entitled, "The Poetic Crown, composed on the glorious accession of Napoleon the First, by the Shepherds of Arcadia." He commenced a new series of Carmagnoles very different from those which had charmed the Mountain. The title of Emperor of the French, he said, was mean; Napoleon ought to be Emperor of Europe. King of Italy was too humble an appellation; Napoleon's style ought to be King of Kings.

But Barère labored to small purpose in both his vocations. Neither as a writer nor as a spy was he of much use. He complains bitterly that his paper did not sell. While the Journal des Débats, then flourishing under the able management of Geoffroy, had a circulation of at least twenty thousand copies, the Mémorial Antibritannique never, in its most prosperous times, had more than fifteen hundred subscribers; and these subscribers were, with scarcely an exception, persons residing far from Paris, probably Gascons, among whom the name of Barère had not yet lost its influence.

A writer who cannot find readers, generally attributes the public neglect to any cause rather than to the true one; and Barère was no exception to the general rule. His old hatred to Paris revived in all its fury. That city, he says, has no sympathy with France. No Parisian cares to subscribe to a journal which dwells on the real wants and interests of the country. To a Parisian nothing is so ridiculous as patriotism. The higher classes of the capital have always been devoted to England. A corporal from London is better received among them than a French general. A journal therefore, which attacks England, has no chance of their support.

A much better explanation of the failure of the Mémorial, was given by Bonaparte at St. Helena. "Barère," said he to Barry O'Meara, "had the reputation of being a man of talent, but I did not find him so. I employed him to write; but he did not display ability. He used many flowers of rhetoric, but no solid argument; nothing but coglionerie wrapped up in high-sounding language."

The truth is, that though Barère was a man of quick parts, and could do with ease what he could do at all, he had never been a good writer. In the day of his power, he had been in the habit of haranguing an excitable audience on exciting topics. The faults of his style passed uncensured; for it was a time of literary as well as of civil lawlessness, and a patriot was licensed to violate the ordinary rules of composition as well as the ordinary rules of jurisprudence and of social morality. But there had now been a literary as well as a civil reaction. As there was again a throne and a court, a magistracy, a chivalry, and a hierarchy, so was there a revival of classical taste. Honor was again paid to the prose of Pascal and Massillon, and to the verse of Racine and La Fontaine. The oratory which had delighted the galleries of the Convention, was not only as much out of date as the language of Villehardouin and Joinville, but was associated in the public mind with images of horror. All the peculiarities of the Anacreon of the guillotine, his words unknown to the Dictionary of the Academy, his conceits and his jokes, his Gascon idioms and his Gascon hyperboles, had become as odious as the cant of the Puritans was in England after the restoration.

Bonaparte, who had never loved the men of the Reign of Terror, had now ceased to fear them. He was all-powerful and at the height of glory; they were weak and universally abhorred. He was a sovereign, and it is probable that he already meditated a matrimonial alliance with sovereigns. He was naturally unwilling, in his new position, to hold any intercourse with the worst class of Jacobins. Had Barère's literary assistance been important to the government, personal aversion might have yielded to considerations of policy; but there was no motive for keeping terms with a worthless man who had also proved a worthless writer. Bonaparte, therefore, gave loose to his feelings. Barère was not gently dropped, nor sent into an honorable retirement, but spurned and scourged away like a troublesome dog. He had been in the habit of sending six copies of his journal, on fine paper, daily to the Tuileries. Instead of receiving the thanks and praises which he expected, he was dryly told that the great man had ordered five copies to be sent back. Still he toiled on; still he cherished a hope that at last Napoleon would relent, and that at last some share in the honors of the state would reward so much assiduity and so much obsequiousness. He was bitterly undeceived. Under the Imperial constitution the electoral colleges of the departments did not possess the right of choosing senators or deputies, but merely that of presenting candidates. From among these candidates the Emperor named members of the senate, and the senate named members of the legislative body. The inhabitants of the Upper Pyrenees were still strangely partial to Barère. In the year 1805, they were disposed to present him as a candidate for the senate. On this Napoleon expressed the highest displeasure; and the president of the electoral college was directed to tell the voters, in plain terms, that such a choice would be disgraceful to the department. All thought of naming Barère a candidate for the senate was consequently dropped. But the people of Argèdes ventured to name him a candidate for the legislative body. The body was altogether destitute of weight and dignity; it was not permitted to debate; its only function was to vote in silence for whatever the government proposed. It is not easy to understand how any man, who had sat in free and powerful deliberative assemblies, could condescend to bear a part in such a mummary. Barère, however, was desirous of a place even in this mock legislature; and a place even in this mock legislature was refused to him. In the whole senate he had not a single vote.

Such treatment was sufficient, it might have been thought, to move the most abject of mankind to resentment. Still, however, Barère cringed and fawned on. His Letters came weekly to the Tuileries till the year 1807. At length, while he was actually writing the two hundred and twenty-third of the series, a note was put into his hands. It was from Duroc, and was much more perspicuous than polite. Barère was requested to send no more of his Reports to the palace, as the Emperor was too busy to read them.

Contempt, says the Indian proverb, pierces even the shell of the tortoise; and the contempt of the Court was felt to the quick even by the callous heart of Barère. He had humbled himself to the dust; and he had humbled himself in vain. Having been eminent among the rulers of a great and victorious state, he had stooped to serve a master in the vilest capacities; and he had been told that, even in those capacities, he was not worthy of the pittance which had been disdainfully flung to him. He was now degraded below the level even of the hirelings whom the government employed in the most infamous offices. He stood idle in the market-place, not because he thought any office too infamous, but because none would hire him.

Yet he had reason to think himself fortunate; for, had all that is avowed in these Memoirs been then known, he would have received very different tokens of the Imperial displeasure. We learn from himself, that while publishing daily columns of flattery on Bonaparte, and while carrying weekly budgets of calumny to the Tuileries, he was in close connexion with the agents whom the Emperor Alexander, then by no means favorably disposed towards France, employed to watch all that passed at Paris; was permitted to read their secret despatches; was consulted by them as to the temper of the public mind and the character of Napoleon; and did his best to persuade them that the government was in a tottering condition, and that the new sovereign was not, as the world supposed, a great statesman and soldier. Next, Barère, still the flatterer and talebearer of the Imperial Court, connected himself in the same manner with the Spanish envoy. He owns that with that envoy he had relations which he took the greatest pains to conceal from his own government; that they met twice a-day, and that their conversation chiefly turned on the vices of Napoleon, on his designs against Spain, and on the best mode of rendering those designs abortive. In truth, Barère's baseness was unfathomable. In the lowest depths of shame he found out lower depths. It is bad to be a sycophant; it is bad to be a spy. But even among sycophants and spies there are degrees of meanness. The vilest sycophant is he who privily slanders the master on whom he fawns; the vilest spy is he who serves foreigners against the government of his native land.

From 1807 to 1814 Barère lived in obscurity, railing as bitterly as his craven cowardice would permit against the Imperial administration, and coming sometimes unpleasantly across the police. When the Bourbons returned, he, as might have been expected, became a royalist, and wrote a pamphlet setting forth the horrors of the system from which the Restoration had delivered France, and magnifying the wisdom and goodness which had dictated the charter. He who had voted for the death of Louis, he who had moved the decree for the trial of Marie Antoinette, he whose hatred of monarchy had led him to make war even upon the sepulchres of ancient monarchs, assures us with great complacency, that "in this work monarchical principles and attachment to the House of Bourbon are nobly expressed." By this apostasy he got nothing, not even any additional infamy; for his character was already too black to be blackened.

During the hundred days he again emerged for a very short time into public life; he was chosen by his native district a member of the Chamber of Representatives. But though that assembly was composed in a great measure of men who regarded the excesses of the Jacobins with indulgence, he found himself an object of general aversion. When the President first informed the Chamber that M. Barère requested a hearing, a deep and indignant murmur ran round the benches. After the battle of Waterloo, Barère proposed that the Chamber should save France from the victorious enemy, by putting forth a proclamation about the pass of Thermopylæ, and the Lacedæmonian custom of wearing flowers in times of extreme danger. Whether this composition, if it had then appeared, would have stopped the English and Prussian armies, is a question respecting which we are left to conjecture. The Chamber refused to adopt this last of the Carmagnoles.

The Emperor had abdicated. The Bourbons returned. The Chamber of Representatives, after burlesquing during a few weeks the proceedings of the National Convention, retired with the well-earned character of having been the silliest political assembly that had met in France. Those dreaming pedants and praters never for a moment comprehended their position. They could never understand that Europe must be either conciliated or vanquished; that Europe could be conciliated only by the restoration of Louis, and vanquished only by means of a dictatorial power entrusted to Napoleon. They would not hear of Louis; yet they would not hear of the only measures which could keep him out. They incurred the enmity of all foreign powers by putting Napoleon at their head; yet they shackled him, thwarted him, quarrelled with him about every trifle, abandoned him on the first reverse. They then opposed declamations and disquisitions to eight hundred thousand bayonets; played at making a constitution for their country, when it depended on the indulgence of the victor whether they should have a country; and were at last interrupted in the midst of their babble about the rights of man and the sovereignty of the people, by the soldiers of Wellington and Blücher.

A new Chamber of Deputies was elected, so bitterly hostile to the Revolution, that there was no small risk of a new Reign of Terror. It is just, however, to say that the king, his ministers, and his allies, exerted themselves to restrain the violence of the fanatical royalists, and that the punishments inflicted, though in our opinion unjustifiable, were few and lenient when compared with those which were demanded by M. de Labouderie and M. Hyde de Neuville. We have always heard, and are inclined to believe, that the government was not disposed to treat even the regicides with severity. But on this point the feeling of the Chamber of Deputies was so strong, that it was thought necessary to make some concession. It was enacted, therefore, that whoever, having voted in January, 1793, for the death of Louis the Sixteenth, had in any manner given in an adhesion to the government of Bonaparte during the hundred days, should be banished for life from France. Barère fell within this description. He had voted for the death of Louis; and he had sat in the Chamber of Representatives during the hundred days.

He accordingly retired to Belgium, and resided there, forgotten by all mankind, till the year 1830. After the revolution of July he was at liberty to return to France, and he fixed his residence in his native province. But he was soon involved in a succession of lawsuits with his nearest relations—"three fatal sisters and an ungrateful brother," to use his own words. Who was in the right, is a question about which we have no means of judging, and certainly shall not take Barère's word. The courts appear to have decided some points in his favor and some against him. The natural inference is, that there were faults on all sides. The result of this litigation was, that the old man was reduced to extreme poverty, and was forced to sell his paternal house.

As far as we can judge from the few facts which remain to be mentioned, Barère continued Barère to the last. After his exile he turned Jacobin again, and, when he came back to France joined the party of the extreme left in railing at Louis Philippe and at all Louis Philippe's ministers. M. Casimir Périer, M. De Broglie, M. Guizot and M. Thiers, in particular, are honored with his abuse; and the king himself is held up to execration as a hypocritical tyrant. Nevertheless, Barère had no scruple about accepting a charitable donation of a thousand francs a-year from the privy purse of the sovereign whom he hated and reviled. This pension, together with some small sums occasionally doled out to him by the department of the Interior, on the ground that he was a distressed man of letters, and by the department of Justice, on the ground that he had formerly held a high judicial office, saved him from the necessity of begging his bread. Having survived all his colleagues of the renowned Committee of Public Safety, and almost all his colleagues of the Convention, he died in January, 1841. He had attained his eighty-sixth year.

We have now laid before our readers what we believe to be a just account of this man's life. Can it be necessary for us to add anything for the purpose of assisting their judgment of his character? If we were writing about any of his colleagues in the Committee of Public Safety, about Carnot, about Robespierre, or St. Just, nay, even about Couthon, Collot, or Billaud, we might feel it necessary to go into a full examination of the arguments which have been employed to vindicate or to excuse the system of Terror. We could, we think, show that France was saved from her foreign enemies, not by the system of Terror, but in spite of it; and that the perils which were made the plea for the violent policy of the Mountain, were to a great extent created by that very policy. We could, we think, also show that the evils produced by the Jacobin administration did not terminate when it fell : that it bequeathed a long series of calamities to France and to Europe ; that public opinion, which had during two generations been constantly becoming more and more favorable to civil and religious freedom, underwent, during the days of Terror, a change of which the traces are still to be distinctly perceived. It was natural that there should be such a change, when men saw that those who called themselves the champions of popular rights had compressed into the space of twelve months more crimes than the kings of France, Merovingian, Carlovingian, and Capetian, had perpetrated in twelve centuries. Freedom was regarded as a great delusion. Men were willing to submit to the government of hereditary princes, of fortunate soldiers, of nobles, of priests ; to any government but that of philosophers and philanthropists. Hence the imperial despotism, with its enslaved press and its silent tribune, its dungeons stronger than the old Bastille, and its tribunals more obsequious than the old parliaments. Hence the restoration of the Bourbons and of the Jesuits, the Chamber of 1815, with its categories of proscription, the revival of the feudal spirit, the encroachments of the clergy, the persecution of the Protestants, the appearance of a new breed of De Montforts and Dominics in the full light of the nineteenth century. Hence the admission of France into the Holy Alliance, and the war waged by the old soldiers of the tricolor against the liberties of Spain. Hence, too, the apprehensions with which, even at the present day, the most temperate plans for widening the narrow basis of the French representation are regarded by those who are especially interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order. Half a century has not sufficed to obliterate the stain which one year of depravity and madness has left on the noblest of causes.

Nothing is more ridiculous than the manner in which writers like M. Hippolyte Carnot defend or excuse the Jacobin administration, while they declaim against the reaction which followed. That the reaction has produced and is still producing much evil, is perfectly true. But what produced the reaction ? The spring flies up with a force proportioned to that with which it has been pressed down. The pendulum which is drawn far in one direction swings as far in the other. The joyous madness of intoxication in the evening is followed by languor and nausea on the morrow. And so, in politics, it is the sure law that every excess shall generate its opposite ; nor does he deserve the name of a statesman who strikes a great blow without fully calculating the effect of the rebound. But such calculation was infinitely beyond the reach of the authors of the Reign of Terror. Violence, and more violence, blood and more blood, made up their whole policy. In a few months these poor creatures succeeded in bringing about a reaction, of which none of them saw, and of which none of us may see, the close ; and, having brought it about, they marvelled at it ; they bewailed it ; they execrated it : they ascribed it to everything but the real cause—their own immorality and their own profound incapacity for the conduct of great affairs.

These, however, are considerations to which, on the present occasion, it is hardly necessary for us to advert ; for, be the defence which has been set up for the Jacobin policy good or bad, it is a defence which cannot avail Barère. From his own life, from his own pen, from his own mouth, we can prove that the part which he took in the work of blood is to be attributed, not even to sincere fanaticism, not even to misdirected and ill-regulated patriotism, but either to cowardice, or to delight in human misery. Will it be pretended that it was from public spirit that he murdered the Girondists ? In these very Memoirs he tells us that he always regarded their death as the greatest calamity that could befall France. Will it be pretended that it was from public spirit that he raved for the head of the Austrian woman ? In these very Memoirs he tells us that the time spent in attacking her was ill spent, and ought to have been employed in concerting measures of national defence. Will it be pretended that he was induced by sincere and earnest abhorrence of kingly government to butcher the living and to outrage the dead ; he who invited Napoleon to take the title of King of Kings, he who assures us, that after the Restoration he expressed in noble language his attachment to monarchy, and to the house of Bourbon ? Had he been less mean, something might have been said in extenuation of his cruelty. Had he been less cruel, something might have been said in extenuation of his meanness. But for him, regicide and court-spy, for him who patronized Lebon and betrayed Demerville, for him who wantoned alternately in gasconades of Jacobinism, and gasconades of servility, what excuse has the largest charity to offer ?

We cannot conclude, without saying something about two parts of his character, which his biographer appears to consider as deserving of high admiration. Barère, it is admitted, was somewhat fickle ; but in two things he was consistent, in his love of Christianity, and in his hatred to England. If this were so, we must say that England is much more beholden to him than Christianity.

It is possible that our inclinations may bias our judgment ; but we think that we do not flatter ourselves when we say, that Barère's aversion to our country was a sentiment as deep and constant as his mind was capable of entertaining. The value of this compliment is indeed somewhat diminished by the circumstance, that he knew very little about us. His ignorance of our institutions, manners and history, is the less excusable, because, according to his own account, he consorted much, during the peace of Amiens, with Englishmen of note, such as that eminent nobleman Lord Greaten, and that not less eminent philosopher Mr. Mackenzie. For this, in spite, however, of his connexion with these well-known ornaments of our country, he was so ill-informed about us as to fancy that our government was always laying plans to torment him. If he was hooted at Saintes, probably by people whose relations he had murdered, it was because the cabinet of St. James's had hired the mob. If nobody would read his bad books, it was because the cabinet of St. James's had secured the Reviewers. His accounts of Mr. Fox, of Mr. Pitt, of the Duke of Wellington, of Mr. Canning, swarm with blunders, surpassing even the ordinary blunders committed by Frenchmen who write about England. Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, he tells us, were ministers in two different reigns. Mr. Pitt's sinking fund was instituted in order to enable England to pay subsidies to the powers allied against the French republic. The Duke of Wellington's house in Hyde Park was built by the nation, which twice voted the sum of £200,000 for the purpose. This, however, is exclusive of the cost of the frescoes, which were also paid for out of the public purse. Mr. Canning was the first Englishman whose death Europe had reason to lament; for the death of Lord Ward, a relation, we presume, of Lord Greaton and Mr. Cœffhis, had been an immense benefit to mankind.

Ignorant, however, as Barère was, he knew enough of us to hate us; and we persuade ourselves that, had he known us better, he would have hated us more. The nation which has combined, beyond all example and all hope, the blessings of liberty with those of order, might well be an object of aversion to one who had been false alike to the cause of order and to the cause of liberty. We have had amongst us intemperate zeal for popular rights; we have had amongst us also the intemperance of loyalty. But we have never been shocked by such a spectacle as the Barère of 1794, or as the Barère of 1804. Compared with him, our fiercest demagogues have been gentle; compared with him, our meanest courtiers have been manly. Mix together Thistlewood and Bubb Dodington, and you are still far from having Barère. The antipathy between him and us is such, that neither for the crimes of his earlier, nor for those of his later life, does our language, rich as it is, furnish us with adequate names. We have found it difficult to relate his history without having perpetual recourse to the French vocabulary of horror, and to the French vocabulary of baseness. It is not easy to give a notion of his conduct in the Convention, without using those emphatic terms, guillotinate, noyade, fusillade, mitraille. It is not easy to give a notion of his conduct under the Consulate and the Empire, without borrowing such words as mouchard and mouton.

We therefore like his invectives against us much better than anything else that he has written; and dwell on them not merely with complacency, but with a feeling akin to gratitude. It was but little that he could do to promote the honor of our country; but that little he did strenuously and constantly. Renegade, traitor, slave, coward, liar, slanderer, murderer, hack writer, police-spy—the one small service which he could render to England, was to hate her: and such as he was may all who hate her be!

We cannot say that we contemplate with equal satisfaction that fervent and constant zeal for religion, which, according to M. Hippolyte Carnot, distinguished Barère; for, as we think that whatever brings dishonor on religion is a serious evil, we had, we own, indulged a hope that Barère was an atheist. We now learn, however, that he was at no time even a sceptic, that he adhered to his faith through the whole Revolution, and that he has left several manuscript works on divinity. One of these is a pious treatise, entitled, “Of Christianity and of its Influence.” Another consists of meditations on the Psalms, which will doubtless greatly console and edify the Church.

This makes the character complete. Whatsoever things are false, whatsoever things are dishonest, whatsoever things are unjust, whatsoever things are impure, whatsoever things are hateful, whatsoever things are of evil report, if there be any vice, and if there be any infamy, all these things, we knew, were blended in Barère. But one thing was still wanting, and that M. Hippolyte Carnot has supplied. When to such an assemblage of qualities a high profession of piety is added, the effect becomes overpowering. We sink under the contemplation of such exquisite and manifold perfection; and feel, with deep humility, how presumptuous it was in us to think of composing the legend of this beatified athlete of the faith, Saint Bertrand of the Carnagnoles.

Something more we had to say about him. But let him go. We did not seek him out, and will not keep him longer. If those who call themselves his friends had not forced him on our notice, we should never have vouchsafed to him more than a passing word of scorn and abhorrence, such as we might fling at his brethren, Hébert and Fouquier Tinville, and Carrier and Lebon. We have no pleasure in seeing human nature thus degraded. We turn with disgust from the filthy and spiteful Yahoos of the fiction; and the filthiest and most spiteful Yahoo of the fiction was a noble creature when compared with the Barère of history. But what is no pleasure, M. Hippolyte Carnot has made a duty. It is no light thing, that a man in high and honorable public trust, a man who, from his connexions and position, may not unnaturally be supposed to speak the sentiments of a large class of his countrymen, should come forward to demand approbation for a life, black with every sort of wickedness, and unredeemed by a single virtue. This M. Hippolyte Carnot has done. By attempting to enshrine this Jacobin carrion, he has forced us to gibbet it: and we venture to say that, from the eminence of infamy on which we have placed it, he will not easily take it down.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

AMERICAN CRIMINAL TRIALS, Vol. 2. T. H. Carter & Co., Boston.

We have received this handsomely printed volume, and cannot better express our opinions than in the words of the London Spectator and Examiner, and the Christian Examiner, when reviewing the first volume:—

The plan and execution of the American Criminal Trials are rather peculiar. They are not a mere servile copy or dry abridgment of existing reports, where the only merit of the compiler consists in calling public attention to certain proceedings and facilitating their perusal by collecting the scattered records in a series; nor are they merely a skilful and elaborate description of singular trials, suppressing what is formal or subordinate and bringing out the more striking points. Although skilful in his treatment and often graphic in his effects, Mr. Chandler, by accident or design, has generally chosen such American criminal trials as throw a light upon American Colonial history, or exhibit the phases of public opinion—it may be of public madness. Hence there is frequently an interest over and above that of the facts of the trials themselves, from the public events with which they were connected, or the singular and criminal public delusion which they record; whilst Mr. Chandler, by introductory notices or observations intermixed with the text, makes the reader sufficiently acquainted with the period to follow the trials with advantage, and by judicious observations at their close, he often points to the moral which they illustrate.—Spectator.

It is extremely well done; on the plan of the Causes Célèbres; and published in a very creditable way. We are glad to see that each trial is left to suggest its own style of narrative; any formal settled method greatly detracting from the value as well as interest of books of this nature.—London Examiner.

We lament our want of space to notice, in a proper manner, the work whose title is given above. It strikes us as one of the most interesting publications of the day, and admirably calculated to make deep, as well as just, impressions on the mind of the student of American History. The peculiar advantage of this form of history is,—and history it eminently is,—that it imparts to its subjects the lively charms of reality. Events read in the drier form of the classical historian, and soon forgotten, or dimly remembered, here live before the mind, and leave traces as indelible as if they had been actually witnessed.

These trials, it is scarcely necessary to add, are divested of all unintelligible and repulsive legal technicalities, and made agreeable to the general reader. The press has done its office uncommonly well.—Christian Examiner.

The more list of the contents of the present volume will excite the interest of all readers of American History:—

Trial of Bathsheba Spooner and others before the Superior Court of Judicature, for the murder of Joshua Spooner, of Brookfield, Massachusetts, 1778.

Trial of Colonel David Henley, before a General Court Martial, for improper conduct as an officer of the American Army, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1778.

Proceedings of a Board of General Officers, held by order of General George Washington, respecting Major John André, charged with being a spy, New York, 1780.

Trial of Joshua Hett Smith, before a Court Martial, on a charge of aiding and assisting Benedict Arnold, New York, 1780.

Proceedings of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, against the Judges of the Superior Court of Judicature, for their judgment in the case of Trevett against Wheelen, on information and complaint for refusing paper bills for butcher's meat. Rhode Island, 1786.

Trials of John Hauer and others, before the Court of Oyer and Terminer, for the murder of Francis Stutz, Pennsylvania, 1798.

APPENDIX.

TRIAL OF MRS. SPOONER AND OTHERS.—Indictment. Death Warrant. Petition for a reprieve. Reprieve. Writ de ventre inspiciendo. Return of the sheriff. Opinion of midwives. Final return of the sheriff.

MAJOR ANDRÉ.—Remarks of Sir Samuel Romilly. Remarks of Lieutenant Colonel Simcoe. Remarks of Mr. J. F. Cooper.

NOTES.

Timothy Ruggles. William Cushing. Levi Lincoln. William Tudor. Henry Marchant. James M. Varnum. William Channing.

A Select Collection of ORIGINAL SCOTTISH AIRS, for the Voice; with introductory and concluding Symphonies and Accompaniments, to each Air, for the Piano-Forte, Violin, or Flute, &c., composed for this Work by Pleyel, Haydn, Weber, Beethoven, &c., with all the most admired Songs, both ancient and modern, Scottish and English, adapted to the Airs, and including upwards of one hundred Songs by Burns. The whole collected and published in five volumes, by G. Thomson, F. A. S., Edinburgh.

Mr. Dobson, of Philadelphia, has issued four numbers of the American edition of this work. Price 50 cents a number. We have listened to a scarce Edinburgh copy for a quarter of a century; and our eyes dim for auld lang syne as we write down the names of the airs contained in these numbers:—

The Birks of Invermay—Here awa', there awa'—Tweedside—My Nanie, O—The bush aboon Traquair—I'll never leave thee—Corn Rigs—The Eve-Bughts—My apron, deary—Lochaber—Galla Water—The Braes of Yarrow—The Yellow Hair'd Laddie—Roshin Castle—Donald—The Waeft' Heart—Auld Rob Morris—Gramachree—Waly, Waly—Gilderooy—Open the Door—The Mill, Mill O!—She rose and let me in—Sweet Annie—The Banks of Banna—Locherroch side—The Flowers of Edinburgh—The seventh of November—O Jean, I love thee—Donald and Flora.

It may be doubted whether there are now such clear voices, or such bright faces, as we used to look and listen at during their accompaniment of the said Edinburgh copy; but we recommend the encouragement of this enterprise to all lovers of Scottish music.

It is sold in Boston, by Jordan & Co., and in New York, by Mr. Alhuan, and the music Stores.

THE PICTURE GALLERY, once a week, 12½ cents. Mowatt & Co., New York.

This is a very spirited attempt to establish a Journal similar to the London Illustrated News. It is said to have been highly successful already, and, if it can gain a permanent position, will afford a field for wood engravers, and for designers, who are much wanted in the United States. No pains have been spared in these numbers, and much capital must have been employed in getting them up.

No. 1. contains, General Morgan Lewis—a view of his funeral—London Royal Exchange—New York Merchant's Exchange—The opening of the Parliament by Queen Victoria—The king of the French opening the chambers—Views of Paris and of Hong Kong—The Polka Dance—Portrait of Mr. Harper, the new Mayor of New York; (may he reign a thousand years and fulfil all the expectations of the Native Americans)—a Landscape by the new system of engraving by means of a chemical agency, called Glyptography—Some caricatures, and the fashions for April.

No. 2. A Birds-eye view of the Bastille—May Day in New York; illustrating the horror of the general breaking up of house-keeping. (By the way the observance of such a custom as making all changes of houses to take place on the same day, is incomprehensible to a stranger. It is, perhaps, like the self-inflicted tortures of the Hindoos, connected in some way with the religion of the people)—Louis Philippe's annual visit to the chamber of Deputies—Dr. Mott—Mr. Frélinghuysen, and the University of New York—An Equestrian Statue of George IV., and a portrait of the invaluable French minister Guizot—And concluding with Whitworth's Street-sweeping machine, which interests us more than George IV., as being at the same time more useful and more dignified.

We wish success to this valuable popular contribution to the Arts. It is sold in Boston by Redding & Co., and in Philadelphia by Clause & Canning.

THE LIVING AGE.

---

No. 3.—1 JUNE, 1844.

---

CONTENTS.

|   | PAGE.                             |
|---|-----------------------------------|
| 1. Correspondence, . . . . .                        | 130                               |
| 2. The First Offence, . . . . .                     | Chambers' Journal , 131    |
| 3. Casa Wappy, . . . . .                            | Hood's Magazine , 133      |
| 4. Wellington and Napoleon, . . . . .               | Punch , 134                |
| 5. The Night before the Duel, . . . . .             | Spectator , 135            |
| 6. Polecats of the Press, . . . . .                 | Punch , 136                |
| 7. Railways for the Million, . . . . .              | Spectator , 136            |
| 8. Our Family, a domestic Tale, . . . . .           | Hood's Magazine , 137      |
| 9. The Freethinker, . . . . .                       | Blackwood's Magazine , 145 |
| 10. Duelling and its Punishment, . . . . .          | Punch , 160                |
| 11. Hume, and his Influence upon History, . . . . . | Quarterly Review , 161     |
| 12. Emigrants of San Tommaso, . . . . .             | New Monthly Magazine , 188 |
| 13. The New Faith, . . . . .                        | Spectator , 189            |
| 14. Pauper's Christmas Carol, . . . . .             | Punch , 199                |

POETRY.

|  |     |
|--|-----|
| Emigrant Mother, . . . . .                 | 192 |
| What shall I have for Breakfast? . . . . . | 136 |

SCRAPS.

|                                      |     |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| Heartless Spoliation, . . . . .      | 132 |
| Lifts for Lazy Lawyers, . . . . .    | 160 |
| Anecdote of Prince Albert, . . . . . | 133 |
| Church Needlework, . . . . .         | 130 |

---

BOSTON:

E. LITTELL & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

---

BOSTON.—REDDING & Co.—JORDAN & Co.—HOTCHKISS & Co.
 NEW YORK.—MOWATT & Co.—SUN OFFICE.—BURGESS & STRINGER.
 PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUDE & CANNING—BERFORD & Co.—ZIEBER & Co.
 BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.
 ALBANY.—W. C. LITTLE—GEORGE JONES. PORTLAND.—GEORGE COLMAN.
 CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.
 NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TIME treads so closely on our heel, that before one number has been entirely sent away, we have half done another, and are obliged to take care that we do not comment on No. 4 while closing No. 3. After our machinery (and we comprise bodies and souls under this head) shall have come to work smoothly, this will not be unpleasant; but it is yet rather more laborious than we should desire, and obliges us again to ask that the execution of our plan may not be judged of until we shall have completed the first volume.

In this number we have increased our variety, but have hardly been able to begin our Scientific, Literary or General Intelligence—and our labors in Art have only produced the single article upon Church Needlework.

The English papers are discussing which is most to blame in the duel—and so we get an accidental glance behind the scenes, at the unutterable misery of Col. Fawcett during the night which preceded his duel. The British ministry refused to grant to his widow the pension usually given to the families of officers dying in the service, and Punch applies the scourge to them personally at page 160.

We hope that all who may read the Freethinker, will take the trouble to read also the able article on Hume, and his influence upon History.

We are not willing to begin articles which must be continued from number to number—but we cannot lay down any rule on the subject, feeling bound to give to our readers all that is very good in the foreign Magazines and Reviews, let it come in what shape it may. So we have begun Mr. Hood's tale, Our Family—not doubting that it will contain much profitable to old and young. Poor Mr. Hood, whose wit and genius delight so many in both hemispheres, is sinking under pulmonary disease, and is yet obliged to go on with unintermitting toil. Would that some friend to the human race had the heart as well as the ability to send him a useful acknowledgment for his late poem—the Song of the Shirt! By the way, this has been set to music in England, and we hope soon to be able to copy it. It is consoling to see that the hardship of Mr. Hood's lot has only made his heart the more tender;—his own wants have only made him feel more sensibly the wants of his fellow-men. We cannot choose our own destiny, but if we humbly and trustfully submit it to Divine Providence, we shall be cared for, sustained, preserved. And we have reason to hope that in the case of which we are speaking light and joy are springing from sorrow and darkness. "Trust on—trust on."

The condition of the miserable class in England, appears to be exciting intense feeling there. The article on the New Faith, and the Pauper's Christmas Carol, are specimens of it. It was reported that Sir Robert Peel had said, that upon the ten-hour clause in the factory bill, "ministers had been defeated by the Christian feeling of the house."

We were the more struck with the article upon the First Offence, from having ourselves had exactly the same experience, in the case of a colored boy, in whose way we carelessly left temptation. It was as much our fault as his, and we had reason to confide in him entirely afterwards.

By the article "Polécats of the Press," our readers will be very much puzzled. It would appear from it that in England there are some editors of newspapers who do not properly fulfil their task of public teachers. Here, matters are so very different, that we shall hardly be able to imagine the possibility of a newspaper being a nuisance.

"Railways for the Million" reminds us of the course of the Railroad Company between New York and Philadelphia. They are occasionally in the habit of selling excursion tickets, entitling the bearers to go to New York (but not to land there) and return—for three dollars: the regular price for going to one city from the other being four dollars.

A third edition of No. 1 is just published.

Church Needlework; with Practical Remarks on its arrangement. By Miss LAMBERT, Authoress of "The Handbook of Needlework." Illustrated with engravings.

This handsome volume treats of a class of objects for needleworkers to exercise their skill and ingenuity upon, that has been but little regarded since the Reformation, and now is engaging the attention of both Anglicans and Roman Catholics,—namely, the drapery of church-furniture. Miss Lambert's volume, being apparently intended for Protestant ladies, only alludes to sacerdotal vestments incidentally as a part of the history of the subject; her particular attention being bestowed on altar-cloths and carpets, and coverings for desks, stools, and cushions. For these, various designs are given, with patterns of appropriate borders, ciphers, and symbolical devices; and directions as to the nature and hues of the materials employed, and the method of working them: in short, all the information necessary to guide the taste of ladies desirous of contributing to the embellishment of the altar by their handiwork, is here given, beyond those particular instructions contained in the Handbook of Needlework.—SPECTATOR.

From Chambers's Journal.

THE FIRST OFFENCE.

IN the cheerful dining-room of my bachelor-friend Stevenson, a select party was assembled to celebrate his birthday. A very animated discussion had been carried on for some time, as to whether the first deviation from integrity should be treated with severity or leniency. Various were the opinions, and numerous the arguments brought forward to support them. The majority appeared to lean to the side of "crush all offences in the bud," when a warm-hearted old gentleman exclaimed, "Depend upon it, more young people are lost to society from a first offence being treated with injudicious severity, than from the contrary extreme. Not that I would pass over even the slightest deviation from integrity, either in word or deed; that would certainly be mistaken kindness; but, on the other hand, neither would I punish with severity an offence committed, perhaps, under the influence of temptation—temptation, too, that we ourselves may have thoughtlessly placed in the way, in such a manner as to render it irresistible. For instance, a lady hires a servant; the girl has hitherto borne a good character, but it is her first place; her honesty has never yet been put to the test. Her mistress, without thinking of the continual temptation to which she is exposing a fellow-creature, is in the habit of leaving small sums of money, generally copper, lying about in her usual sitting-room. After a time, she begins to think that these sums are not always found exactly as she left them. Suspicion falls upon the girl, whose duty is to clean the room every morning. Her mistress, however, thinks she will be quite convinced before she brings forward her accusation. She counts the money carefully at night, and the next morning some is missing. No one has been in the room but the girl; her guilt is evident. Well, what does her mistress do? Why, she turns the girl out of her house at an hour's notice; cannot, in conscience, give her a character; tells all her friends how dreadfully distressed she is; declares there is nothing but ingratitude to be met with among servants; laments over the depravity of human nature; and never dreams of blaming herself for her wicked—yes it is wicked—thoughtlessness in thus constantly exposing to temptation a young ignorant girl; one most likely whose mind, if not enveloped in total darkness, has only an imperfect twilight knowledge whereby to distinguish right from wrong. At whose door, I ask," continued he, growing warmer, "will the sin lie, if that girl sink into the lowest depths of vice and misery? Why, at the door of her who, after placing temptation in her very path, turned her into the pitiless world, deprived of that which constituted her only means of obtaining an honest livelihood—her character; and that without one effort to reclaim her—without affording a single opportunity of retrieving the past, and regaining by future good conduct the confidence of her employer."

"There is, I fear, too much truth in what you say," remarked our benevolent host, who had hitherto taken no part in the conversation; "and it reminds me of a circumstance that occurred in the earlier part of my life, which, as it may serve to illustrate the subject you have been discussing, I will relate." There was a general movement of attention; for it was a well-known fact, that no manufacturer in the town of—— was surrounded with so many old and faithful servants as our friend Stevenson.

"In the outset of my business career," said he, "I took into my employment a young man to fill the situation of under clerk; and, according to a rule I had laid down, whenever a stranger entered my service, his duties were of a nature to involve as little responsibility as possible, until sufficient time had been given to form a correct estimate of his character. This young man, whom I shall call Smith, was of a respectable family. He had lost his father, and had a mother and sisters in some measure dependent upon him. After he had been a short time in my employment, it happened that my confidential clerk, whose duty it was to receive the money from the bank for the payment of wages, being prevented by an unforeseen circumstance from attending at the proper time, sent the sum required by Smith. My confidence was so great in my head clerk, who had been long known to me, that I was not in the habit of regularly counting the money when brought to me; but as, on this occasion, it had passed through other hands, I thought it right to do so. Therefore calling Smith back as he was leaving my counting-house, I desired him to wait a few minutes, and proceeded to ascertain whether it was quite correct. Great was my surprise and concern on finding that there was a considerable deficiency.

"From whom," said I, "did you receive this money?"

"He replied, 'From Mr. ——,' naming my confidential clerk.

"It is strange," said I, looking steadily at him. 'But this money is incorrect, and it is the first time I have found it so.' He changed countenance, and his eye fell before mine; but he answered, with tolerable composure, 'that it was as he had received it.'

"It is in vain," I replied, 'to attempt to impose upon me, or to endeavor to cast suspicion on one whose character for the strictest honesty and undeviating integrity is so well established. Now, I am perfectly convinced that you have taken this money, and that it is at this moment in your possession; and I think the evidence against you would be thought sufficient to justify me in immediately dismissing you from my service. But you are a very young man; your conduct has, I believe, been hitherto perfectly correct, and I am willing to afford you an opportunity of redeeming the past. All knowledge of this matter rests between ourselves. Candidly confess, therefore, the error of which you have been guilty; restore what you have so dishonestly taken; endeavor, by your future good conduct, to deserve my confidence and respect, and this circumstance shall never transpire to injure you.' The poor fellow was deeply affected. In a voice almost inarticulate with emotion he acknowledged his guilt, and said that, having frequently seen me receive the money without counting it, on being intrusted with it himself, the idea had flashed across his mind that he might easily abstract some without incurring suspicion, or at all events without there being sufficient evidence to justify it; that, being in distress, the temptation had proved stronger than his power of resistance, and he had yielded. 'I cannot now,' he continued, 'prove, how deeply your forbearance has touched me; time alone can show that it has not been misplaced.' He left me to resume his duties.

"Days, weeks, and months passed away, during which I scrutinized his conduct with the greatest anxiety, whilst at the same time I carefully guarded against any appearance of suspicious watchfulness; and with delight I observed that so far my experiment had succeeded. The greatest regularity and attention—the utmost devotion to my interests—marked his business habits; and this without any display; for his quiet and humble deportment was from that time remarkable. At length, finding his conduct invariably marked by the utmost openness and plain-dealing, my confidence in him was so far restored, that, on a vacancy occurring in a situation of greater trust and increased emolument than the one he had hitherto filled, I placed him in it; and never had I the slightest reason to repent of the part I had acted towards him. Not only had I the pleasure of reflecting that I had, in all probability, saved a fellow-creature from a continued course of vice, and consequent misery, and afforded him the opportunity of becoming a respectable and useful member of society, but I had gained for myself an indefatigable servant—a faithful and constant friend. For years he served me with the greatest fidelity and devotion. His character for rigid, nay, even scrupulous honesty, was so well known, that 'as honest as Smith,' became a proverb amongst his acquaintances. One morning I missed him from his accustomed place, and upon inquiry, learnt that he was detained at home by indisposition. Several days elapsed, and still he was absent; and upon calling at his house to inquire after him, I found the family in great distress on his account. His complaint had proved typhus fever of a malignant kind. From almost the commencement of his attack, he had, as his wife (for he had been some time married) informed me, lain in a state of total unconsciousness, from which he had roused only to the ravings of delirium, and that the physician gave little hope of his recovery. For some days he continued in the same state: at length a message was brought me, saying that Mr. Smith wished to see me; the messenger adding, that Mrs. Smith hoped I would come as soon as possible, for she feared her husband was dying. I immediately obeyed the summons.

"On entering his chamber, I found the whole of his family assembled to take farewell of him they so tenderly loved. As soon as he perceived me, he motioned for me to approach near to him, and taking my hand in both of his, he turned towards me his dying countenance, full of gratitude and affection, and said, 'My dear master, my best earthly friend, I have sent for you that I may give you the thanks and blessing of a dying man for all your goodness to me. To your generosity and mercy I owe it, that I have lived useful and respected, that I die lamented and happy. To you I owe it, that I leave to my children a name unsullied by crime, that in after years the blush of shame shall never tinge their cheeks at the memory of their father. O God!' he continued, 'Thou who hast said, "blessed are the merciful," bless him. According to the measure he has meted to others, do thou mete unto him.' Then turning to his family, he said, 'My beloved wife and children, I intrust you, without fear, to the care of that heavenly parent who has said, "Leave thy fatherless children to me, and I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me." And you, my dear master, will, I know, be to them as you have been to me—guide, protector, and friend.' That," continued the kind old man, looking round upon us with ghastly eyes, "though mixed with sorrow, was one of the happiest moments of my life. As I stood by the bedside of the dying man, and looked around upon his children growing up virtuous, intelligent, and upright, respecting and honoring, as much as they loved their father; when I saw his wife, though overcome with grief for the loss of a tender and beloved husband, yet sorrowing not as one without hope, but even in that moment of agony deriving comfort from the belief that she should meet him again in that world where when I listened to his fervent expressions of gratitude, and saw him calmly awaiting the inevitable stroke, trusting in the mercy of God, and at peace with his fellow-men; and when I thought of what the reverse of all this might have been—crime, misery, a disgraceful and dishonored life, perhaps a shameful and violent death—had I yielded to the first impulse of indignation, I felt a happiness which no words can express. We are told that there is more joy amongst the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance. With such a joy as we may imagine theirs, did I rejoice over poor Smith, as I closed his eyes, and heard the attendant minister in fervent tones exclaim, 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord; yea, saith the spirit, for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.' My friends, I am an old man. During a long and eventful career in business, I have had intercourse with almost every variety of temper and disposition, and with many degrees of talent, but I have never found reason to swerve from the principle with which I set out in life, to 'temper justice with mercy.'"

'Adieus and farewells are a sound unknown;'

Such was the story of our friend. And I believe not one in that company but returned home more disposed to judge leniently of the failings of his fellow-creatures, and, as far as lay in his power, to extend to all who might fall into temptation that mercy which, under similar circumstances, he would wish shown to himself, feeling "that it is more blessed to save than to destroy."*

HEARTLESS SPOILIATION.

PERHAPS the whole history of burglary—and we appeal to MR. AINSWORTH to corroborate the speculation—never displayed a more cruel and heartless robbery than that—according to the Morning Post—lately committed in the house of the Reverend JOHN CAMPBELL, Selkirk House, in the county of Selkirk. That house was entered on the 21st ult., and the reverend gentleman despoiled, among other precious things, of "a silver chased toddy jug!" Milton asks—

—"Who would rob a hermit of his beads, His maple dish?"

Possibly, not even Selkirk thieves. We therefore recommend to the REV. JOHN CAMPBELL henceforth to drink his toddy out of a wooden vessel, maple or other; for what, asks FATHER MATHEW, "has any churchman to do with toddy jugs of chased silver?"—Punch.

*It may not be superfluous to remark, that this little paper describes events of actual occurrence.

From Hood's Magazine.

DOMESTIC VERSES, BY DELTA.

We have taken the following beautiful stanzas from a little volume, at first privately distributed, and now given to the public, by the amiable author. It is verily a book which no family should be without that calls itself domestic, or professes a taste for poetry.

CASA WAPPY.*

And hast thou sought thy heavenly home,
Our fond, dear boy—
The realms where sorrow dare not come,
Where life is joy!
Pure at thy death, as at thy birth,
Thy spirit caught no taint from earth,
Even by its bliss we mete our dearth,
Casa Wappy!

Despair was in our last farewell,
As closed thine eye;
Tears of our anguish may not tell,
When thou didst die;
Words may not paint our grief for thee,
Sighs are but bubbles on the sea
Of our unfathomed agony;
Casa Wappy!

Thou wert a vision of delight
To bless us given;
Beauty embodied to our sight—
A type of heaven:
So dear to us thou wert, thou art
Even less thine own self, than a part
Of mine, and of thy mother's heart,
Casa Wappy!

Thy bright, brief day knew no decline—
'T was cloudless joy;
Sunrise and night alone were thine,
Beloved boy!
This morn beheld thee blithe and gay;
That found thee prostrate in decay;
And ere a third shone, clay was clay,
Casa Wappy!

Gem of our hearth, our household pride,
Earth's undefiled,
Could love have saved, thou hadst not died,
Our dear, sweet child!
Humbly we bow to Fate's decree;
Yet had we hoped that Time should see
Thee mourn for us, not us for thee,
Casa Wappy!

Do what I may, go where I will,
Thou meet'st my sight;
There dost thou glide before me still—
A form of light!
I feel thy breath upon my cheek—
I see thee smile, I hear thee speak—
Till oh! my heart is like to break,
Casa Wappy!

Methinks, thou smil'st before me now,
With glance of stealth;
The hair thrown back from thy full brow
In buoyant health:
I see thine eyes' deep violet light—
Thy dimpled cheek carnationed bright—
Thy clasping arms so round and white—
Casa Wappy!

The nursery shows thy pictured wall,
Thy hat—thy bow—

* The self-appellative of a beloved child.

Thy cloak and bonnet—club and ball:

But where art thou?
A corner holds thine empty chair,
Thy playthings idly scattered there
But speak to us of our despair,
Casa Wappy!

Even to the last, thy every word—
To glad—to grieve—
Was sweet, as sweetest song of bird
On summer's eve;
In outward beauty undecayed,
Death o'er thy spirit cast no shade,
And, like the rainbow, thou didst fade,
Casa Wappy!

We mourn for thee, when blind, blank night
The chamber fills;
We pine for thee, when morn's first light
Reddens the hills:
The sun, the moon, the stars, the sea,
All—to the wall-flower and wild-pea—
Are changed,—we saw the world through thee,
Casa Wappy!

And though, perchance, a smile may gleam
Of casual mirth,
It doth not own, whate'er may seem,
An inward birth:
We miss thy small step on the stair;—
We miss thee at thine evening prayer;—
All day we miss thee—everywhere—
Casa Wappy!

Snows muffled earth when thou didst go
In life's spring-bloom,
Down to the appointed house below—
The silent tomb.
But now the green leaves of the tree
The cuckoo, and the "busy bee,"
Return—but with them bring not thee,
Casa Wappy!

'T is so; but can it be—(while flowers Revive again)—
Man's doom, in death that we and ours
For aye remain!
Oh! can it be, that, o'er the grave,
The grass renewed should yearly wave,
Yet God forget our child to save!—
Casa Wappy!

It cannot be; for were it so
Thus man could die,
Life were a mockery—Thought were woe—
And Truth a lie;—
Heaven were a coinage of the brain—
Religion frenzy—Virtue vain—
And all our hopes to meet again,
Casa Wappy!

Then be to us, O dear, lost child!
With beam of love,
A star, death's uncongenial wild
Smiling above!
Soon, soon, thy little feet have trode
The skyward path, the seraph's road,
That led thee back from man to God,
Casa Wappy!

Yet, 't is sweet balm to our despair,
Fond, fairest boy,
That heaven is God's, and thou art there,
With him in joy;
There past are death and all its woes;—
There beauty's stream forever flows;—
And pleasure's day no sunset knows,
Casa Wappy!

Farewell, then—for a while, farewell—
 Pride of my heart!
 It cannot be that long we dwell,
 Thus torn apart:
 Time's shadows like the shuttle flee;
 And dark, how'er life's night may be,
 Beyond the grave, I'll meet with thee,
 Casa Wappy!

NAPOLEON AND WELLINGTON.

ASSUREDLY the fact is not so well known as it deserves to be, that Napoleon,—who by the act showed himself a miserable dwarf indeed—bequeathed, in a codicil to his will, the sum of 10,000 francs (400*l.*) to a man charged with an attempt to murder the Duke of Wellington. We subjoin the extract from the will, which may be seen at Doctors' Commons on the payment of one shilling. The codicil bears date, April 25, 1821, and the magnanimous testator died on the 5th of May, ten days afterwards; dying, as he declared in the preamble to his last testament, "in the Apostolical and Catholic Church!" Here is the proof of his Christianity,—

"5. idem (10,000) Dix mille francs au sous-officier Cantillon, qui a essayé un procès comme prévenu d'avoir voulu assassiner Lord Wellington, ce dont il a été déclaré innocent. Cantillon avait autant de droit d'assassiner cet oligarque, que celui-ci à m'envoyer pour périr sur le rocher de Sainte-Hélène. Wellington, qui a proposé cet attentat, cherchait à le justifier sur l'intérêt de la Grande-Bretagne. Cantillon, si vraiment il eût assassiné le lord, se serait couvert et aurait été justifié par les mêmes motifs: l'intérêt de la France de se défaire d'un général, qui d'ailleurs avait violé la capitulation de Paris, et par là s'était rendu responsable du sang des martyrs Ney, Labédoyère, &c. &c., et du crime d'avoir dépouillé les musées, contre le texte des traités."

We subjoin a translation:—

"Ten thousand francs to the subaltern Cantillon, who underwent a trial charged with an attempt to assassinate Lord Wellington, and of which he was declared innocent. Cantillon had as good right to assassinate the oligarch, as he himself to send me to perish on the rock of St. Helena. Wellington, who proposed this iniquity, sought to justify it by the interests of Great Britain. Cantillon, if he had really assassinated his lordship, would have been excused and justified by the like motives—the interest of France to rid herself of a general who had violated the treaty of the capitulation of Paris, and by that act had rendered himself responsible for the blood of the martyrs Ney, Labédoyère, &c. &c.; and for the crime of despoiling the museums, contrary to the text of treaties!"

Is there not Dwarf—miserable homunculus—in every line of this? We subjoin, by way of contrast, the reply of the Duke of Wellington, when the death of Napoleon was proposed to his grace.

"—— wishes to kill him; but I have told him that I shall remonstrate: I have likewise said that, as a private friend, I advised him to have nothing to do with so foul a transaction; and that he and I had acted too distinguished parts in those transactions to become executioners; and that I was determined that, if the sovereigns wished to put him to death, they should appoint an executioner, which should not be me."—Vide Lieut.-Colonel Gurnwood's Selections from the Duke of Wellington's Dispatches, No. 965, p. 870.

Be it understood that we are not blind idolators of the Duke of Wellington. He has made his political blunders, and in his time talked political nonsense as well as his inferiors. Moreover, he exhibits a defective sympathy with the people; as the Examiner has admirably said of him, he looks upon them as a mere appanage to the Crown. Certainly, the "iron Duke" wants a little kindly expansion towards the masses. Nevertheless, contrasting Wellington's answer to the proposed death of the ex-Emperor, with Napoleon's reward of the would-be assassin of the General, need we ask which is the Giant, and which the Dwarf!—Punch.

ANECDOTE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "REAL RANDOM RECORDS."

THE consort of our gracious Queen is, as every body knows, a prince of the House of Saxe Gotha: whether the famous Marshal Saxe was a member of the same family I cannot trace; but the place is celebrated for its well-known Almack. Not that it was the first work of the kind by any means. Poor Richard's Almanack preceded it by many years. So did Francis or Frances Moore's; and there was a popular one called Partridge's. One of his descendants is a Professor of Astrology, or Astronomy, or Anatomy, at any rate of something beginning with A, at one of our Universities or Colleges. I am not sure that the name was not Woodcock; but it reminded one of some wild bird of the kind. That notorious sporting character, Colonel Thornville of Thornton Royal, once shot sixty brace of them on the same day. Another celebrated sporting character was Sir John Lade or Ladd: I forget how much he betted to drive some sort of vehicle with two, or four, or six horses a certain number of miles in a certain number of hours, and whether he won or lost. But it was reckoned a great feat. Then there was Merlin's Carriage, without any horses at all. I am sure, at least, it went without horses; but am not positive, if it was moved by springs or steam. Perhaps steam was not then invented. There are still carriages in the present day called Merlins or Berlins—which is it!—but they are drawn by horses. The last invented vehicles, I believe, are called Broughams, or Brooms. But to return to Prince Albert of Prussia, the son or brother—no, the cousin of the present King. There are some curious particulars about the Court of Prussia, and Frederick the Great in the Memoirs of his aunt, the Margravine of Anspach and Bareuth. I remember reading them in the original French—who, by the way, excel in their biographies. The only thing we have to compare with them is the Life, by himself, of Lord Herbert of Cherburg. A noted place in war-time for harboring the enemy's privateers. They did a great deal of damage to our export, and picked up some very rich prizes in the Channel. One of them, called the Jones Paul, or some such name, terribly infested the Scotch and English coasts, till, according to a memorandum now lying before me, she was driven ashore in Kent, by Commodore G. P. R. James, and the pirates were taken prisoners at Severndroog Tower on Shooter's Hill.

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE DUEL.

THE Times publishes a letter from Major D. K. Fawcett, the uncle of the late Colonel Lynar Fawcett, dated "Ballinlass House, Ballinamon Bridge, 10th April," enclosing another, written at his instance by the Colonel's widow, Mrs. Anne Frances Fawcett, in reply to Lieutenant Munro's statement respecting the origin of the duel. Mrs. Fawcett was the only person present at the first dispute; which she agrees with Mr. Munro in ascribing to a difference about the terms obtained from a Mrs. Smith for the purchase of a house. Mrs. Fawcett was making tea:—

"Colonel Fawcett, folding up the papers which were on the table, said, 'Well, it can't be helped now; but I must say that Mrs. Smith has bamboozled us both most thoroughly; though, had I been acting for you, I should most probably have acted as you have done.' To which Lieutenant Munro replied, 'I tell you what, you have several times insinuated that I mismanaged your affairs; but I have attended to your interests as I never did to my own, and I say I will not stand it.' My husband observed, 'No, Munro, I never said or thought that you mismanaged my affairs.' 'I say you did.' 'I did not, Sir.' 'You did,' again rejoined Lieutenant Munro. Colonel Fawcett then rose for the first time, and ringing the bell, said, 'A flat contradiction I will take from no man; and, Sir, I must request you will leave my house.'"

Much more passed; Mr. Munro taunting and sneering, the Colonel being cool and self-possessed. Mrs. Fawcett only spoke once, pointing out to Mr. Munro, Colonel Fawcett's admission that he himself should probably have acted in the same way about the house. Next morning Mr. Grant called—

"Mr. Grant remained, I think, about ten minutes; and when he left, my husband returned to me and said, 'Why, what do you think it is!—why, a challenge from Munro!' 'Nonsense,' I cried. 'It is, indeed,' he replied. To which I rejoined, 'But you surely won't go out?' 'I don't know that,' he said. I replied, 'Why, you could never fire at each other.' 'At any rate,' he observed, 'I must be off to the Club, and get Daubeney's opinion, (a Major in the Fifty-fifth Regiment,) and I will come back and tell you as soon as anything is agreed upon.' But before he left, he requested of me to tell him candidly, if, in my opinion, he had acted temperately the night before, or not: to which I replied, 'Why, in the first instance I think you were a little hot, but in the second I was astonished at your temperance.' He then quitted the house, and returning about two o'clock, told me it was not yet settled; and showed me the copy of a letter he had written for his friend. 'Munro,' he said, 'still demands a meeting; but Cuddy will see Mr. Grant again.' 'Cuddy?' I exclaimed, 'Oh dear, I am sorry you fixed upon so young a man.' 'He is young,' said my husband, 'but he is a peacemaker, and is more cool and clearheaded than many an older man: besides, Daubeney is so much engaged in arranging his family affairs, that I did not wish to trouble him, and I like to have one of my own regiment to act for me.' I then remarked, that I thought he might have written a more conciliatory letter, without leaving it in any one's power to say that he submitted tamely to insult: to which he remarked, 'that I was perhaps right, and that it was not then too late to do so.' He again went to the Club; and on his return read me a copy of a second letter, in which he said he never intended to insult Mr. Munro, but that he turned him out of his house for grossly insulting him. [I write this also from recollection, as the copies of those letters, the contents of which are already known to the public, are not in my possession.] He then remarked, that I looked very dull and low-spirited: to which I replied, 'How can I help feeling dull while this business is pending?' 'Oh,' he said, 'as to that business, I consider it as settled: my last note must have satisfied them; it must have settled it.'"

Mr. Cuddy called in the evening, and said that Mr. Munro still insisted on a meeting; and then went away again to see Mr. Grant once more. On Mrs. Fawcett's observing that she wished the affair were amicably settled, her husband exclaimed, with a sigh, "that he wished to Heaven it was."

"He did not hear from Lieutenant Cuddy till near midnight; when he received a note, a few lines of which I read over his shoulder; and when I saw that their purport was, that Lieutenant Cuddy had failed in his endeavors to effect an arrangement, and that they were to go out, I fell back on my chair, nearly fainting; when my husband said, in a displeased manner, 'Oh, this is just what I feared—that you would fail me when I most required your firmness and obedience.' He then went to order a carriage to come early the next morning; desiring me to get the servants to bed; but observed, that as it was already so late, it would be better for us both to sit up. He soon came back, and lay down on the sofa, whilst I sat by his side. Thus passed the remainder of that sad night. He occasionally dozed; but I saw he watched me strictly, and was uneasy if I attempted to quit him. However, I had no idea whatever of endeavoring to give information, for I well knew my husband's character: although he never had any concealments from me, and was kind, affectionate, and indulgent in the highest degree, yet he would never have forgiven the slightest interference on my part in a matter of honor and duty. I also never thought that Lieutenant Munro would fire at him; and as I knew his own resolve not to discharge his pistol, I was assured all would terminate happily; though I had a feeling of terror I could not then account for. * *

"Shortly after my husband had dressed and breakfasted, the carriage arrived, (I think it was near five o'clock,) and he sent me down to unfasten the hall-door, lest the ringing should rouse the servants: which I did. He then said, on taking leave of me, 'God bless you, my beloved Annie! you have shown yourself this night to be a true and devoted wife; and remember, whatever happens, I go out with a clear conscience; for they have forced me into this, and I will never fire at your sister's husband.' He then ran down the stairs, and let himself out."

Mrs. Fawcett declares that she had never heard the Colonel mention Mr. Munro's name with the slightest acrimony, and that she herself never said anything to produce that feeling. Neither she nor her friends can comprehend what Mr. Munro means by Colonel Fawcett's entertaining "suspicions of a most unhappy nature." The reason why Colonel Fawcett was anxious to go to the Continent was the expected benefit to his wife's health; her spirits having suffered from the loss of her mother-in-law, who died in the previous April.—Spectator.

POLE-CATS OF THE PRESS.

A MR. WELLS has told a moving tale to the LORD MAYOR of the sorrows and hardships of BARNARD GREGORY, prisoner in Newgate. "He is compelled to associate with felons," says Mr. WELLS—doubtless, a dreadful indignity to the late editor of the Satirist, whose co-mates and fellow-laborers in the vineyard were men of the nicest sense of honor; gentlemen "of the first house, the very first house." Moreover, the said GREGORY "sleeps on an iron bedstead, with rope mattress and rug covering,"—a shocking circumstance, when we remember the beds of roses that the said GREGORY was wont to spread in the columns of his newspaper for certain sufferers. "Mr. GREGORY is only allowed the prison diet!" Considering the extreme delicacy of his appetite, that for years fed upon lying and slandering,—a most cruel punishment! "Mr. GREGORY's health is suffering," and therefore Mr. WELLS will "call a public meeting to address the QUEEN" upon the matter. We know nothing of the state of Mr. GREGORY's health; but this we know—men, on board the hulks, who, it may be, have only wronged society to the amount of a few shillings, fall ill, and find no sympathy in their sickness from the Home-Office. How, then, is the late editor of the Satirist to claim any indulgence, denied to the late abstractor (to use a soft word) of pocket-handkerchiefs! Mr. SHERIFF MCGROVE "regretted to declare that Mr. GREGORY's health was declining." Has the Sheriff no sympathy for the declining health of many a wretched convict at Woolwich? Can he only find compassion for the convicted slanderer that turned his venom to profit—has he no touch of tenderness for the declining footpad, the wasting housebreaker? Let GREGORY's ill-health plead successfully for his pardon; but let the same pardon be awarded to sick culprits of every denomination.—Punch.

RAILWAYS "FOR THE MILLION."

RAILWAY-COMPANIES have discovered a way of being liberal with profit to themselves; and their speculative trading has secured a boon for the hard-working population of the Metropolis—one means of relieving "the Wen" by at least some temporary dispersion. On Easter Monday and the two following days, what are called "return-tickets," giving the purchaser the right to conveyance out of town and back again, were issued by several railway companies at greatly reduced fares. Shopkeepers, clerks, mechanics, and the fifty varieties of the Londoner race, were enabled for once to taste the delights of railway-travelling, and to visit even the sea-coast! The favorite resort was Brighton—attractive from its associations with royalty, fashion, and old repute for gayety: the extra receipts on that railway amounted, in the three days, to 1,943*l*. Traditions of Julius Cæsar, of the ancient Castle, and Shakespeare's Cliff, also drew great numbers to Dover; and the result of the reduced fares for the three days was seen in extra receipts to the amount of 700*l*.

Must these mutual benefits be confined to Easter week? If it has paid the Brighton Railway proprietors to sell "return-tickets" at half-price for those three days in April, would it not pay to do so on every Saturday, Sunday, and Monday throughout the summer and early autumn? Without attempting to rival an economical arithmetician who has lately distinguished himself on cotton-mills, it may safely be calculated that to sell "return-tickets" on such a purely pleasure-line as that to Brighton, would be as great a boon to the proprietors as to the public. The fixed capital invested in the formation of a railway bears a much greater proportion to the cost of working than the build-ings and machinery of a cotton-mill to the circulating capital; and the railway-proprietor is therefore far more interested in increasing the returns of his circulating capital by increasing the rapidity of its circulation.

Railways have created a new class of travellers, a great locomotive population that could alone people some European states; yet to a considerable extent "the masses" are debarred from the use of the railway by the outlay. The rich man finds it cheaper than the old method of post-chaises, or even stage-coaches with the frequent inn-expenses; but the poor man can ill muster the requisite amount of gold. Cheapness would beget still newer and more numerous classes; just as the cheap and accessible omnibus has converted half the passengers in London streets to riders. At present the Londoner is content to steam up to Richmond, and eat eel-pies, or down to Gravesend, and dabble, like the eel, in half-salt-water: but give the opportunity, and thousands might pour out weekly to the very sea-coasts, to the immense profit of the railways, of the sea-side tradespeople, and the incalculable benefit and delight of the town-bred folks. To many there is no delight so great as that of loitering on a sea-beach; but to the inlander it is a pleasure as rare as it is great: it might be one for every week.—Spectator.

WHAT SHALL I HAVE FOR BREAKFAST?

TASTE and Invention, oh! celestial pair,
Descend, and aid me in this hour of woe:
What shall I have for breakfast? Pray declare,
Kind nymphs; for may I perish if I know!

Expanding buds the forest trees adorn,
The pastures now again are robed in green;
Yet still my table, at the meal of morn,
Presents, I grieve to say, a wintry scene.

On mossy banks Spring's early Violets bloom;
But Spring's young Radishes, ah! where are they?
The vernal Primrose bursts its earthy tomb;
Where are the vernal Onions? Flora, say.

Of Steaks I'm tired, and so I am of Chops:
Of Kidneys, Bacon, Tongue, in short, of Meat.
And vainly have I roam'd amid the shops,
In quest of something that was good to eat.

Thy Bloaters, Yarmouth, even thine, are dry,
Dry as statistics. Kipper'd Salmon, too,
Which yesterday I was induced to try,
Turn'd out, I found, to be a thorough "do."

Must I put up, then, with the simple roll?
Muffin, or bread and butter, with my tea?
Come, then, sole solace, Sausage of my soul—
The Poet finds he must fall back on thee!

Punch.

From Hood's Magazine.

OUR FAMILY: A DOMESTIC NOVEL.

BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER I.—WE ARE BORN.

THE clock struck seven——

But the clock was a story-teller; for the true time was one, as marked by the short hand on the dial. The truth was, our family clock—an old-fashioned machine, in a tall mahogany case, and surmounted by three golden balls, as if it had belonged to the Lombards—was apt to chime very capriciously.

However it struck seven just as my father came down stairs from the bed-room, rubbing his hands, and whistling in a whisper, as his custom was when he was well pleased, and walking along the passage somewhat more than usual on his tiptoes, with a jaunty gait, he stepped into the sitting-room to communicate the good news. But there was nobody in the parlor except the little fairy-like gentleman, who walked jauntily to meet him, rubbing his hands, and silently whistling, in the old mirror,—a large circular one, presided over by some bronze bird, sacred perhaps to Esculapius, and therefore carrying a gilt bolus, attached by a chain to his beak.

From the parlor my father went to the surgery: but there was nobody there; so he repaired, perforce, for sympathy into the kitchen, where he found the maid, Kezia, sitting on a wooden chair, backed close against the whitewashed wall, her hands clasped in her lap, and her apron thrown over her head, apparently asleep and snoring, but in reality praying half aloud.

"Well, Kizzy, it's all happily over."

Kezia jumped up on her legs, and having acknowledged, by a bob, her master's presence, inquired eagerly "which sects?"

"Doublets, Kizzy, doublets. A brace of boys."

"What, twins! O, gimini!" exclaimed the overjoyed Kezia, her cheeks for a while glowing both of the same color. "And all doing well, missis and babes?"

"Bravely—famously—mother and all!"

"The Lord preserve her!" said Kezia with emphatic fervor—"the Lord preserve her and her progeny," pronouncing the last word so that it would have rhymed with mahogany.

"Progeny—with a soft g,"—muttered my father, who had once been a schoolmaster, and had acquired the habit of correcting "cakeology."

"Well, prodge, then," murmured Kezia, her cheeks again looking, but only for a moment, both of a color. For, by a freak of nature, one side of her face, from her eye to the corner of her mouth, was blotched with what is called a claret-mark—a large irregular patch of deep crimson, which my father, fond of odd coincidences, declared was of the exact shape of Florida in the map. Be that as it might, her face, except when she blushed, exhibited a diversity of color quite allegorical, one side as sanguine as Hope, and the other as pallid as Fear.

Now, a claret-mark is generally supposed to be "born with the individual;" whereas Kezia attributed her disfigurement to a juvenile face-ache, to relieve which, she had applied to the part a hot cabbage-leaf, but gathered unluckily from the red pickling brassica instead of the green one, and so by sleeping all night on it, her cheek had extracted the color. An explanation, offered in perfect good faith; for Kezia had no personal vanity to propitiate. She had no more charms, she knew, than a cat—not any cat, but our own old shabby tabby, with her scrubby skin, a wall eye, and a docked tail. But in moral Beauty—if ever there had been an annual Book of it—Kezia might have had her portrait at full length.

Her figure and face were of the commonest human clay, cast in the plainest mould. Her clumsy feet and legs, her coarse red arms and hands, and dumpy fingers, her ungainly trunk, and hard features, were admirably adapted for that rough drudgery to which she unsparingly devoted them, as if only fit to be scratched, chapped, burnt, sodden, sprained, frost-bitten, and stuck with splinters. And if sometimes her joints stiffened, her back ached, and her limbs flagged under the severity of her labors, was it not all for the good of that family to which she sacrificed herself with the feudal devotion of a Highlander to his clan? In short, she combined in one ungainly bundle of household virtues, all the best qualities of our domestic animals and beasts of burthen—loving and faithful as the dog, strong as a horse, patient as an ass, and temperate as a camel. At nineteen years of age she had engaged herself to my mother as a servant of all work; and truly, from that hour, no kind of labor, hot or cold, wet or dry, clean or dirty, had she shunned: never inquiring whether it belonged to her place, but toiling, a voluntary slave, in all departments; nay, as if her daily work were not enough, sleep-walking by night into parlor and kitchen, to clean knives, wash up crockery, dust chairs, or polish tables!

To female servants in general, and to those in particular who advertise for small families, where a footman is kept, the advent of two more children would have been an unwelcome event: perhaps equivalent to a warning. Not so with Kezia. Could one have looked through her homely bosom into her heart, or through her plain forehead into her brain, they would have been found rejoicing beforehand in the double, double toil and trouble of attending on the twins. My father's thoughts were turned in the same direction, but with a gravity that put an end to his sub-whistling, and led him, half in jest and half in earnest, to moralize aloud.

"Two at once, Kizzy, two at once—there will be sharp work for us all. Two to nurse—two to suckle—two to wean—two to vaccinate (he was sure not to forget that!)—two to put to their feet—"

"Bless them!" ejaculated Kezia.

"Two to cut their teeth—two to have measles, and hooping-cough—"

"Poor things!" murmured Kezia.

"Ay, and what's worse, two more backs to clothe; and two more bellies to fill—and I can't ride on two horses, and pay two visits at once."

"You must double your fees, master."

"No, no, Kizzy, that won't do. My patients grumble at them already."

"Then I'd double their physicking, and order two draughts, and two powders, and two boxes of pills, instead of one."

"But how will they like such double drugging, Kizzy—supposing that their constitutions are strong enough to stand it?"

Kezia was silent. She had thrown out her suggestion for the benefit of the family; and beyond that limited circle her mind never revolved. Her sympathies began, and, like Domestic Charity, ended at home. Society, and the large family of human kind in general, she left to shift for themselves.

The conversation having thus dropped, my father crept up stairs again, to see how matters were going on overhead; whilst the maid proceeded to answer a muffled knock at the front door, followed by an attempt to ring the night bell, but which had been completely dumb-founded by Kezia with paper and rag. The appellant was Mr. Postle, the medical assistant.

"A nice night for a ride through the Fens," grumbled the deputy-doctor, shaking himself in his great coat, like a wet water-dog, before he followed the maid into the kitchen, where he seated himself in his steaming clothes before the fire.

"Mr. Postle!"

Mr. Postle looked up to the speaker, and saw her hard features convulsively struggling into what bore some distant resemblance to a smile.

"Mr. Postle!" and her voice broke into a sort of hysterical chuckle. "You don't ask the news?"

"What news?"

"What! Why, there's an increase of the family!" said Kezia, her face crimson on both sides with the domestic triumph. "We've got twins!"

"Humph!" grunted Mr. Postle. "Better one strong one, than two weakly ones."

"Weakly!" exclaimed Kezia; "why, they're little Herculeses. Our babbies always are."

A suppressed laugh caused the assistant and Kezia to look round, and they beheld, close beside them, the nurse, Mrs. Prideaux. It was one of her peculiarities that she never shuffled about slipshod, or in creaking leather; but crept along, noiselessly as a ghost, in a pair of list mocassins: and thus taking advantage of my father's visit to the bed-chamber, she had descended for a little change to the kitchen.

A very superior woman was Mrs. Prideaux: quite the attendant for an aristocratic invalid, lying in down, beneath an embroidered quilt, and on a laced pillow. She was never seen in that slovenly dishabille, so characteristic of females of her profession; no, you never saw her in a slatternly colored cotton gown, drawn up through the pocket-holes, and disclosing a greasy nankeen petticoat with ticking pockets—nor in a yellow nightcap, tied over the head and under the chin with a blue and white birds-eye handkerchief—looking like a Hybrid, between a washerwoman and a watchman. A pure white dimity robe, tied with pale green ribands, was her undress. Her personal advantages were very great. Her figure was tall and genteel; her features were small and regular—so different to those dowdy Dodo-like creatures, bloated, and ugly as sin, who are commonly called "nusses." Then she did not take snuff; nor ever drank gin or rum, neat or diluted: a glass of foreign wine or liqueur, or brandy, if genuine Cognac, she would accept; but beer, never. No one ever heard her sniff, or saw her spit, or trim the candle-snuff with her fingers. And if ever she dozed in her chair, as nurses sometimes must, she never snored: but was lady-like even in her sleep. Her language was not only free from vulgarisms and provincialisms, but so choice as to be generally described as "book English." You never heard Mrs. Prideaux blessing her stars, or invoking Goody Gracious, or asking Lawk to have mercy on her, or asseverating by Jingo. She would have died ere she would have complained of her lines, her rheumatiz, her lumbargo, or the molligrubs. Such broad coarse words could never pass those thin compressed lips. But perhaps the best test of her refined phraseology was, that though the word was so current with mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, gossips, and servants of both sexes, that it rang in her ears, at least once in every five minutes, she never said—babby.

In nothing, however, was Mrs. Prideaux more distinguished from the sisterhood, than the tone of her manners: so affable, yet so dignified—and above all, that serene self-possession under any circumstances, supposed to accompany high breeding and noble birth. Thus, nobody ever saw her flustered, or non-plush'd or at her wit's ends, or all in a twitter, or nervous, or ready to jump out of her skin; but always calm, cool, and correct. She hinted, indeed, that she was a reduced gentlewoman, deterred by an independent spirit from accepting the assistance of wealthy and titled connexions. In short, she was a superior woman, so superior, that many a calculating visitor who would have tipped another nurse with a shilling, felt compelled to present a half-crown, if not a whole one, to Mrs. Prideaux, and even then with some anxiety as to her reception of the offering.

Such was the prepossessing person, whose presence notwithstanding was so unwelcome to the medical assistant, that her appearance in the kitchen seemed the signal for his departure. He rose up instantly from his chair, but halted a moment to ask Kezia if there had been any applications at the surgery in his absence.

"Yes, the boy from the curate's, for some more of the paradoxical lozenges: he says he can't preach without em."

"Paregorical. Well!"

"And widow Wakeman with a complaint——."

"Ah! in her hip."

"No, in her mouth, that she have tried the Scouring Drops, and they won't clean marble."

"I should think not—they're for sheep. Well!"

"Only a prescription to make up. Pulv. something—aqua, something—summon'd, and cock-leary."

"Anything else?"

"O yes, a message from the great house about the Brazen monkey."

"Curse the Brazil monkey!" and snatching up a candle, Mr. Postle yawned a good night apiece to the females, and with half-closed eyes stumbled off to bed.

"A quick-tempered person," observed Mrs. Prideaux, as soon as the subject of her comment was beyond earshot.

"Yes, rather caloric," she meant choleric. As an exception to her simple habits Kezia was fond of hard words, perhaps because they were hard, just as she liked hard work.

"Well, Kezia, you observed the clock?"

"The clock, Ma'am!"

"Yes. The precise date of birth is of vast importance to human destiny."

"O, for their fortune telling! I never thought of it—never!" And the shocked Kezia began to heap on herself, and her sieve of a head, the most bitter reproaches.

"No matter," said the nurse. "I did mark the time exactly." And as she spoke she drew from her bosom, and gazed at, a handsome enamelled watch, with a gold dial, and a hand that marked the seconds.

"You are aware that one of the twin infants was born before, and the other after, the hour of midnight?"

"No, really!" exclaimed Kezia, her dull eyes brightening at the prospect of a double festival. "Why, then, there will be two celebrated birth-days!"

"The natal hour involves matters of much deeper importance than the keeping of birth days," replied the nurse, with a startling solemnity of tone and manner. "Look here, Kezia," and returning the watch to her bosom, she drew forth a little blue morocco pocket-book, from which she extracted a paper inscribed with various signs and a diagram. "Do you know what this is?"

"I suppose," said Kezia, turning the paper upside down, after having looked at it in every other direction, "it is some of Harry O'Griffis's characters."

"Not precisely hieroglyphics," said the nurse. "It is a scheme for casting nativities. See, here are the Twelve Houses—the first, the house of Life; the second, of Riches; the third, of Brethren; the fourth, of Parents; the fifth of Children; the sixth, of Health; the seventh, of Marriage; the eighth, of Death; the ninth, of Religion; the tenth, of Dignities; the eleventh, of Friends; and the twelfth, of Enemies."

"And in which of those houses were our two dear babbies born?" eagerly asked Kezia.

Mrs. Prideaux looked grave, sighed, and shook her head so ominously, that Kezia turned as pale as marble, her very claret-mark fading into a scarcely perceptible tinge of pink.

"Don't say it—don't say it!" she stammered, while the big tears gathered in her eyes: "What! cut off precociously like blighted spring buds!"

"I did not say death," replied the nurse. "But there are other malignant signs and sinister aspects, that foretell misfortunes of another kind—for instance, poverty. But hush——" and she held up a warning forefinger whilst her voice subsided into a whisper.

"I hear your master. Leave your door ajar, and I will come to you presently in your own room." So saying, she rose and glided spectre-like from the kitchen—where she left Kezia staring through a haze, damp as a Scotch mist, at a vision of two little half-naked and half-famished babes turning away, loathingly, from a dose of parish gruel, administered by a pauper nurse, with a work-house spoon.

CHAPTER II.—OUR HOROSCOPE.

A LONE hour had worn away, and still Kezia sat in her attic with the door ajar, anxiously expecting the promised visit from the mysterious nurse. Too excited to sleep, she had not undressed, but setting up a rushlight, seated herself on the bed, and gave full scope to her foreboding fancies, till all the round bright spots, projected from the night shade on the walls and ceiling, appeared like so many evil planets portending misfortunes to the new-born. From these reveries she was roused by a very low, but very audible whisper, every syllable clear and distinct as the sound of a bell.

"Whose room is that in front?"

"Mr. Postle's."

"Can he overhear us through the partition?"

"No, not a word."

"You are certain of it?"

"Yes, I have tried it."

"Very good." And Mrs. Prideaux having first carefully closed the door, seated herself beside the other female on the bed. "I have left the mother and her lovely twins in a sound sleep."

"The little cherubs!" exclaimed Kezia. "And must they, will they, sink so low in the world, poor things! Are they unrevocably marked out for such unprosperous fortunes in life?"

"They must—they will—they are. Listen, Kezia! I have not been many days, not many hours under this roof; but my art tells me that the wolf already has more than looked in at the door—that the master of this house knows, by experience, the bitter trials of a poor professional man—the difficulties, the cruel difficulties, of one who has to keep up a respectable appearance with very limited means."

"The Lord knows we have!" exclaimed Kezia, quite thrown off her guard. "The struggles we have had to keep up our genteelity! The shifts we have been obligated to make—as well as our neighbors," she added hastily, and not without a twinge of mortification at having let down the family by her disclosures.

"I understand you," said Mrs. Prideaux, with a series of significant little nods. "Harassed, worried to death, for the means to meet the tradesmen's bills, or to take up overdue acceptances. I know it all. The best china, and linen parted with to help to make up a sum, (Kezia uttered a low inward groan,) the plate in pledge, (another moan from Kezia,) and the head of the family even obliged to absent himself, to avoid personal arrest."

"She is a witch, sure enough," said Kezia to herself. "She knows about the baileys."

"Yes—there have been sheriff's officers in this very house," continued the nurse, as if reading the secret thought of the other. "Nor are the circumstances of your master much mended even at the present time,"—and she fixed her dark eyes on the pale blue ones, that seemed to contract under their gaze like the feline organ under excess of light—"at this moment, when there are not six bottles of what, by courtesy, we will call sherry, in his cellar, nor as many guineas in his bureau."

"Why, as to the wine," stammered Kezia, "we have had company lately, and I would not answer for a whole dozen; but as regards the pecuniary, I feel sure—I know—I'm positive there's nigh a score of golden guineas in the house, at this blessed moment—let alone the silver and the copper."

"Your own, perhaps?"

Kezia's face seemed suddenly suffused all over with claret, and felt as hot too as if the wine had been mulled, at being thus caught out in an equivocation, invented purely for the credit of the family.

"In a word," said the nurse, "your master is a needy man; and the addition of two children to his burthens will hardly improve his finances."

"But our practice may increase," said Kezia. "We may have money left to us in a legacy—or win a grand prize in the lottery."

"I wish it was on the horoscope," said Mrs. Prideaux, looking up at the ceiling, as if appealing through it to the planetary bodies. "But the stars say otherwise. Rash speculations—heavy losses by bad debts—and a ruinous Chancery suit, as indicated by the presence of Saturn in the twelfth house."

"Satan!" ejaculated Kezia, with a visible shudder. "If he's in the house, there'll be chancery suits no doubt, for he is in league they say with all the lawyers, from the judges down to the 'turneys.'"

"And with litigation," said the nurse, "will come rags and poverty, ay, down to the second and third generations."

"What, common begging—from door to door?"

"Alas, yes—mendicancy and pauperism."

"Never!" said Kezia, with energy, starting up from the bed, and holding forth her clumsy, coarse hands, with their ruddy digits, like two bunches of radishes to tempt a purchaser—"Never! whilst I can work with these ten fingers!"

"Of course not, my worthy creature, only don't be quite so vehement—of course not. And, as far as my own humble means extend, you shall not want my poor coöperation. I have already devoted my nursing fee and perquisites, whatever may be the amount, towards a scheme that will help to secure the little innocents from absolute want. There is a society, a sort of masonic society of benevolent individuals, privately established for the endowment of such unfortunate little mortals. For a small sum at the birth of a child, they undertake to pay him, after a certain age, a yearly annuity in proportion to the original deposit—a heavenly plan, devised by a few real practical Christians, who delight in doing good by stealth; and especially to such forlorn beings as are born under the influence of a malignant star. Now the year that threatens our dear darling twins is the seventh; a tender age, Kezia, to be left to the charity of the wide world!"

Poor Kezia turned as white as ashes; and for some minutes sat speechless, writhing her body and wringing her hands, as if to wring tears out of her finger ends. At last, in a faltering voice, she inquired how much seventeen guineas would grow into, per annum, in seven years.

"Why, let me see;" and Mrs. Prideaux began to calculate by the help of a massive silver pencil-case and her tablets; "seventeen guineas, for seven years, with interest—and interest upon interest—simple and compound—with the bonus, added by the society—why, it would positively be a little fortune—a good twenty pounds a year—enough at any rate to secure one, or even two persons, from absolute starvation."

Kezia made no reply, but darted off to a large iron-bound trunk which she unlocked, and then drew from it a little round wooden box, the construction of which, every one who has swallowed Ching's worm medicine, so celebrated some thirty or forty years ago, will very readily remember. Unscrewing one half of this box with a shrill screeching sound, that jarred the nerves of Mrs. Prideaux, and set all her small white teeth on edge, Kezia poured into her own lap, from a compartment formerly occupied by oval white lozenges, ten full weight guineas of the coinage of King George the Third; then turning the box, and opening the opposite half, with a similar skreek, and a fresh shock to the nerves and teeth of the genteel nurse, she emptied from the division, once filled with oval brown lozenges, eight half guineas, and nine seven shilling pieces, in all, seventeen guineas, the sum total of her hoarded savings since she had been at service.

"Then, take them," she said, holding out her apron by the corners, with the precious glittering contents, towards the nurse.

"Bless you—bless you, for a true Samaritan!" replied Mrs. Prideaux, passing her hand lightly across her eyelashes—whilst something like a tear glistened upon one of her fingers, but the radiance came from a brilliant ring. "I will add this bauble to the stock," said the nurse, drawing it off, and throwing it into Kezia's apron. "But, my good girl, I am afraid you have contributed your all. You ought to consider yourself a little—you may be ill—or out of place. At any rate, reserve a trifle against a rainy day."

"No, no—don't consider me—take it all—all, every penny of it," sobbed Kezia. "The poor dear innocents! they are as welcome to it as my own little ones—at least, if I had any."

"To be sure it is for them,—one, two, three," said the nurse, counting the pieces separately into a stout green silk purse with gilt rings: "seventeen guineas exactly. With my own poor mite, and the ring, say twenty, or five and twenty, to be invested for the dear twins in the Benevolent Endowment Society, for children born under Malignant Planets."

"Oh! I do wish," exclaimed Kezia, with the abruptness of a sudden inspiration, "I do wish I knew the fortune-teller that prophesies for Moore's Almanack!"

The nurse turned her keen dark eyes on the speaker, and for a minute regarded her, as if, in the popular phrase, she would have looked her through and through. But the scrutiny satisfied her; for she said in a calm tone, that the name in question was very well known, as Francis Moore, physician.

"But people say," objected Kezia, "that Francis Moore is only his alibi," she meant, alias.

"It is not her name," replied Mrs. Prideaux, with a marked staccato emphasis on the negative and the pronoun. "But that is a secret. And now, mark me, Kezia—not a syllable of this matter to any one, and least of all to the parents. The troubles we know are burthensome enough to bear, without an insight into futurity. And to foresee such a melancholy prospect predestined to the offspring of their own loins."

"Oh! not for the world!" exclaimed Kezia, clasping her hands together. "It would kill them outright—it would break both their hearts! As for me, it don't signify. I'm used to fretting. Oh! if you knew the wretched sleepless hours I've enjoyed, night after night, when master was in his commercial crises with unaccommodating bills—he'd have had that money long and long ago, if I had had the courage to offer it to him; but he's as proud on some points as Lucifer. And, to be sure, we've not been reduced more than our betters, perhaps, at a chance time, when they could not get in their rents, or the steward absconded with them, or the stocks fell suddenly, or the bank was short of cash for the dividends, or the key of the bureau——"

She stopped short, for Mrs. Prideaux had vanished. So, after an exclamation of surprise and a thoughtful turn or two up and down her chamber, the devoted Kezia threw herself on her knees beside the bed, and prayed fervently for her master, her mistress, and the dear little progeny, till in that devout posture she fell asleep.

CHAPTER III.—WE ARE NAMED.

It is assuredly a mercy for humankind that we are born into this world of folly as we are, mere purblind, sprawling, oysterly squabs, with no more nous than a polypus, instead of coming into it with our wits ready sharpened, and wide awake as young weasels! Above all, it is providential that we are so much more accessible to lachrymose than ludicrous impressions; more prone to tears, squallings, sobs, sighs, and blubberings, than to broad grins or crowing like chanticleer. For, while at a royal or imperial establishment, one Fool has generally been deemed sufficient; at the court of a Lilliputian Infant or Infanta, it seems to be held indispensable that every person who enters the presence must play the zany or buffoon, and act, talk, sing, cut, and pull, such antics, gibberish, nonsense, capers, and grimaces, that nine tenths of the breed of babies, if their fancies were at all ticklesome, must needs die of ruptured spleen, bursten blood-vessels, split sides, or shattered diaphragms. Yes, nine tenths of the species would go off in a guffaw, like the ancient who lost his breath in a cachinnation, at seeing an ass eating figs. For truly that donkey was nothing to the donkeys, nor his freak worth one of his figs, compared to the farcialities exhibited by those he and she animals who congregate around the cots and cradles of the nursery.

Thus, had our own little vacant goggle eyes at all appreciated, or our ignorant sealed ears at all comprehended, the absurdities that were perpetrated, said and sung, daily and hourly, before and around us, my Twin-Brother and myself must inevitably, in the first week, have choked in our pap, and died, strangled in convulsion fits of inextinguishable laughter, or perhaps jaw-locked by a collapse of the overstrained risible muscles.

It would have been quite enough to shatter the tender lungs and midriff of a precocious humorist, to have only seen that ungainly figure which so constantly hung over us, with that strange variegated face, grotesquely puckering, twisting, screwing its refractory features to produce such indescribable cacklings, chucklings, and chirrupings;—to have heard her drilling that impracticable peacocky voice, with its rebellious falsetto, and all its mazy wanderings, from nasal to guttural, from guttural to pectoral, and even to ventral, with all its involuntary quaverings, gugglings, and gratings,—into a soothing lullaby, or cradle hymn. It must have asphyxiated an infant, with any turn for the comic, to have seen and heard that lo-like creature with her pied red and white face, lowering—

"There's no ox a-near thy bed!"

or that astounding flourish of tune, accompanied by an appropriate brandishing of the mottled upper limbs, with which she warbled—

"Tis thy Kizzy sits beside thee,
And her harms shall be thy guard."

It was ten thousand mercies, I say, that the stolid gravity of babyhood was proof against such sounds and spectacles; not to forget that domestic conclave, with its notable debate as to the names to be given to us in our baptism.

"For my own part," said my mother, enthroned in a huge dimity covered easy chair, "I should like some sort of names we are accustomed to couple together, so as to make them out for a pair of twins."

"Nothing more easy," said my father.
"There's Castor and Pollux."

"Was Castor the inventor of castor oil?" inquired my mother, in the very simplicity of her heart.

"Why, not exactly," replied my fatherly, suddenly rubbing his nose as if something had tickled him. "He was invented himself." An answer, by the way, which served my other parent as a riddle for the rest of the day.

"And what was their persuasion?"

"Heathen, of course."

"Then they shall never stand sponsors for children of mine," said my mother, whose religious sentiments were strictly orthodox. "But are there no other twin brothers celebrated in history?"

"Yes," replied my father. "Valentine and Orson."

"Why one—one—one of them," exclaimed Kezia, stuttering in her eagerness—"one of them was a savage, like Peter the Wild Boy, and sucked a she-bear!"

"Then they won't do," said my mother, in a tone of great decision.

"And Romulus and Remus are equally ineligible," said my father, "for they were suckled by a she-wolf."

"Bless me!" exclaimed my mother, lifting up her hands, "the ferocious beasts in those days must have been much tamer and gentler than in ours. I should be sorry to trust flesh and blood of mine to such succedaneums for wet-nurses."

"And what would be your choice, Kizzy?" inquired my father, turning towards the maid of all work, who, by way of employing both hands and feet, had volunteered to rock the cradle, whilst she worked at the duplicate baby-linen, so unexpectedly required.

"Why then," said Kezia, rising up to give more weight to the recommendation, "if that precious pair of infants was mine, I'd christen them Jachin and Boaz."

"The pillars of the temple"—said my father. "But suppose, Kizzy, the boys chose to go into the army and navy?"

"They would fight none the worse," said Kezia, reddening, "for having Bible names!"

"Nor better," said my father, sotto voce. "And now, perhaps Mrs. Prideaux will favor us with her opinion!"

But the genteel nurse, with a sweet smile, and in her silvery voice, declined advising in such a delicate matter; only hinting, as regarded her private taste, that she preferred the select and euphonious, as a prefix. Her own son was named Algernon Marmaduke Prideaux.

"Perhaps," said my father, leaning his head thoughtfully on one side, and scratching his ear, "perhaps Postle could suggest something. His head's like an Encyclopedia."

"He have," said Kezia, suspending for a moment her needlework and the rocking of the cradle.

"He's for Demon and Pithy."

"For what!" exclaimed my mother, —

"Demon and Pithy."

"Phoo, phoo—Damon and Pythias," said my father, "famous for their friendship, like David and Jonathan, in the classical times."

"Then they're heathens, too," said my mother, "and won't do for godfathers to little Christians."

A dead pause ensued for some minutes, during which nothing was audible but my father's ghost of a whistle, and the gentle creak, creak, of the wicker cradle. The expression of my mother's face, in the meantime, changed every moment for the worse; from puzzled to anxious, from anxious to fretful.

"Well, I do wish," she exclaimed at last, just at the tail of a long sigh, "I do wish, George, that you would think of some name for our twins. For, of course, you don't wish them to grow up anonymous like Tobit's dog!"

"Of course not," replied my father. "But I can hit on only one more suggestion. Supposing the infants to be remarkably fine ones —"

"And so they are!" put in Kezia.

"And of an uncommon size for twins —"

"They're perfect Herculeuses," cried Kezia.

"What think you of Gog and Magog?"

"Fiddle and fiddlestick!" exclaimed my mother in great indignation. "But I believe you would joke on your death-bed."

"Rabelais did," said my father. "But come," he added in his genuine serious voice, for he had two, a real and a sham Abraham one, "it is my decided opinion that we could not do better than to name the children after your brother. He is wealthy, and a bachelor; and it might be to the advantage of the boys to pay him the compliment."

"I have thought of that too," said my mother.

"But my brother does n't shorten well. Jinkins Rumbold is well enough; but you wouldn't like to hear me, when I wanted the children, calling for Jin and Rum."

"Pshaw!" said my father, "I am philosopher enough to bear that for the chance of a thumping legacy to our sons."

The genteel nurse, Mrs. Prideaux, backing this worldly policy of my father's with a few emphatic words, my mother concurred; and, accordingly, it was decided that we should be called after Jinkins Rumbold; the Jinkins being assigned to my twin brother, the first-born, and the Rumbold to my "crying self."

It is usual, however, in dedicating works, whether of Art or Nature, in one or two volumes, to ask previously the permission of the dedicatee. To obtain this consent, it was necessary to write to our Godfather Elect: and accordingly my father retired to the parlor, and seated himself, on epistolary deeds intent, at the old escritoire. But my parent was an indifferent letter-writer at the best; and the task was even more perplexing than such labors usually are. His brother-in-law was a formalist of the old school; an antiquarian in dress, speech, manners, sentiments, and prejudices, whom it would not be prudent to address in the current and familiar style of the day. The request, besides, involved delicate considerations, as difficult to touch safely, as impossible to avoid. In this extremity, after spoiling a dozen sheets of paper and as many pens, my father had recourse, as usual, to Mr. Postle, who came, characteristically at his summons, with a graduated glass in one hand, and a bottle of vitriolic acid in the other. It was indeed one of his merits, that he identified himself, soul and body, with his business: so much so, that he was reported to have gone to an evening party with his handkerchief scented with spirits of camphor.

"Mr. Postle," said my father, "I want your opinion on a new case. Suppose a rich old hunk of a bachelor uncle, whom you wished to stand godfather to your twins, what would be your mode of treatment, by way of application to him?"

The assistant, thus called in to consultation, at once addressed himself, seriously, to the consideration of the case. But in vain he stared at the Esculapian bronze bird with the gilt bolus suspended from its beak, and from the bird, at the framed sampler, and thence to the water-color view of some landscape in Wales, and then at the stuffed woodpecker, and in turn at each of the black profiles that flanked the mirror. There was no inspiration in any of them. At last he spoke.

"If it's all the same to you, sir, I think if we were to adjourn to the surgery, I could make up my mind on the subject. Like the authors, who write best, as I have heard, in their libraries, with their books about them, my ideas are always most confluent, when, in looking for them, my eyes rest on the drawers, and bottles, and gallipots. It's an idiosyncrasy, I believe, but so it is."

"So be it," said my father, gathering up his rough composing drafts, and hurrying, with Postle at his heels, into the surgery, where he established himself at the desk. The assistant in the mean time took a deliberate survey of all the wooden earthenware, and glass repositories for drugs, acid, salt, bitter, or saccharine; liquid, solid, or in powder.

"Now then, Postle," said my father, "how would you set to work to ask a rich old curmudgeon to stand sponsor to your children?"

"Why, then, sir," replied Postle, "in the first place, I would disclaim all idea of drawing upon him"—(and he glanced at a great bottle apparently filled with green tinsel, but marked "cantharides")—"or of bleeding him. Next I would throw in gentle stimulants, such as an appeal to family pride, and reminding him of your matrimonial mixture. Then I would exhibit the babies—in as pleasant a vehicle as possible—flavored, as it were, with cinnamon"—(he looked hard at a particular drawer)—"and scented with rose water. As sweet as honey"—(he got that hint from a large white jar)—"and as lively as leeches." (He owed that comparison to a great fact on the counter.)

"Very good," said my father.

"After that," continued Mr. Postle, "I would recommend change of air and exercise, namely, by coming down to the christening: with an unrestricted diet. I would also promise to make up a spare bed for him, according to the best prescriptions; with a draught of something comforting to be taken the last thing at night. Say, diluted alcohol, sweetened with sugar. Add a little essential oil of flummery; and in case of refusal, hint at a mortification."

"Capital!—Excellent!" exclaimed my father. And on this medical model he actually constructed a letter, before dinner time, which might otherwise have puzzled him for a week!

CHAPTER IV.

THE bed in the spare bed-room had been aired for my father: who between his attendance on my mother, and another lady in the same predicament, had never been out of his clothes for three successive nights. But the time for repose had arrived at last; he undressed hastily, and was standing in his night-gown and night-cap, his hand, with the extinguisher, just hovering over the candle, when he heard, or thought he heard, his name called from without. He stopped his hand and listened—not a sound. It had been only the moaning of the wind, or the creaking of the great poplar at the end of the house; and the hollow cone was again descending over the flame when his name was shouted out in a peremptory tone by somebody close under the window. There could be no mistake. With a deep sigh he put down the extinguisher—opened the casement, and put forth his head. Through the gloom he could just perceive the dark figure of a man on horseback.

"Who is there?"

"Why the devil," grumbled the fellow, "have you muffled the night-bell! I've rung a dozen times."

"Why?"—replied my father—"why, because my mistress is confined."

"I wish mine was," growled the man, "in a madhouse. You're wanted."

"To-night?"

"Yes: I'm sent express for you. You're to come directly."

"Where?"

"At the great house to be sure."

"Well, I'll come—or at any rate Mr. Postle—"

"No—you must come yourself."

My father groaned in spirit, and shuddered as if suddenly struck to the lungs by the night-air.

"Who is ill?" he asked; "is it Prince George?"

"No—it's the little"—the rest was lost in the sound of the horse's heels as the messenger turned and rode off.

My father closed the casement with a slam that nearly broke the jingling glass; and for some minutes stood ruefully looking from the candle to the bed, and from the bed to the chair with his clothes. But there was no remedy; with his rapidly increasing family he could not afford to slight a patient at the great house. So he plucked off his nightcap, threw it on the floor, and with both hands harrowed and raked at his hair, till every drowsy organ under it was thoroughly wakened up; then he dressed hastily, crept down stairs, wiped a bandana round his throat, struggled into his great coat, thrust on his worst hat, and, pocketing the door-key, stepped forth into the dark, damp, chill air. He thought he never felt so uncomfortable a night in his life, or encountered worse weather; but he thought a mistake. He had met with inferior qualities by fifty degrees. However there were disagreeables enough, wind and fog, and his road lay for half a mile on the border of a Lincolnshire river, and through a dreary neighborhood,—for out of Holland or Flanders, there was not such another village, so low and flat, with so much water, running and stagnant, in canals and ditches, amidst swampy fields growing the plant cannabis, or hemp—or with so many windmills, and bulrushes, and long rows of stunted willows, relieved here and there by an aspen, that seemed shivering with the ague. On he went, yawning and stumbling, past the lock, and over the bridge, and along by the row of low cottages, all as dark as death except one, and that was as dark as death too, in spite of its solitary bright window. For the doctor stopped as he went by to peep in at the narrow panes, and saw one of those sights of misery, that the eye of Providence, a parish doctor, a clergyman occasionally, and a parliamentary commissioner still more rarely, have to look upon. On the bed, if bed it might be called, for it was a mere heap of straw, matting, rushes, and rags, covered by a tattered rug, sat the mother, rocking herself to and fro, over the dead child, wasted to a skeleton, that was lying stark across her lap. Beside her sat her husband, staring steadfastly, stupid with grief at the frame of the rushlight, his hollow cheeks showing yellow, even by the candle light, from recent jaundice. Neither moved their lips. On the floor lay an empty phial, with the untasted medicine beside it in a broken tea-cup; there was a little green rush basket near the mother's feet, with a few faded butter-cups—the last toys. My father saw no more, for the light that had been flickering suddenly went out, and added Darkness to Sorrow and Silence.

In spite of his medical acquaintance with similar scenes of wretchedness, he was shocked at this startling increase of desolation; and for a moment was tempted to step in and offer a few words of consolation to the afflicted couple. But before his hand touched the latch, reflection reminded him from his experience, how inefficacious such verbal comfort had ever been with the poor, except from sympathizers of their own condition. In the emphatic words of one of his pauper patients, "When a poor man or woman, as low down in life as myself, talks to me about heaven above, it sounds as sweet-like as a promise of going back some day to my birth-place, and my father's house, the home of my childhood; but when rich people speak to me of heaven, it sounds like saying, now you're old and worn out, and sick, and past work, and come to rags, and beggary, and starvation, there's heaven for you—just as they say to one, at the last pinch of poverty—by way of comforting—there's the parish."

So my father sighed and walked on: those two wretched, sickly, sorrow-stricken faces, and the dead one, seeming to flash fitfully upon him out of the darkness, as they had appeared and vanished again by the light of the flickering candle. And with this picture of human misery in his mind's eye, he arrived at the Great House: and still carrying the dolorous images on his retina, across the marble hall, and up the painted staircase, and through the handsome antechamber, stepped with it, still vivid, into the luxurious drawing-room, that presented a new and very different scene of distress.

On her knees, beside the superb sofa, was the weeping lady of the mansion, bending over the little creature that lay shivering on the chintz cushion, with its arms hugging its own diminutive body, and the knees drawn up to the chest. Its dark almond-shaped eyes rolled restlessly to and fro: its tiny mouth seemed puckered up by suffering, and its cheeks and forehead were deeply wrinkled, as if by premature old age. The nurse, a young woman, was in attendance, so exhausted by watching that she was dozing on her feet.

As my father advanced into the room, he could distinguish the low moaning of the afflicted lady, intermixed with all those fond doting epithets which a devoted mother lavishes on her sick child. The moment she became aware of his presence she sprang up, with a slight hysterical shriek, and running to meet him, exclaimed,

"Oh! doctor, I am so glad you are come! I have been in agonies! My poor dear darling, Florio, is ill—going—dying;" and she sobbed aloud, and buried her face in her handkerchief.

My father hastily stepped past her, to the sofa, to look at the patient: and, at the risk of bursting, suppressed an oath that tingled at the very tip of his tongue. A single glance had filled up the hiatus in the groom's communication—the sufferer was a little Brazilian monkey.

My father's surprise was equal to his disgust, aggravated as it was by a vivid remembrance of the domestic distress he had so recently witnessed through the cottage window. His head, filled with that human bereavement, he had totally forgotten the circumstance that once before he had been summoned to the Great House on a similar errand—to prescribe for a sick lap-dog, named after an illustrious personage, at that time very popular, as Prince George. But the whispers of Prudence stifled the promptings of Indignation, reminding him just in time, that he was a poor country practitioner, the father, within the last eight and forty hours, of a pair of twins. Accordingly he proceeded with all gravity to feel the pulse and examine the skin of the dwarf animal; laying his hand on the chest to estimate the action of the heart; and even ascertaining, at the expense of a small bite, the state of the tongue.

The weeping lady in the mean time looked on with intense anxiety, uttering incoherent ejaculations, and putting questions with unanswerable rapidity. "Oh, the darling!—my precious pet!—is he hot!—is he feverish? My little beauty!—Is n't he very, very ill? He don't eat, doctor—he don't drink—he don't sleep—he don't do anything—poor dear! Look, how he shivers! Can you—can you—do anything for him—my little love of loves! If he dies I shall go distracted—I know I shall—but you'll save him—you will, won't you? Oh do, do, do prescribe—there's a dear good doctor. What do you think of him—my suffering sweet one—tell me, tell me, pray tell me—let me know the worst—but don't say he'll die! He'll get over it, won't he—with a strong constitution!—Say it's a strong constitution. Oh, mercy! look how he twists about!—my own, poor, dear, darling little Flora!"

My father, during this farrago, felt horribly vexed and annoyed, and even looked so in spite of himself; but the contrast was too great between the silent, still, deep, sorrow—still waters are deep—for a lost child, and these garrulous lamentations over a sick brute. But the hard, cold, severe expression of his face gradually thawed into a milder one, as the idea dawned upon him of a mode of extracting good out of evil, which he immediately began to put into practice.

"This little animal,"—he intended to have said my little patient, but it stuck in his throat—"this little animal has no disease at present, whatever affection may hereafter be established unless taken in time. It is suffering solely from cold and change of climate. The habitat of the species is the Brazils; and he misses the heat of a tropical sun."

"Of course he does—poor thing!" exclaimed the lady. "But it is not my fault—I thought the Brazils were in France. He shall have a fire in his bed-room."

"It will do no harm, madam," said the doctor. "But he would derive infinitely more benefit from animal heat—the warmth of the human body."

"He shall sleep with Cradock!" exclaimed the lady, looking towards the drowsy young woman, who bit her lips and pouted: "and mind, Cradock, you cuddle him."

"I should rather recommend, madam," said my father, "a much younger bed-fellow. There is something in the natural glow of a young child peculiarly restorative to the elderly or infirm who suffer from a defect of the animal warmth—a fact well known to the faculty: and some aged persons even are selfish enough to sleep with their grandchildren, on that very account. I say selfish, for the benefit they derive is at the expense of the juvenile constitution, which suffers in proportion."

"But where is one to get a child from?" inquired the lady, perfectly willing to sacrifice the health of a human little one to that of her pet brute.

"I think I can manage it, madam," said my father, "amongst my pauper patients with large families. Indeed, I have a little girl in my eye."

"Can she come to night?" asked the lady.

"I fear not," said my father. "But to-morrow, ma'am, as early as you please."

"Then for to-night, poor dear, he must make shift with Cradock," said the lady, "with a good tropical fire in the room, and heaps of warm blankets."

(Poor Cradock looked hot, at the very thought of it.)

"And about his diet!" asked the lady—"it's heart-breaking to see his appetite is so delicate. He don't eat for days together."

"Perhaps he will eat," said my father, "for monkeys, you know, madam, are very imitative, when the child sets him the example."

"I'll stuff her!" said the lady.

"It can do her no harm," said my father; "on the contrary, good living will tend to keep up her temperature. And as her animal warmth is the desideratum, she must be carefully guarded against any chill."

"I'll clothe her with warm things," said the lady, "from head to foot."

"And make her take exercise, madam," added my father: "exercise in the open air, in fine weather, to promote the circulation of the blood, and a fine glow on the skin."

"Cradock shall play with her in the garden," said the lady; "they shall both have skipping-ropes."

"I can think of nothing else," said my father; "and if such careful treatment and tender nursing will not cure and preserve her, I do not know what will."

"Oh, it must, it will, it shall cure her, the darling precious!" exclaimed the delighted lady, clapping her jewelled hands. "What a nice clever doctor you are! A hundred, thousand, million thanks! I can never, never, never repay you; but, in the mean time, accept a slight token of my gratitude," and she thrust her purse into my father's hand.

For an instant he hesitated; but, on second thoughts, he pocketed her bounty, and with due thanks took his leave. "After all," he thought, as he stepped through the antechamber, "I am glad I was called in. The monkey may live or die; but, at any rate, poor little Betty Hopkins is provided for one while with a roof over her, and food, and raiment."

The night was finer; the weather, as he stepped into it, was wonderfully improved: at least he thought so, which was the same thing. With a light brisk step he walked homewards, whistling much above his usual pitch, till he came abreast of the cottage of mourning. There he stopped, and his sibilation sunk into silence, as the three melancholy faces, the yellow, the pale, and the little white one, again flashed on his memory. Then came the faces of his own twin children, but fainter, and soon vanishing. His hand groped warily for the latch, his thumb stealthily pressed it down; the door was softly pushed a little ajar, and the next instant, something fell inside with a chinking sound on the cottage floor. The door silently closed again, the latch quietly sunk into the catch; and my father set off again, walking twice as fast, and whistling thrice as loud as before. A happy man was he, for all his poverty, as he let himself in with the house key to his own home, and remembered that he had under its roof two living children, instead of one dead one. Quickly, quickly he undressed, and got into bed: and, oh! how soundly he slept, and how richly he deserved to sleep so, with that delicious dream that visited him in his slumbers, and gave him a foretaste of the joys of heaven!

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE FREETHINKER.

"With us ther was a DOCTOUR OF PRISKE,
In all this world ne was ther non him like
To speke of phisike and of surgerie:

* * *
He knew the cause of every maladis,
Were it of cold, or hote, or moist, or drie,
And wher engendered, and of what humour,
He was a vera parfitte practitioner—

* * *
His studie was but litel on the Bible."

CHAUCER.

It was in the year 18—that I completed my professional education in England, and decided upon spending in Paris the two years which had still to elapse, before my engagement with my guardians would require me to present myself for examination and approval at the Royal College of Surgeons in London. The medical schools and hospitals of Paris were then, as now, famous for their men of science, and for the useful discoveries which clinical instruction—bedside ingenuity and industry—is morally certain to carry along with it. Whatever may be said of the French practitioners as a body—and my professional brethren, I know, bring against them, as a national reproach, the charge of inefficiency in the treatment of disease, (remarkable for acuteness and truth as their diagnosis is allowed to be)—still I think it will not be denied, that chiefly to the Parisian physicians, and to the untiring energy of particular individuals among them, whom it would not be difficult to name, are we indebted at this moment for some of the most important knowledge, that we possess—knowledge, be it understood, derived altogether from investigations diligently pursued at the patient's bedside, and obtained with the greatest judgment, difficulty, and pains. As I write, the honorable and European reputation of Louis occurs to my mind—an instance of universal acknowledgment rendered to genius and talents wholly or principally devoted to the alleviation of human suffering, and to the acquisition of wisdom in the form and by the method to which I have adverted.

A mere attempt to refer to the many and various obligations which the continental professors of medicine have laid upon mankind during the last half century, would fill a book. They were well known and spoken of in my youth, and the names of many learned foreigners were at that period associated in my bosom with sentiments of awe and veneration. It was some time after I had once resolved to go abroad, before I fixed upon Paris as my destination. Langenbeck, the greatest operator of his day, the Liston of Germany, was performing miracles in Hanover. Tiedemann, a less nimble operator, but a far more learned surgeon, had already made the medical schools of Heidelberg famous by his lectures and still valuable publications; while the lamented and deeply penetrating Stromeyer—the tutor of our own amiable and early lost Edward Turner—had established himself already in Gottingen, and drawn around him a band of enthusiastic students who have since done honor to their teacher, and in their turn become eminent among the first chemists of the day. With such and similar temptations from many quarters, it was not easy to arrive at a steady determination. I had hardly thought of Paris, when—as it often happens—a thing of a moment relieved me from difficulty and doubt, and helped me at once to a decision. A letter one morning by the post induced me to set out for the giddiest and yet most fascinating of European cities. James M'Linnie—who, by the way, died only the other day of dysentery at Hong-Kong, a few hours after landing with the troops upon that luckless island—was an old hospital acquaintance, and, like me, cutting and heaving his way to fame and fortune. He had distinguished himself at Guy's, and quitted that school with every reasonable prospect of success in his profession. He had not only passed muster before the high and mighty court of examiners, but had received on the occasion the personal warm congratulations of Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper; the former of whom, indeed, before he asked M'Linnie a question, gave him confidence in his peculiar way, by requesting him "not to be a frightened fool, for Mr. Abernethy was not the brute the world was pleased to make him out;" and after a stiff and rough examination shook the student heartily by the hand, and pronounced him "not an ass, like all the world, but a sensible shrewd fellow, who, instead of muddling his head with books, had passed his days, very properly, where real life was only to be met with"—videlicet, in the dead-house.

James M'Linnie was, at the time of which I speak, himself in Paris, and enthusiastic in his devotion to the indefatigable and highly-gifted teachers among whom he lived. He wrote to me, in the letter to which I have above adverted—the first I received from him after his departure from England—in the most glowing terms respecting them; and conjured me by the love I bore our glorious profession—by my ardent aspirations after fame, and by the strong desire which, he believed, I entertained with myself and the majority of men to serve and benefit my fellow-creatures—not to waste my precious hours in England, but to join him instantly "in the finest field of operations that the world presented." "We are pigmies in London," he continued in his own ardent fashion—"boys, children, infants—they are giants here. Such anatomists! such physicians! Fancy one of our first men, C—, for instance, standing for nearly one hour at the bed-side of a laboring man, and tracing the fellow's history step by step, patiently and searchingly, in order to arrive at the small beginnings of disease, its earliest indications, and first causes. I saw it done yesterday by one to whom C— could not hold a candle—a man whose reputation is continental—whose practice does not leave him a moment in the day for personal recreation—who is loaded with honors and distinctions. The students listen to him as to an oracle; and with cause. He leaps to no conclusions—his sterling mind satisfies itself with nothing but truth, and is content to labor after mere glimpses and intimations, which it secures for future comparison and study. Remind me when you come out—for come out you must—of the story of the baker. I will tell it you then in full. It is a capital instance of the professor's acuteness and ability. A patient came into the hospital a month ago; his case puzzled every one; nothing could be done for him, and he was about to be discharged. The professor saw him, visited him regularly for a week—watched him—noted every trifling symptom—prescribed for him;—in vain. The man did not rally—and the professor could not say what ailed him. One morning the latter came to the patient's bed-side and said, 'You tell me, mon enfant, that you have been a porter. Were you never in any other occupation?' 'Yes,' groaned the poor fellow; I drove a cabriolet for a year or two——'Go on,' said the professor encouragingly. 'And then,' continued the man, 'and then I was at a boot-maker's; afterward at a saddler's—and at last a porter.' 'You have never worked at any other trade?' 'Never, sir.' 'Think again—be quite sure.' 'No—never, sir.' 'Have you never been a baker?' 'Oh, yes, sir—that was twenty years ago—and only for a few months; but I was so ill at the oven that I was obliged to give it up.' 'That will do, mon enfant—don't tire yourself, try and go to sleep.' In the lecture-room afterward, the professor addressed the students thus: 'Gentlemen—once in the course of my practice, I have met with the case of the porter, and only once. It is now eighteen years since. The patient was a baker—and I examined the subject after death. This man will die.' The lecturer then proceeded to describe minutely and lucidly the seat of the disease, its nature, and best treatment. He told them what might be done by way of alleviation, and directed them to look for such and such appearances after death. The man lingered a few days, and then departed. At the post mortem, the professor was found to be correct in every particular. What say you to this by way of memory and quick intelligence?' The letter went on to speak of the facility of procuring subjects—as cheap and plentiful, to use M'Linnie's phrase, "as herrings in England;" of the daily exhibition in the dissecting room of disease of all kinds, in all stages; of the enthusiastic natures of both teachers and pupils; or the earnest and inspiring character of hospital practice; and at last, wound up its flattering history with a peroration, that extinguished in an instant every spark of hesitation that lingered in my mind. In less than a fortnight after M'Linnie's summons, I was one of a mixed party in a diligence and eight, galloping over the high-road to Paris, at the rate of five statute miles an hour.

I had taken care to carry abroad with me an introduction to one influential member of the profession. I say one, because I refused, with deliberation, to encumber myself, as Doctor Johnson has it, with more help than was actually necessary to my well-doing. A travelling student, with a key to the confidence of one man of power and kindred spirit, has all that he can desire for every professional purpose. If his happiness depend upon social enjoyments, and he must needs journey with a messenger's bag, or be utterly miserable, let him by all means save his travelling expenses, and visit his natural acquaintances. My letter of credit was obtained from my friend H——, who at the time filled the anatomical chair at Guy's, and to whom I am grateful for more acts of real kindness than he is willing to allow. To this letter of credit, and to the acquaintance formed by its means, the reader is indebted for the curious history I am about to relate. That the former was likely to lead to something original and unusual, I certainly suspected when H—— placed the document in my hands, with his last words of caution and advice. I could hardly dream of half that was to follow.

"Pray, take care of yourself, Mr. Walpole," said my good friend; "you are going to a very dangerous and seductive city, and you will require all your firmness and good principles to save you from the force of evil example. Don't be led away—don't be led away—that is all, I beg of you."

"I shall be careful, sir."

"You will see in the medical students of Paris a different set of men to that which you have been accustomed to mix with here. There are some fine fellows among them—hard-working, bold, enterprising young men; but they are a strange body taken as a whole. Don't cotton too quickly with any one of them."

"Very well, sir."

"I am afraid you will find many highly improper notions prevalent among them—immoral, shocking, disgraceful. Pray, don't assume the manners of a Frenchman, Mr. Walpole—much less his vices. There are very few medical students in Paris who do not lead, I am sorry to say, a very disreputable life; and make it a boast to live in open shame. You must not learn to approve of conduct in Paris which you would have no hesitation in pronouncing criminal in London."*

"Certainly not, sir."

"And let me, as a friend, entreat you, my dear sir, at no time forget that you are a Christian and a Protestant gentleman. Be sober and rational, and, if there be any truth in religion at all, do not make a mockery of it, by converting the Lord's day into a monstrous Saturnalia. Here is your letter."

I took the document, bowed, and read the superscription. It was addressed to Baron F——, chief surgeon at the Hotel Dieu, &c., &c., &c.

"I introduce you, Mr. Walpole," continued the anatomist, "to one of the most extraordinary men in Europe—and, what is more to the purpose, to one of the best. Warmer benevolence, a more eager anxiety to relieve and benefit his fellow-mortals, never burned in the heart of man. He is, unquestionably, incontestably the first surgeon of the day; as a man of science he is appealed to by the whole learned world—his practice is enormous, and the fortune he has amassed by his unwearied industry and perseverance immense; especially considered in reference to the career of the most successful surgeons in Paris, who, if I mistake not, have lived and died comparatively poor. Looked up to, however, as he is by the learned and the great, you will, I think, when you know him, agree with me in regarding his kindness to the helpless—his earnest solicitude for the disabled poor who come under his care—his unremitting attention to their complaints and wants, as constituting the worthy baron's chief excellence. We are old friends; and for my sake I am sure he will receive you well, and afford you all the assistance and information in his power. He will put you on your mettle; and you must be no lie-a-bed if you would profit by his instruction. At six in the morning you will find him daily at his post in the hospital; and, while sluggards are turning in their beds, he has prescribed for a hundred sick, and put them in spirits for the day by his words of tenderness and support."

"Did you study under the baron?" I inquired.

"I attended his lectures some years ago with the greatest advantage. I never in my life was more struck by the amount of knowledge possessed by one man. I attached myself to the professor, and he was pleased to admit me to his friendship. I have lately been surprised to hear his manners pronounced rough and even brutal, and his temper morose. For my own part—and I watched him closely—I saw nothing but gentleness, and an active disposition to do good at all times. The poor women and children in the hospital loved him as a father, and I have seen their pale cheeks flush, and dull eyes glisten as he approached their beds. This, I thought, bespoke anything but roughness and brutality in the surgeon. What say you?"

* It was not until a few weeks after my arrival in Paris that I became acquainted with the fact, thus delicately pointed at by my modest friend Mr. H——. It would appear that no Parisian student of medicine can pursue his studies at home without assistance. A female friend, tutor, or whatever else she may be called, graced the lodgings of every one of my hospital friends.

"It would seem so."

"Well—I have written the baron a long letter concerning myself and my own pursuits, believing that it will serve your interests better than a mere formal letter of introduction. He will, I am sure, be pleased to see you. Remember, Mr. Walpole, an opportunity like the present may never occur to you again. Be wise, and make the most of it."

Thus spoke my friend, and thus I received from him my credentials. My only object in Paris was the ostensible one for which I came; and accordingly, therefore, having secured a comfortable home with Madame Bichat, a worthy motherly person residing in the "Rue Richelieu, vis-à-vis le Palais Royal"—and having spent one long and gossiping evening with my ancient chum M'Linnie—I buckled at once to my work. Postponing all recreation and amusement until the time should arrive which would make them lawful and give them zest, I left my lodgings the second morning after my appearance in Paris, and made my way straight to the dwelling-house of my future patron. It was eleven o'clock, the hour at which the baron usually returned from the Hotel Dieu; five hours, viz., from six till eleven, A. M., being, as M'Linnie assured me, the time allotted daily to the poor by the conscientious and distinguished practitioner.

The baron was a bachelor, and he lived in first-rate style; that is to say, he had magnificent apartments, in which it was his delight to collect occasionally the united wit and learning of the capital, and a handsome table for his friends at all times; for his hospitality was unbounded. And yet his own daily habits were as simple and primitive as might be. When at home, he passed his hours in the library, and slept in the small bedroom adjoining it. The latter, like all dormitories in France, was without a carpet, and altogether no better furnished than a private ward in an English hospital. There was a small iron bedstead just large enough for a middle-sized bachelor in one corner—a washing apparatus in another—and a table and two chairs at some distance from both. The naked and even uncomfortable aspect of this apartment had an absolutely chilling effect upon me, as I passed through it on my way to the great man himself; for, strange to say, the only road to the library was through this melancholy chamber. Great men as well as small have their "whims and oddities." The baron was reported to have taken pains to make, what appeared to me, a very inconvenient arrangement. A door which had conducted to the library upon the other side of it had been removed, and the aperture in which it had stood blocked up, while the wall on this side had been cut away in order to effect an entrance. And what was the reason assigned for so much unnecessary labor? The baron had risen from nothing—had spent his early days in poverty and even misery; and he wished to perpetuate the remembrance of his early struggles, lest he should grow proud in prosperity, and forgetful of his duties. The frequent sight of the few articles of furniture which had been his whole stock twenty years before, was likely, more than anything else, to keep the past vividly before his eyes, and he placed them therefore, to use his own words, as attributed to him by my informant, "between the flattery of the dazzling world without, and the silence of his chamber of study and meditation." They no doubt answered their object, in rendering the possessor at times low-spirited, since they were certainly likely to have that effect even upon a stranger. On the day of my introduction, however, I had little time for observation. My name had been announced, and I passed rapidly on to the sanctum sanctorum.

There is an aristocracy of MIND as well as an aristocracy of wealth and social station; and, unless you be a soulless Radical, you cannot approach a distinguished member of the order without a glow of loyal homage, as honorable to its object as it is grateful to your own self-respect. I entered the library of the far-famed professor with a reverent step; he was seated at a large table, which was literally covered with books, brochures, and letters opened and sealed. He was dressed very plainly, wearing over a suit of mourning a dark colored dressing-gown, which hung loosely about him. He was, without exception, the finest man I had ever seen, and I stopped involuntarily to look at and admire him. As he sat, I judged him to be upward of six feet in height—(I afterward learned that he stood six feet two)—he was stout and well proportioned—his chest broad and magnificent—his frame altogether muscular and sinewy. The face was full of authority and command—every feature handsome, including even the well drawn lip, in which there seemed to lurk scorn enough to wither you, if roused. The brow was full, prominent, and overhanging—the eye small, blue, and beaming with benevolence. Nature was mischievous when she brought that eye and lip in company for life. A noble forehead, made venerable by gray hairs above it—gray, although the baron was hardly in the vale of years—completed the picture which presented itself to my eye, and which I noted in detail in less time than I have drawn it here—imperfectly enough. The baron, who had received my letter of introduction on the preceding day, rose to welcome me. His first inquiries were concerning my friend H—, the next were in reference to my own plans—and he had much to say of the different professors of London, with whose works and merits he appeared thoroughly acquainted. I remained an hour with him; and some time before we parted I felt myself quite at home with my new acquaintance. During the conversation that took place upon this memorable morning, the name Z— occurred. The baron praised him highly: "his attainments as a surgeon," he said, "were very great;" and in other respects, he looked upon him as one of the most original and wisest men of the age. It will be remembered by my professional readers that Z—, although esteemed in England one of her finest surgeons, acquired an unenviable notoriety through the publication of certain physiological lectures, in which the doctrines of materialism and infidelity were supported, it must be allowed, with all the eloquence and power of a first-rate mind. With my own settled views of Christianity, early inculcated by a beloved mother—now alas! no more—I could not but regard the highly gifted Z—— as an enemy to his species, who had unhappily abused the talents which Providence had given him for a better purpose. Such being the case, it was with some pain and great surprise that I listened to the encomiums from the lips of the baron; and I ventured to hint that the speaker had, in all probability, not heard of the infamous publication which had given so much sorrow and alarm to all well-governed minds in England.

"Le voila!" said the baron in reply, taking up a book from the table—"The noblest work of the age! Free from prejudice and bigotry of every kind—I found my opinion of the man upon this book. Had he done nothing else, he would have immortalized his name. Philosophy and science have hitherto borne him out in all his theories—will continue to bear him out, and eventually compel posterity to regard him as nothing short of the prophet and seer of nature. You may rely upon it, Z—— has, by the very force of intellect, arrived at conclusions which the discoveries of centuries will duly make good and establish."

I speak the simple truth when I aver that these words of the baron gave me infinite distress, and for a moment deprived me of speech. I hardly knew what to say or do. At first I suspected that I had made some unaccountable mistake, and brought my letter to the wrong individual. H——, who was almost a Puritan in religious matters, could never have spoken of his friend in such favorable terms, if he had been aware of the views which he so unscrupulously supported. A little reflection, however, convinced me that a mistake was impossible. There is nothing in this world more embarrassing than to sit in the presence of a superior, and be compelled to listen to statements which you feel to be false, and yet know not how with propriety to repel. My own youth, and the baron's profound learning and attainments, were barriers to the free expression of my thoughts; and yet I was ashamed to remain silent, and, as it were, a consenting party to the utterance of sentiments which I abhorred.

"I cannot hope," I managed to say at last, "that science will ultimately uphold his arguments, and prevent our relying as strongly as ever upon our old foundations."

"And why?" replied the baron quickly. "Why should we always be timid and blind followers of the blind? Is it a test of wisdom to believe what is opposed to reason, upon the partial evidence of doubtful witnesses? Is it weakness to engage all the faculties of the mind in the investigation of the laws by which this universe is governed? And if the perception of such immutable and eternal laws crushes and brings to nothing the fables of men whom you are pleased to call writers by inspiration, are we to reject them because our mothers and fathers, who were babes and sucklings at the breast of knowledge, were ignorant of their existence?"

"Newton, sir," I ventured to answer, "made great discoveries, and he revered these fables."

"Bah! Newton directed his gaze upward into a mighty and stupendous region, and he was awestricken—as who shall not be!—by what he there beheld. He worshipped the unseen power, so does this man; he believed in Revelation, so does he; but with him, it is the revelation which is made in that wondrous firmament above, and in the earth beneath, and in the glories that surround us. What knowledge had Newton of geology? what of chemistry? what of the facts which they have brought to light?"

"Little, perhaps—yet!"——

"My good friend," continued the surgeon, interrupting me, "in the days of your grand philosophie—would that he were alive now!—there were no physical phenomena to reduce an ancient system of cosmogony to a mere absurdity—no palpable evidences of the existence of this earth thousands of years prior to its formation—you perceive?"

"I hear you, sir," I answered, gaining courage, "but I should, indeed, be sorry to adopt your views."

"Of course you would!" said the baron, curling his inauspicious lip, and giving expression to a feeling that looked very like one of contempt and ridicule. "You come from the land of melaacholy and bile—where your holidays are fasts, and your day of rest is one of unmitigated toil. You would be sorry to forego, no doubt, the prospect of everlasting torture and eternal condemnation. Mr. Z—— is too far advanced for you, I am afraid."

At this moment there was a knock at the door leading into the bedchamber. The servant-man of the baron presented himself, and announced a patient.

"Admit him," said the surgeon, and at the same time I rose to depart.

"Adieu!" said the baron, with an unpleasant smile; "we shall be very good friends notwithstanding your piety. I shall look after you. Remember six o'clock to-morrow morning at the Hotel Dieu. Be punctual, and do you hear, Mr. Walpole, think of me in your prayers."

This last expression, accompanied as it was by a very significant look, amounted to a positive insult; and I quitted the library and house of the baron, fully resolved never to set foot in either of them again. What an extraordinary delusion did poor H—— labor under, in respect to the character of his friend! Here was a Mentor to form the opinions, and regulate the conduct of a young gentleman stepping into life! Great as were his talents and acquirements, and much as I might lose by neglecting to cultivate his friendship, I resigned gladly every advantage rather than purchase the greatest, with the sacrifice of the principles which had been so anxiously implanted in my bosom, even from my cradle. I was hurt and vexed at the result of my interview. Everything had promised so well at first. I had been won by the appearance of the baron; I had been charmed with his discourse, and gratified by the terms in which he spoke of my future studies, and the help he hoped to afford me in the prosecution of them. Why had this unfortunate Mr. Z——, and his still more unfortunate book, turned up to discompose the pleasant vision? But for the mention of his name, and the introduction of his book, I might have remained forever in ignorance of the atheistical opinions which, in my estimation, derogated materially from the grace which otherwise adorned the teacher's cultivated mind. It is impossible for communion and hearty fellowship to subsist between individuals, whose notions on life's most important point, lie "far as the poles asunder." I did not expect, desire, or propose to seek that they should.

In the evening I joined M'Linnie at his lodgings, and gave him an account of the meeting. He laughed at me for my scruples.

"I knew all about it," said Mac, "but hardly thought it worth while to let you know it. H—— was quite right, too : the baron is not the man to-day that he was a dozen years ago. He is a rank infidel now ; he makes no secret of the thing, but boasts of it right and left : it is his great fault. He is an inconsistent fellow. If any one talks about religion, no matter how proper and fitting the time, he is down upon him at once with a sneer and a joke ; and yet he drags in his own opinions by the neck, at all seasons, on all occasions, and expects you to say amen to every syllable he utters."

"He must be very weak," said I.

"Must he?—very well. Then wait till you see him cut for calculus, or perform for hernia. Sit with him at the bedside, and hear him at his lectures. If you think him weak then, you shall be good enough to tell me what you call strong."

"But his principles——"

"Are certainly not in accordance with the Thirty-nine Articles ; but the baron does not profess to teach theology—nor did I come here to take his creed. So long as he is orthodox in surgery, I make no complaint against him. I have my own views ; and if they are relaxed and out of order now and then, why, the parson is the man to apply to, and not the baron. I must say one requires a dose of steel now and then, to keep right and tight in this bewitching capital."

There was worldly wisdom in the remarks of M'Linnie ; and before I quitted him I was satisfied of the propriety of paying every attention to the professional instruction of the surgeon, without committing myself, by visiting him as a friend, to an approval of his detestable principles ; and accordingly, at two minutes to six o'clock, I presented myself at the hospital on the following morning. Many students were already in attendance, and precisely at six o'clock the baron himself appeared. He bowed to the students as a body, and honored me with a particular notice.

"Eh bien, jeune Chrétien !" he said, shaking me by the hand, "have you prayed for my reformation ? It is very remiss of you if you have not done so. You know I made you yesterday my father-confessor."

There was immediately a general laugh from the students—medical students being, it should be known, the most unblushing parasites on record.

These words were spoken under the low portico of the building which forms, with its long ascent of steps, one side of the square in which the Cathedral of Notre-Dame has its principal entrance, and is certainly not one of the least interesting adjuncts of that magnificent edifice. We passed without further speech through the range of buildings within, the professor in our van, and in a minute or two found ourselves in a spacious, clean, and well-filled ward.

The surgeon took his seat at the foot of the first bed in the sick chamber, and the students crowded eagerly around him, evidently anxious not to lose a syllable that should fall from his lips. I shall never forget the lesson of that morning. The judgment, the penetration, the unflinching collectedness, and consummate skill of the surgeon, compelled my warmest admiration. I forgot our ground of disagreement in the transcendent ability that I beheld. His heart, and mind, and soul, were given up to his profession ; and his success was adequate to the price paid for its purchase. The baron was, however, a mass of contradiction. I discovered this before we had been an hour in the ward. It was clear that he had risen by the sheer strength of great natural genius, and that he was lamentably wanting in all the agreeable qualities which spring from early cultivation and sound training. He was violent, sudden, and irregular in his temper and mode of speaking—when his temper and speech were directed against any but his patients. He had no regard for the feelings of men of his own rank ; and his language towards them was rather emphatic, than delicate and well-chosen. In his progress round the ward, he came to the bed of a man suffering from a diseased leg. He removed the bandage from the part, and asked, "what fool had tied it up so clumsily ;" the fool, as he well knew, being the house-surgeon at his side. Again, another practitioner at the hospital recommended a particular treatment in a particular case. This gentleman, the baron's colleague, was referred to as—"a child who had yet to learn the alphabet of surgery—who would have been laughed at twenty years ago, had he prescribed such antiquated nostrums—a weak child—a mere baby, gentlemen."—"How much !" I exclaimed mentally, time after time, "must this man have altered since H—— parted with him as his respected friend !" And yet in some regards he was not altered at all. There was the same consideration for the poor sufferers—the same attention to their many complaints and wants—the same tenderness and kind disposition to humor and pacify them, which H—— had dwelt upon with so much commendation. There was no hurrying from case to case—no sign of impatience at the reiterated unmeaning queries of the patients—no coarse jest at their expense—not a syllable that could wound the susceptibility of the most sensitive. Did one poor fellow betray an anxiety to take up as little of the baron's time as possible, and, speaking hurriedly, almost exhaust his little stock of feeble breath—it was absolutely touching to mark the happy mode in which the surgeon put the hurried one at his ease. Had these creatures, paupers as they were, been rich and noble—had they, strangers as they were, been brothers every one, he could not have evinced a tenderer interest on their behalf—a stronger disposition to do them service. In spite of myself, I loved the baron for condescending to these men of low estate.

It will not be necessary to dwell upon the proceedings of the place : I could extract from my notebook pages that would delight the medical reader, necessarily dry and tedious to the uninitiated. Suffice it to say, that many hours were spent in the surgical wards by this indefatigable surgeon : every individual case received his best attention, and was prescribed for as carefully as though a noble fee waited upon each. The ceremony being at an end, I was about to retire, agreeably surprised and gratified with all that I had seen.

"Arrêtez donc," said the baron, noticing my movement, and touching me upon the arm. "You are not fatigued ?"

"Not in the least," I answered.

"Come with me, then."

The baron, full of life and spirits, and with the air of a man whose day's work was only about to commence, bowed to the students, and tripped quickly down stairs. I followed as commanded, and the next moment I was in the baron's cabriolet, driving with that gentleman rapidly through the streets of Paris.

"Have you courage !" inquired the baron, suddenly.

"For what, sir !" I replied.

"To see an operation."

"I have been present at many, sir," said I—"some bad enough, too; and, I confess, I have been less womanish and weak beholding them than I felt this morning, witnessing your kindness to those poor creatures."

"Ah, poor creatures, indeed!" repeated the baron in a softer tone than any I had heard him use. "The poor need kindness, Mr. Walpole. It is all we can do for them. God help them! it is little of that they get. Poverty is a frightful thing, sir."

There were two circumstances that especially struck me in the delivery of this short speech. One was, that the eyes of an intrepid operator filled with tears while he adverted to a very commonplace subject; the other, that a confirmed atheist was inconsistent enough to invoke the Deity whose very existence he denied.

We drove on, and arrived at the hotel of one of the richest and most influential noblemen of France. The cabriolet stopped, and the gates of the hotel were thrown open at the same instant. A lackey, in the hall of the mansion, was already waiting for the baron, and we were bowed with much ceremony up the gilded staircase; we reached, at last, a sumptuously furnished chamber, where we found three gentlemen in earnest conversation. They were silent upon our entrance, and advanced, one and all, with great cordiality to salute the baron. The latter returned their salute with a distant and haughty politeness, which I thought very unbecoming.

"We were thinking——" began one of the party.

"How is the patient?" asked the baron, suddenly interrupting him.

The other shook his head despondingly, and the baron, as it were instinctively, unlocked a case of instruments, which he had brought into the room with him from his cabriolet.

"The inflammation has not subsided, then?"

"No."

"All the symptoms as before?"

"All."

"Let us see him."

The gentleman and the baron opened a door and passed into another room. As the door closed after them, I heard a loud and dismal groan. One of the two remaining gentlemen then asked me if I had been long in Paris.

I told him.

"Ah, you have n't seen the new opera, then?" said he—just as we should say, when put to it for conversation, What frightful, or what beautiful weather this is! Before I could reply, there was another fearful groan from the adjoining room, but my new acquaintance proceeded without noticing it.

"You have nothing like our Académie in London, I believe?"

I was about to vindicate the Italian Opera, when the two surgeons again appeared. The baron in a few words said, that there was nothing to be done but to operate, and at once, if the life of the patient were to be spared at all. The three practitioners—for such they were—bowed in acquiescence, and the baron prepared his instruments.

It is the fashion to speak of medical men slightly, if not reproachfully; to accuse them of practising solemn impositions, and of being, at the best, so many legalized charlatans. It is especially the mode of speaking among those who will give "the doctor" no rest, and are not satisfied until they make that functionary the most constant visitor at their abodes. No one would have dared to breathe against the surgeon's sacred office, who could have seen, as I did, the operation which the baron performed this day. It has been done successfully three times within the memory of man; twice by himself, who first attempted it. It was grand to mark his calm and intellectual face—to see the hand—armed with the knife that cut for life or death—firm and unshaken as the mind that urged, the eye that followed, its unerring course. I could understand the worship that was paid to this incomparable master, by all that knew him. Within five minutes by the clock, and in the sight of men whose breathless admiration made them oblivious of the throes of the poor sufferer, the process was completed, and the endangered life restored. The baron left the fainting invalid, retired for a few seconds, and prescribed. He returned and felt his pulse—and then, turning to the man to whom he had first spoken, said:

"Should anything arise, sir, you will acquaint me with it."

"Unquestionably. He will do well!"

"No doubt of it. Good morning."

"Good morning baron," said the gentleman, obsequiously. "His excellency bore it wonderfully."

"Pretty well for an excellency. We don't notice these things in paupers. Now, Mr. Walpole."

And thereupon the baron turned upon his heels with such manifest disdain, that he lost half the credit which he had gained by his previous performance.

We sat for some time silent in the cabriolet. I was bursting to praise the baron, and yet fearful to speak, lest I should be insulted for my pains. At last, I became so excited that I could hold out no longer.

"Baron," said I, "I beg your pardon—it was the grandest thing I ever saw."

"I have seen a grander," said the surgeon, frowning, and pursing those unhappy lips of his again, "much grander, Mr. Walpole. I have seen a nobleman rolling in riches, flattered by his dogs, renowned for his Christian piety, refusing the supplications of a poor boy, who asked only a few coins to carry him through a cold and killing winter. The refusal might have been the lad's death—but he was refused. It was, as you say, a grand thing, but the lad has had his revenge to-day."

The baron drove to his own home. At his request I entered his library with him. He placed some books in my hand, which he believed would be of service to me; and, as we parted, he said kindly:

"Don't mind my rough ways, Mr. Walpole; I was educated in a rough school. I shall be glad to see you often. I have been disturbed. The father of that man, whose life, I verily believe, I have saved this day, hunted me many years ago from his door when I begged from him—condescended to beg from him—alms which his meanest servant would not have missed, and which I wanted, to save me from absolute starvation. I have never forgotten or forgiven him for the act—but I have had my revenge. This great man's son owes his life to the beggar after all. A good revenge, n'est-ce pas?"

I was very much disposed to consider the baron subject to fits of temporary derangement: but I was wise enough to do nothing more than nod my head in answer to this appeal, leaving my questioner to interpret the action as he in his madness might think proper.

There was a hearty shake of the hand, another general invitation to his house, and a particular invitation to the hospital, where, as the baron very reasonably observed, "All the knowledge that could serve a man in after life was hoarded up"—and then I made my bow, and took my departure.

Three months passed like so many days, in the midst of occupation at once the most inspiring and satisfactory; and during the whole of that period, I am bound to acknowledge the treatment of the baron toward me to have been most generous and kind. In spite of my own resolutions, I had attached myself to the professor by a feeling of gratitude, which it was not easy to extinguish or control. His wish to advance me in the knowledge and understanding of my profession was so earnest, the pains he took to communicate the most important results of his own hard-earned experience so untiring, that, had I not felt a heavy debt of obligation, I must have been a senseless underserving wretch indeed. The baron was manifestly well-disposed toward me, and in spite (it might have been with so strange a character, by very reason) of our religious differences, he lost no opportunity of bringing me to his side, and of loading me while there with precious gifts. I attended the professor at the hospital, at the houses of his patients, in his own private study.

He was flattering enough to say that he liked to have me about him—that he was pleased with my straightforward character, and with the earnestness with which I worked. I trust it was not his good opinion alone that induced me, in opposition to my first resolution, by degrees to associate with the baron, until at length we became intimate and almost inseparable friends. I would not acknowledge this to my own conscience, which happily never suffered me to violate a principle, or yield an inch of righteous ground. The baron persevered in his attacks upon our sacred religion. I, grown bolder by long familiar acquaintance, acted as firmly upon the defensive: and I must do myself the justice to assert, that the soundness of fair argument suffered no injury from the light weapon of wit and ridicule which my friend had ever at command.

It was a fine morning in the early spring, and I sat with the baron as usual in his library. On this occasion I was helping him in the completion of a series of plates, which he was about to publish, in connection with a work on cancer—a book that has since made a great sensation upon the continent. The engraver had worked from the professor's preparations under the eye of the latter; but a few slight inaccuracies had crept into the drawings, and the baron employed me in the detection of them. We were both fully occupied; I with the engravings; he with his lecture of the day—and we were both very silent, when we heard a loud ringing of the porter's bell. The baron at the same time looked at his watch, and resumed his pen. A note was then brought to him by his servant. It was read, and an answer given.

"Say I will be there at four o'clock."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the servant, "but the prince's chasseur who gave me the note, desired me to add that the prince wished to see you immediately."

"Very well, sir," answered the baron haughtily. "He has delivered his master's message—do you deliver mine. I am busy, very busy—and cannot see the prince till four o'clock. That is the answer."

The servant knew his master, and left the room immediately.

"These insufferable nobles!" exclaimed the baron; "they imagine that mankind was invented for their pleasure and amusement—to be their footballs. Does this man think we have nothing better to do than to humor his fancies, and attend to every ailment that waits upon his gross appetite. He makes a god of his belly, is punished for his idolatry, and then whines by the hour to his doctor."

"Is he not ill, then?" I inquired.

"He may be—but that is no reason why my students are to be neglected for a prince. He must come in his turn, with all the rest. I allow no distinctions in my practice. Suffering is suffering—the pain of the peasant is as acute as the smart of the king. Proceed with the drawings, Mr. Walpole."

In less than a quarter of an hour, there was a fresh disturbance. The servant knocked softly at the door, and entered timidly.

"Here is a dirty woman at the gate, sir," began the man. "I have told her that you were engaged and could n't speak to her, but she would not move until I had brought you this letter. She is a dirty creature, sir."

"Well, you have said that once before," answered the baron, taking the note—if a soiled strip of paper, with blots, erasures, and illegible characters may deserve that title. The baron endeavored to read it; but failing, requested François to show the poor woman up.

She appeared, and justified the repetition of François. She was indeed very far from being clean; she had scarcely a rag upon her back—and seemed, in every way, much distressed.

"Now, my good woman," said the professor very tenderly, "tell me what it is you want, as quickly as you are able to do it, and I will help you if it be in my power."

The woman, bursting into tears, proceeded to say that "she resided in the Quartier St. Jacques—that her husband was a water-carrier."

"A what?" asked the professor quickly, as if he had missed the word.

"A water-carrier, sir."

"Go on."

"That he had come from Auvergne—had fallen into a dreadful state of disease through want of nourishment and fuel during the winter—that he was now lying without a crust of bread or a particle of fire—and that she was sure he must die, leaving her and her children to be thrown into the world. She filled up her short narrative with many harrowing details, and finished by imploring the surgeon to come and save her husband if he could. "We will pay you, sir, all that we are able—if he gets to work again: and if he should n't, God, I am sure, will not listen to your prayers the less because you have helped the unfortunate and the poor."

Before the woman had told her story, the cheeks of the baron were as pale as her own—his eyes scarcely less moist. He had put his hand to his pocket, and when the woman ceased—he drew it out again, and presented her with a crown-piece.

"Go home," said he, "with that. Buy bread and fuel. I will be at your lodging this afternoon."

The woman was about to exclaim.

"Not a syllable!" said her benefactor, preventing her. "If you thank me, I will do nothing for you. Go your ways now. I cannot accompany you—for you see I am very busy; but before the day is out, I will prescribe for your goodman. Good-by to you—good-by."

The woman went away without another word.

Before she reached the bottom of the stairs, the baron spoke.

"Mr. Walpole—pray be kind enough to call her back!"

She came:

"You must not think me harsh now," proceeded the baron, by way of apology, "I did not wish to be so. I shall do all I can for you, and your husband will no doubt be soon quite well again. There, keep your spirits up, and go home and cheer the good fellow. I shall see you by-and-by—Adieu, ma chère."

The professor continued his lecture; but not for five minutes before he appeared to be very uneasy at his work. He put his pen down, and sat for a time full of thought; then he rose and paced the room, and then took up his pen again; at last, he started from his chair and pulled the bell.

"François," said he to the servant, "let the cabriolet be here immediately. Yes," he continued, as if speaking to himself, "it will be better to go at once; the man may be seriously ill. His life may be in danger. It can be done in an hour—there is plenty of time still for the lecture. We must go and see this poor fellow, Mr. Walpole," added the professor, addressing me. "Come, you shall give me your opinion of the case."

And the lecture and the engravings were neglected, and we dashed through the streets toward the Quartier St. Jacques, with every chance of breaking our own necks as well as that of the spirited animal that flew before the whip of the excited practitioner.

"Well," said I to myself as we alighted, "it may be, monsieur le baron, as you state it, 'the pain of the peasant is as acute as the smart of a king.' It is, however, very certain that you do not hold to the converse of the position."

The water-carrier was in truth alarmingly ill, and he was not likely to remain so much longer, if left to himself; for it was already the eleventh hour with him. He was living in a filthy hole—lying on a bed of straw, without the commonest necessities of life. The man had become diseased through want and confinement—that cause and origin of half the complaints to which the human frame is subject; lack of wholesome food and pure air. The baron perceived instantly that nothing could be done for the unhappy fellow in his present abode, and he therefore insisted upon his being removed at once to a maison de santé.

"I can't walk," said the man gruffly.

"No, but you can be carried in a coach, I suppose," replied the baron in a similar tone, "if I wish it. Let him be dressed," he continued, turning to the wife. "I will send a coach for him in half an hour—and take charge of him until he is better. That will buy you some bread for the present," and he gave another crown and hastened away. In the afternoon the baron attended the patient again at the maison de santé. He ordered him a bath, and prescribed medicines. For a month he visited him daily; and he did not quit him until he was convalescent. Nor then—for upon the day of the poor fellow's discharge, he presented him with a horse and water-cart, and a purse containing five louis-d'or.

"Take care of the money," said the charitable donor, "do not be extravagant. If you are ill—come to me always."

The water-carrier—a bluff, sturdy fellow in his way—would have thanked the baron could he have kept quiet; but he stood roaring like a child, perfectly overcome with the kindness he had received. It was some months afterward that François announced two visitors. When they appeared I recognized my old acquaintance the water-carrier, grown hale and hearty, accompanied by a stranger, of the same condition in life as himself, and looking very ill.

"Ah! mon ami!" exclaimed the baron, shaking him by the hand, "how does the world use you?"

"Look at me," answered the carrier—"just look at me."

"Ay, ay," said the baron. "Flesh enough upon you now! Who is your friend?"

"Ah, it's about him I came! He is very ill, isn't he? He is a water-carrier, too. He was going to another doctor, but I would n't allow it. No, no—that would n't have been the thing after all you have done for me. I hope I know better. He is very bad, and has n't got a sixpence in the world."

I could not help laughing at the original display of gratitude—and the baron laughed outright; his heart grew glad within him as he answered, pressing the honest carrier's hardy hand—

"Right—right—quite right! Mon enfant, bring them all to me!"

M'Linnie, who was not honored by the baron's confidence, seemed to be well acquainted with his peculiarities. I mentioned to him his extraordinary treatment of the water-carriers, and attributed it all, without hesitation, to downright insanity.

"Not that exactly," said Mac. "It is caprice, and the inconsistency of human nature. He is strongly attached to all Auvergnats, and to water-carriers in particular. His predilection that way is well known in Paris. Perhaps his father was a water-carrier—or his first love a girl from Auvergne. Who can tell what gave rise to the partiality in a mind that is full of bias and contradiction?"

Contradiction indeed! I had remarked enough, and yet nothing at all in comparison to that which was to follow. Up to the present time I had been only puzzled and amused by the frolics and irregularities of the baron. I had yet to be staggered and confounded by the most palpable and barefaced act of inconsistency that ever lunatic conceived and executed. The winter and spring had passed, and summer came, placing our time more at our disposal. Summer is the dissector's long vacation. I permitted myself to take recreation, and to seek amusement in the many public resorts of this interesting capital. One morning I attended the baron at the hospital, and returned with him to his abode. We sat together for an hour, and I distinctly remember that on this occasion the unbeliever was even more witty than usual on the subject which he was ever ready to introduce, with, I am sorry to say, no better object than that of turning it into ridicule and contempt. I left him, irritated and annoyed at his behavior, and tried to forget it in the crowds of people who were thronging the gay streets on one of the gayest mornings of the year. I hardly know why I directed my steps toward the Place St. Sulpice, or why, having reached it, I lingered, gazing at the church which has its site there. I had a better reason for quitting it with precipitation; for while I stood musing, I became suddenly aware of the presence of my friend the baron. He did not see me, and I was not anxious to begin de novo the disagreeable discussion of the morning. As I turned away from the church, however, I looked instinctively back, and was much surprised to behold the baron glancing very suspiciously about him, and appearing most anxious to avoid public observation. I was mentally debating whether such was really the fact, or whether the idea was suggested by my own clandestine movement, when to my unaffected astonishment the baron put an end to all doubt by making one rapid march toward the church, and then rushing in—looking neither to the right nor left, behind nor before him. This was truly too extraordinary a circumstance to witness without further inquiry. I immediately retraced my steps, and followed the atheist into the house, where surely he could have no business to transact. If my surprise had been great without the sacred edifice, what was it within, and at that particular portion of it known by the designation of the Chapel of the Virgin Mary, at which I beheld, questioning my own senses, my unaccountable friend, this exceedingly erratic baron—upon his knees—in solemn prayer! Yes, kneeling in low humility, and praying audibly, with a devotion and awful earnestness that could not be surpassed. He remained upon his knees, and persevered in his prayers until the conclusion of the service, and then he bestowed his alms—performing all things with an expression of countenance and gravity of demeanor, such as I knew him to wear only at the table upon which he had achieved the most celebrated of his surgical victories.

"Mad, mad!" I exclaimed aloud, "nothing short of it." Why, such glaring wholesale hypocrisy had not been committed since Satan first introduced the vice into Paradise. What atrocity, what barefaced blasphemy! It was the part of a Christian and a friend to attribute the extravagant proceedings of the baron to absolute insanity, and to nothing else; and I did so accordingly, alarmed for the safety of the unfortunate professor, and marvelling what unheard-of act would next be perpetrated, rendering it incumbent upon society to lock the lunatic up for life. Why, his lips were hardly relieved of the pollution which had fallen from them in my presence; and could he in his senses, with his reason not unhinged, dare to offend his Maker doubly by the mockery of such prayers as he could offer up! What was his motive—what his end? That he was anxious for concealment was evident. Had he courted observation, I might have supposed him actuated by some far-sighted scheme of policy; and yet his rash and straightforward temperament rendered him incapable of any stratagem whatever. No, no—look at the thing as I would, there was no accounting for this most perplexing anomaly except on the ground of mental infirmity. Alas, poor baron!

When the service was at an end, I took up a position in the street near the church, in order to observe the next movement of the devotee, quite prepared for anything that might happen. I was disappointed. The baron, looking very cheerful and very happy, made his appearance from the temple which he had so recently profaned, and walked steadily and quietly away. I followed him, and in the excitement of the moment was about to approach and accost him, when he suddenly turned into a narrow lane, and I lost sight of him.

Before I saw the baron again, I had made up my mind to keep my own counsel, and to give him no hint of my having discovered and watched him. The reasons for silence were twofold. First, I hoped, by keeping my eye on the professor, to learn more of his character than I yet knew; and, in the second place, I did not wish to be regarded as a spy by an individual of violent passions, whom I could not conscientiously consider responsible for his actions.

It so happened that on the evening of this very day, the baron held a conversazione in his rooms, to which the first people of Paris, both in rank and talent, were invited. I, who had the entrée, was present of course, and I was likewise among the first of the arrivals. With me, the chief physician of the Hotel Dieu entered the salon.

The surgeon and the physician shook hands; and, after a word or two, the latter asked abruptly—

"By the way, baron, what were you doing at St. Sulpice this morning? I saw you quitting the church."

"Oh!" said the baron, without changing color or moving a muscle, although I blushed at his side to my very forehead; "Oh! a sick priest placed under my care by the Duchess d'Angoulême—nothing more."

"Well, I could hardly believe that you had turned saint—that is the truth."

"Not yet—not yet!" added the baron, laughing out. "This is to be the saint," he continued, tapping me on the shoulders. "St. Walpole! That will look very fine in the calendar! However, my friend, if they attempt to canonize you while I live, I'll act the part of devil's advocate, and contest your right of admission, if it is only to punish you for your opposition to me in this world. So take care of yourself, and read up your divinity."

And with these words the unmitigated hypocrite, chuckling at my apparent confusion, advanced to the door, and welcomed his crowding visitors.

Upon the following day, I repaired to St. Sulpice—but I did not see the baron. I went again and again, with no better success. For a week I attended the service daily—still no baron. Afterward I went twice a-week. At the end of two months I contented myself with one visit weekly; still no baron. I did not like to give up the watch. I could not tell why I felt sure of meeting with him again; yet so I felt, and I was curious to know how far he carried his madness, and what object he proposed to himself in the prosecution and indulgence of his monomania. Three months elapsed, and I was at length paid for my perseverance. For a second time I saw the baron enter the church—assist devoutly at the celebration of mass at the chapel of the Virgin Mary—repeat his prayers, and offer up his alms. There was the same solemnity of bearing during the ceremony, the same cheerful self-possession at its completion. A more methodical madness there could not be! I was determined this time not to lose sight of my gentleman, without obtaining at least a clue to his extraordinary behavior. As soon as the service was over, he prepared for his departure. Before he could quit the church, however, I crossed it unperceived by him, and walked straight up to the sacristan.

"Who is that gentleman?" I asked, pointing to the surgeon.

"Monsieur F——," he answered readily enough—so readily, that I hardly knew what to ask next. "A regular attendant, sir," the sacristan continued, in an impressive tone of approbation.

"Indeed!" said I.

"Ay. I have been here twelve years next Easter, and four times regularly every year has monsieur come to hear this mass."

"It is very strange!" I said speaking to myself.

"Not at all," said the sacristan. "It is very natural, seeing that he is himself the founder of it."

Worse and worse! The inconsistency of the reviler of things sacred was becoming more barefaced and unpardonable. "Let him taunt me again!" I exclaimed, walking homeward! "Let him mock me for my childish notions, as he calls them, and attempt to be facetious at the expense of all that is holy, and good, and consolatory in life. Let him attempt it, and I will annihilate him with a word!" When, however, I grew more collected, I began to understand how, by such proceeding, I might shoot very wide of my mark, and gave my friend an advantage after all. He had explained his presence at the church to his colleague by attributing it to a visit paid to a sick priest there. He should have no opportunity to prevaricate, if I once challenged him. Now, he might have the effrontery to deny what I had seen with my own eyes, and could swear to. By lying in wait for him again, and accosting him while he was in the very act of perpetrating his solemn farce, I should deprive him of all power of evasion and escape. And so I determined it should be.

In the mean while I kept my own counsel, and went on as usual. I learned from the sacristan, when the baron was next expected at the mass, and, until that day, did not present myself again at the Place St. Sulpice. Before that time arrived, there arose a touching incident, which, as leading to important consequences, deserves especial notice.

It was growing late one evening of this same summer—the surgeon was fatigued with the labors of the day—I was on the point of leaving him—he of retiring to rest, when François announced a stranger. An old man appeared. He was short, and very thin; his cheeks were pale—his hair hoary. Benignity beamed in his countenance, on which traces of suffering lingered, not wholly effaced by piety and resignation. There was an air of sweetness and repose about the venerable stranger, that at the first sight gained your respect, if not regard. When he entered the apartment he bowed with ceremony—and then waited timidly for countenance from the baron.

"What is the matter with you?" asked the surgeon, roughly.

"Allow me to be seated," said the stranger, drawing his breath with difficulty, and speaking with a weak and tremulous voice. "I am very tired."

The baron, as if rebuked, rose instantly and gave his visitor a chair.

"I am very old," continued the latter, "and my poor legs are weary."

"What ails you?"

"Permit me," said the stranger. "I am the priest of a small village very far from Paris."

"Humph!" ejaculated the surgeon.

"Two years ago I had a swelling in my neck, which the doctor of our village thought of no importance; but it burst at last, and for a long time I was kept to my bed, a useless, idle man. With four parishes and no assistant, there lay a heavy weight upon my conscience—but God is good, sir—"

"Show me your throat!" exclaimed the baron, interrupting him.

"And my people, too," proceeded the old man, preparing to obey the surgeon's command—"my people were very considerate and kind. When I got a little better, they offered, in order to lighten my labors, to come to one church every Sunday. But it was not fair, sir. They are working men, and have much to do, and Sunday is their only day of rest. It was not right that so many should resign their comfort for the sake of one; and I could not bear to think of it."

All this was uttered with such perfect natural simplicity, that it was impossible not to feel at once great interest in the statement of the speaker. My attention was riveted. Not so the baron's, who answered with more impatience than he had ever used toward the water-carriers—

"Come to the point, sir."

"I was coming, sir," replied the old priest, mildly; "I trust I don't fatigue you. While I was in doubt as to what it was best to do, a friend strongly recommended me to come to Paris, and to consult you. It was a thing to consider, sir. A long journey, and a great expense! We have many poor in our district, and it is not lawful to cast away money that rightfully belongs to them. But, when I became reduced as you see me, I could not regard the money as thrown away on such an errand; and so I came. I arrived only an hour ago, and have not delayed an instant."

The surgeon, affecting not to listen to the plaintive recital of the poor priest, proceeded very carefully to examine his disease. It was an alarming one; indeed, of so aggravated a character, that it was astonishing to see the sufferer alive after all that he must have undergone in its progress.

"This disease must kill you," said the baron—brutally, I thought, considering the present condition of the man, his distance from home, friends, and all the natural ties that render calamity less frightful and insupportable. I would gladly have said a word to soften the pain which the baron had inflicted; but it would have been officious, and might have given offence.

The old priest, however, expressed no anxiety or regret upon hearing the verdict pronounced against him. With a firm and quiet hand he replaced the bandages, and he then drew a coarse bag from his pocket, from which he extracted a five franc piece.

"This is," he said calmly, "a very trifling fee, indeed, for the opinion of so celebrated a surgeon; but, as I have told you, sir, the necessities of my poor are great. I cannot afford to spend more upon this worthless carcass. I am very grateful to you for your candor, sir. It will be my own fault now, if I die unprepared."

"It is the profession of a priest," said the baron, "to affect stoicism. You do not feel it."

"I do not, sir," replied the man respectfully. "I did not hear the awful truth you just now told me as a stoic would. Pardon me for saying, that it might have been communicated less harshly and abruptly to a weak old man; I do not wish to speak offensively?"

The baron blushed for shame.

"I am a human being, sir," continued the priest, "and must feel as other men. Death is a terrible abyss between earth and heaven; but the land is not the less lovely beyond it."

"You speak as you were taught?" said the baron.

"Yes."

"And as you teach?"

"Yes."

"And you profess to feel all this?"

"I profess to be an humble minister of Christ—imperfect enough, Heaven knows, sir! I ask your pardon for complaining at your words. They did not shock me very much. How should they, when I came expecting them! Farewell, sir; I will return to Auvergne, and die in the midst of my people."

"Stay!" exclaimed the baron, touched and softened by one magical word. "Come back! I admire your calmness—I respect your powers of endurance. Can you trust them to the end?"

"I am frail, and very weak, sir," replied the priest. "I would bear much to save my life. I do not wish to die. I have many things unfinished yet."

"Listen to me. There is but one means of saving you; and mark—that perhaps may fail—a long, painful, and, it may be, unsuccessful operation. Are you prepared to run the risk?"

"Is there a chance, sir?"

"Yes—but a remote one. Were I the priest of Auvergne I would take that chance."

"It is enough, sir," said the old man. "Let it be done. I will undergo it, with the help of God, as their pastor should, for the sake of my dear children in Auvergne."

The baron sat at his desk, and wrote a few lines—

"Present this note," said he, "at the Salle St. Agnes in the Hotel Dieu. Go at once. The sisters there will see that you want for nothing. Take rest for a day or two, and I will see what afterward may be done for you."

The priest thanked the baron many times for his kindness—bowed respectfully, and retired. The free-thinking surgeon sat for a few minutes after his departure, silent and thoughtful.

"Happy man!" he exclaimed at last, sighing as the words escaped him.

"Happy, sir?" said I, inquiringly.

"Yes! happy, Mr. Walpole. False and fabulous as the system is on which he builds, is he not to be envied for the faith that buoys him up so well through the great sea of trouble, as your poet justly calls this pitiable world! Could one purchase this all-powerful faith, what price would be too dear for such an acquisition? Who would not give all that he possesses here to grasp that hope and anchor?"

"And yet, sir, you might have it. The gift is freely offered, and you spurn it."

"No such thing!" replied the surgeon hastily. "I may not have it. This weak yet amiable priest is content to take for granted what every rational mind rejects without fair proofs. He receives as a postulate that which I must have demonstrated. I try to solve the problem, and the first links of the argument lead to an absurdity."

"The weak man, then, has reason to be thankful?" said I.

"Ay, ay! I grant you that. He cannot tell how much!"

"How differently, sir, do things appear to different men! The very endurance of this old man, founded as it is upon his faith, is to me proof sufficient of the truth and heavenly origin of that faith."

"You talk, Mr. Walpole, like a schoolboy, who knows nothing of religion out of his catechism—and nothing out of the world beyond his school walls. If the ability to bear calamity with fortitude shall decide the genuineness of the creed, then is your North American Indian or Hindoo nearer truth and heaven than the Christian. So much for your 'proof sufficient,' as you term it."

This discussion, like all the rest, for all useful purposes, ended as it began, leaving us both just where it had found us—our tempers rather than our views suffering in the conflict. Two or three times I was tempted to rattle out a volley of indignation at his amazing and unparalleled effrontery, and of calling him to an account for his turpitude; but my better judgment withheld me, bidding me reserve my blows until they should fall unerringly and fatally upon his defenceless head.

In the mean while the good old priest carried his mild and resigned spirit with him into the hospital. He was received with kindness, and treated with especial care, chiefly on account of the recommendation of the baron, who was interested in the unfortunate pastor to a greater extent than he cared to acknowledge. The day for the operation—postponed from time to time—at length arrived. It was performed. The process was long and painful, but the patient never uttered a complaint; his cries were wrung from him in the extremity of torture and physical helplessness. The result was successful. One knew not which to admire the most—the Christian magnanimity of the patient, or the triumphant skill of the operator; both were perfect. When the anxious scene was over, the surgeon shook the priest by the hand tenderly and encouragingly, and with his handkerchief wiped the sweat-drops from his aged brow. He saw him afterward carefully removed to his bed, and for half an hour watched at his side, until, exhausted, the sufferer fell asleep. During the slow recovery of the invalid, his bed was the first visited by the surgeon in his daily rounds. He lingered there long after his services were needed, and listened with the deepest attention to the accounts which the priest gave of his mode of life, and of the condition of his dear flock, far away in Auvergne. When at length the convalescent man was able to quit his bed, the baron, to the surprise of all who knew him, would take him by the arm, and give him his support, as the enfeebled creature walked slowly up and down the ward. It was the feeling act of an affectionate son. Then the surgeon made eager inquiries, which the priest as eagerly answered; and they grew as friendly as though they had been well acquainted from their infancy. Weeks passed away; the priest was at last discharged, cured; and, with prayers mingling with tears of gratitude, he took leave of his benefactor, and returned in joy to his native village.

It was exactly a week after his departure, that the day arrived upon which the sacristan led me to expect a meeting with the baron at the church of Saint Sulpice. Resolved to confront this incarnation of contradiction at the very scene of his unseemly vagaries, I did not fail to be punctual. As I entered the street, I espied the baron a few yards before me, walking briskly toward the entrance of the sacred building. I followed him. He hurried into the church, and took his accustomed place. I kept close upon him; and, with a fluttering heart, seated myself at his side. My cheek burned with nervous agitation, but I did not look toward my adversary. His eye, however, was upon me. I felt it, and was sensible of his steady, long, and, as it seemed, passionless gaze. He did not move, or betray any symptom of surprise. As on the previous occasions, he proceeded solemnly to prayer; and when the ceremony was completed, he, as usual, offered up his alms. As the service drew to its close, my own anxiety became intense, and my situation almost insupportable. He rose—I did the same;—he walked leisurely away—I, giddy with the excitement, reeled after him. I was not to be shaken from my purpose, and I accosted him on the church's threshold.

"Baron!" I exclaimed.

"Mr. Walpole!" he replied, perfectly unmoved.

"I am surprised to see you here, sir."

"You are not," answered the baron, still more placidly; "you came expressly to meet me; you have been here twice before. Why do you desire to hide that fact? Can a Christian, Mr. Walpole, play the hypocrite as well as other men?"

"I cannot understand you," I said, bewildered by his imperturbable coolness; "you laugh at religion—you mock me for respecting it, and yet you come here for prayer. You do not believe in God, and you assist devoutly at mass!"

"It is a lovely morning, Mr. Walpole—we have half an hour to spare—give me your arm!"

Perfectly puzzled and confounded by the collected manner of the baron, I placed my arm mechanically in his, and suffered him to conduct me whithersoever he would. We walked in silence for some distance, passed into the meanest quarter of the city, and reached a miserable and squalid street. The baron pointed to the most wretched house in the lane, and bade me direct my eye especially to its sixth story.

"Mark it well," said he; "you see a window there to which a line is fixed with recently washed linen!"

"I do," I answered.

"In the room—the small close hole to which that window hardly brings air and light, I passed months of my life. The mass at which you have three times watched me, is connected with it, and with occurrences that had their rise there. I was the occupant of that garret—it seems but yesterday since I wanted bread there."

The surgeon was unmanned. He kept his eye upon the melancholy window until emotion blinded it, and permitted him to see no longer. He stood transfixed for a second or two, and then spoke quickly.

"Mr. Walpole, poverty is horrible! I have courage for any extremity but that. Pain I have borne—shrieks and groans I have listened to unmoved, while I stood by laboring to remove them; but when I recall the moments in which I have languished for a crust of bread, and known mankind to be my enemy—as though being poor, I was a felon—all hearts steeled against me—all hearts, did I say!" added the speaker, suddenly checking himself—"I lie; had it been so, I should not have been here to tell the tale."

The baron paused, and then resumed.

"High as the rank is, Mr. Walpole, to which I have attained; brilliant as my career has been, and I acknowledge my success with gratitude—believe me, there is not a famished wretch who crawls through the sinks of this overgrown metropolis, that suffers more than I have suffered, has bitterer hours than I have undergone. In this city of splendor and corruption, at whose extremes are experienced the most exquisite enjoyment and the most crushing and bitter endurance, I have passed through trials which have before now overborne and killed the stoutest hearts, and would have annihilated mine, but for the unselfish love of him whose business took me to the church this day. Misery, in all its aggravated forms, has been mine. Want of money—of necessary clothing—hunger—thirst; such things have been familiar to me. In that room, and in the depth of the hard winter, I have for hours given warmth to my benumbed fingers with the breath which absolute want enabled me to draw only with difficulty and pain."

"Is it possible!" I involuntarily exclaimed.

"You believe that human strength is unequal to such demands. It is natural to think so; and yet I speak the truth. My parents, Mr. Walpole, humble and poor, but good and loving, sent me to Paris with all the money they could afford for my education. I was ambitious, and deemed it more than enough for my purpose. When half my time was spent here, unhappily for me both father and mother were carried off by a malignant fever. It was a heavy blow, and threatened my destruction; threatened it, however, but for a moment. I had determined to arrive at eminence; and when does the determination give way in the breast of him who feels and knows his power equal to his aim? I had a brother, to whom I wrote, telling him of my situation, and asking him for the loan of a few louis-d'or until my studies were completed, when I promised to repay the debt with interest. He sent me the quarter of the sum for which I had begged, with a long cold letter of remonstrance, bidding me give up my profession, and apply myself to the humbler pursuits of my family. I returned to my brother both money and letter, and the day on which I did so, saw me without a meal. I had not a farthing in the world. Had not a woman who lodged in a room below given me a crust of bread, I must have committed crime to assuage the cries of nature. How I existed for days, I no longer remember. But I remember well hearing of a rich nobleman, renowned for his wealth and piety, and for all the virtues which the world confers upon the possessor of vast estates. In a moment of enthusiasm and mistaken reliance, I sat down and penned a petition to this great personage. I spoke as an intellectual man to an intellectual man; as one working his difficult way through obscurity and trouble to usefulness and honor—and requiring only a few crumbs from the rich man's table to be at ease, and happy at his toil. I begged in abject humility for those crumbs, and received a lying and cold-blooded excuse instead of them. I crouched at his gate with a spirit worn by anxiety and apprehension, and his slaves hunted me away from it. You have passed through that same gate with me; you were witness of my triumph at the bedside of his child!"

"You mean his excellency—the operation?"

"I do."

"How little the rich," said I, "know of the misery, the privations, endured by those who in poverty acquire the knowledge that is to benefit mankind so largely. How ignorant are they of their trials!"

"If you would know of the ignorance, the folly, and the vice of the rich," proceeded the baron, always at home upon this his favorite subject, "you must listen to an endless tale. Ever willing and eager to detract from the merits of the man of science, and to attribute to him the assumption of powers beyond human grasp—and ever striving to drag down the results of his long and patient study to the level of their own brutish ignorance—they are made the sport, the tools, and playthings of every charlatan and trickster, as they should be. You shall be satisfied, Mr. Walpole, when you see the men who treat you with scorn and contumely, pulled like puppets by a wire, and made to dance to any tune the piper listeth. Hope nothing from the rich."

"And from the poor, sir?"

"Everything," replied the baron, almost solemnly. "From their hearts shall spring the gratitude that will cheer you in your course, and solace you in your gloom. Fame, and the grateful attachment of my humble friends, have furnished me with a victory which the gold of the king could not purchase. But we forget Saint Sulpice. I am not a hypocrite, as you judge me, Mr. Walpole. Be witness yourself if my presence there this day has proved me one. Refused and cast away by this nobleman, I had nothing to do but to dispose for a trifle of a few articles of linen which were still in my possession. I sold them for a song, and believing failure to be impossible, still struggled on. In that room I dwelt, living for days upon nothing richer than bread and water, and regarding my little money with the agony of a miser, as every demand diminished the small store. From morn till night I labored. I almost passed my life among the dead. Well was it for me, as it proved, that my necessities drove me to the dead-house to forget hunger, and obtain eleemosynary warmth. Dismissed at dusk from this temporary home, I returned to the garret for my crust, and carried the book which I had borrowed to the common passage of the house, from whose dim lamp I received the glimmer that served me to read, and to sustain the incensed ambitious spirit that would not quell within me. The days glanced by quicker than the lightning. I could not read enough; I could not acquire knowledge sufficient, in that brief interval of days, between the acquisition of my little wealth and the spending of my last farthing. The miserable moment came. I was literally penniless, and without the means of realizing anything. For a week I retained possession of my room through the charity of my landlord, and I was furnished with two loaves by a good fellow who lived in the same house, and who proffered his assistance so kindly, so generously, and well, that I received his benefaction only that I might not give him pain by a refusal. The second week of charity had already begun, when, entering my cold and hapless room in my return from the hospital, I was detained at the door by hearing my name pronounced in a loud and angry tone. I listened with a sickening earnestness, and recognized the voice of my landlord and that of the good neighbor in high discussion. Something had been said which much offended the latter; for the words which I caught from him were those of remonstrance and reproach.

"For shame, for shame!" said he, 'you have children of your own, and they may need a friend one day. Think of them before you do so hard a thing.'

"I do think of them," replied the landlord sharply; 'and, that they may n't starve, I must keep my matters straight.'

"Give him another week or two. You will not feel it. I'll undertake to keep him. It is n't much, Heaven knows! that I can do for him; but at a pinch, man should make shift for a man. Say you'll do it!"

"I have told you he must go. I do not say one thing and mean another."

"Yes, you do, Lagarde," continued the persevering lodger. 'You say your prayers daily, and tell Heaven how thankful you are for all it does for you. Now, that you cannot mean, if you turn a helpless brother from your doors, who must die of want if you and I desert him. Come, think again of it. Recollect how the poor lad works—how he is striving and striving day after day. He will do well at last, and pay us back for all.'

"There was no doubt as to the individual—the subject of this argument. He stood listening to his doom, and far, far more grateful to the good creature who pleaded his cause, than distressed by the obstinacy which pronounced his banishment. I was not kept long in suspense. I retreated to my den, and sat down in gloomy despair. A loud knock at the door roused me, and the indignant pride which possessed me melted at once into humility and love when I beheld the faithful Sebastian—my sympathizing neighbor.

"You are to go," he said bluntly; 'you are to leave this house to-morrow.'

"I know it," I answered; 'I am prepared to go this instant.'

"And whither?"

"Into the street," said I; 'anywhere—it matters not.'

"Oh yes! it matters much," replied my visitor; 'it would not matter to me, or to your landlord. We are but day-laborers, whom nobody would miss. You have great things before you: you will do, if you are not crushed on the way. I am sure of it, and you shall not be deserted.'

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Listen to me. Don't be offended. I am a poor man, and an ignorant one; but I respect learning, and feel for the distressed. You leave this house to-morrow; so do I. You seem to have no friends; I am friendless too. I am a foundling. I never knew either father or mother. I am a water-carrier, and I came from Auvergne. This is my history. Why should we not seek a lodging together? You don't regret leaving this place; no more do I. I won't disturb you. You shall study as long as you like, and have me to talk to when you are tired; that is—if it is quite agreeable, and you won't be ashamed of me.'

"You know," said I, 'that I am in a state of beggary.'

"I know," he answered, 'that you are not flush of capital just now; but I have a little in my pocket, and can work for more. If you are not too proud to borrow a trifle from me now, I shan't be too proud to have it back again when you get rich. Don't let me prate, for I am rough and unhandy at it; but give me your hand like an honest man, and say, "Sebastian, I will do as you wish me."

"My heart glowed with a trembling fire, and I grasped the extended palm of my preserver. 'Sebastian,' I exclaimed, 'I will do as you wish me. I will do more. I will make you independent. I will slave to make you happy. It can be done—I feel it can—and you may trust me.'

"'You'll do your best, I know,' he answered; 'and you'll do wonders, or I am much mistaken.'

"Upon the following morning we wandered through the city, and before nightfall obtained shelter. To this unselfish creature, and to the sacrifices which he made for me, I owe everything. We had been together but a few days when he drew from me a statement of my position and future prospects—drew it with a delicacy and tenderness that looked lovely indeed from beneath his ragged robes. Now this poor fellow, like me—like all of us—had his ambition, and a darling object in the far distance, to attain. He had for months stunted himself of many comforts, that he might add weekly to a sum which he had saved for the purchase of a horse and water-cart. He was already master of a few hundred francs; and his earnings, small as they were, permitted him to keep up the hope which had supported him through many hardships. No sooner, however, did he gather from my words the extent of my necessities, than he determined to forego the dearest wish of his life in order to secure my advancement and success. I remonstrated with him; but I might as well have spoken to a stone. He would not suffer me to speak; but threatened, if I refused him, to throw his bag of savings without delay into the Seine. I ceased to oppose him, accepted his noble offer, and vowed to devote myself from that time forward to the raising up of my deliverer. The money of Sebastian supplied me with books, enabled me to pass my examinations. Be sure I did not slacken in my exertions. Idleness was fraud while the sweat from the brow of the water-carrier poured so freely for my sake. I revered him as a father, not before I had myself become the object of his affections—the recipient of the love which he had never been conscious of before, founding that he was, and without another human tie! He grew proud of me, prouder and prouder every day—I must be well-dressed—I must want for nothing; no, though he himself wanted all things. He was assured of my future eminence, and this was enough for him; and my spirit well responded to his own. I knew my capacity; I felt my strength. I was aware of the ability that floated in the world, and did not fear to bring my own among it. What could a mind undertake from which mine would shrink? What application could be demanded to which I was not equal—prepared—eager to submit? Where lay my difficulty? I saw none: or if I did for an instant, it was exterminated before the imperious resolution I had formed to exalt and enrich my beloved and loving benefactor. Tender as a parent to me, this incomparable man was at the same time diligent and attentive as a domestic. He would permit me to do nothing to impede the easy and natural course of study. He shamed me by his affectionate assiduity, but silenced me ever by referring to the Future, when we looked, he confessed, for a repayment for all his care and love. What could I say or do in answer to this appeal? What but reiterate the vow which I had taken, never to desert him, and to fight my way upward that he might share the glory he had earned. A day arrived when I was compelled for a time to leave him; for I had been received as interne at the Hotel Dieu. It was a hard parting, especially for the poor water-carrier, who dreaded losing sight of me forever. I gave him an assurance of my constancy; and consoled him by the information that another and last examination yet awaited me, for which a certain sum of money would be required. He promised to have it ready by the hour, and conjured me to take all care of myself—and to learn to love religion; for I must tell you, Sebastian was a pious man—a conscientious Christian.

"Once at the hospital, I sought profitable employment, and obtained it. In the course of a few months I had earned a sum—dearer, more valuable to me than all I have since acquired. It was insignificant in itself, but it purchased for my Sebastian his long wished for treasure—the horse and water-cart. I took it to him; and when I approached him, I had not a word to say, for my grateful heart was in my throat strangling my utterance. He threw his arms about my neck, cried, laughed, thanked, scolded, blessed, and reproached me, all in the wildness and delirium of his delight. 'Why did you do it?' said he, 'oh, it was kind and loving in you!—very kind and foolish—and wrong, and generous, and extravagant—dear, good, naughty boy! I am very angry with you; but I love you for it dearly. How you are getting on! I knew you would. I said so from the first. You will do wonders—you will be rich at last. You want no man's help—you have done it all yourself.'

"'No, Sebastian!' I exclaimed, 'you have done it for me.'

"'Don't deceive me—don't flatter me,' he answered. 'I have been able to do very little for you—not half what I wished. You would have been great without me. I have looked upon you, and loved you as my own boy, and all that was selfishness.'

"We dined and spent the evening of the day together. Life has had no hours like those before or since. They were real, fresh, substantial—such as youth remembers vividly when death and suffering have shaken the foundations of the world, and covered the past with mistiness and cloud. The excitement of the time, or the privations of former years—or I know not what—threw the good Sebastian shortly after this day upon a bed of sickness. He never rose from it again. He was not rewarded as he should have been for all his sacrifices—for all the love he had expended upon his grateful foster-child. He did not live to witness my success—he did not see the completion of the work he had begun. In spite of all my efforts to save his precious life, he sank, and drew his latest breath in these devoted arms. I lost more than a father."

The baron paused, his lips were borne down by a tremulous motion: he took my arm, and urged me gently from the spot. We walked for some distance in silence. Collecting himself again, he proceeded:—

"Sebastian, as I have told you, was a pious man. In truth, his faith was boundless. He worshipped and adored the Virgin Mary, as he would have loved his own natural mother, had he known her. He was aware of my unbelief, and had often spoke to me on the subject as a father might, in accents of entreaty and regret. While he was ill he gave me all the money he had, and earnestly requested me to spare nothing to secure for him the consolations of the church. I obeyed him. I caused masses to be said for him. I procured for him the visits of his priest. I left nothing undone to give him peace and joy. Would it not have been monstrous had I acted otherwise? He was morbidly anxious for the future: he, righteous man, who was as pure in spirit, as guileless, as an infant! I alone followed him to the grave; and after I had seen his sacred dust consigned to earth, I crawled home with a heart almost broken with its grief. I hid myself in my room for the day; and before I quitted it again, devised a mode of testifying my gratitude to the departed—one most acceptable to his wishes had he lived to express them. I remembered that he had neither friend nor relation—that I lived his representative. He had spoken during his illness of the masses which are said to the repose of the souls of the dead—spoken of them with a solemn belief as to their efficacy and power. His gentle humanity forbade his imposing upon me as a duty that which I might not easily perform. My course was clear. I saved money sufficient for the purpose, and then I founded the masses which are celebrated four times yearly in the church of Saint Sulpice. The fulfilment of his pious desire is the only offering I can make to the memory of my dear foster-father. Upon the days on which the masses are said, I attend, and in his name repeat the prayers that are required. This is all that a man with my opinions can undertake; and this is no hypocrisy, nor can the Omniscient—if that great spirit of nature be indeed capable of human passions—feel anger at the act, when I solemnly declare that all I have on earth—and more than I could wish of earthly happiness—I would this instant barter for the meek inviolable faith of Jean Sebastian."

The words were spoken at the door of the baron's residence, which we had already reached. My hand was in that of the speaker. He had taken it in the act of wishing me farewell. I grasped his palm affectionately, and answered—

"Why then, my friend, should you not possess this enviable blessing?"

"Because I cannot struggle against conviction: because faith is not subject to the will: because I know too little and too much: because I cannot grasp a shadow, or palpably discern by day an evanescent, albeit a lovely, dream of night. These are my reasons. Let us dismiss the subject."

And the subject was dismissed, never to be taken up again. From this time forward, our theological disputations ceased. The baron forbore his wit, and the good cause was spared my feeble advocacy. Whether the baron suspected that, after all, there might be inconsistency in continuing to laugh at religion, while he persevered in visiting the church, or whether the seeds of a new and better growth of things began already to take root within him, I cannot take upon me to decide. To my relief and comfort, the solemn argument was never again profaned by ribaldry and unbecoming mirth; and, to my unfeigned delight, the teacher and the pupil were without one let or hindrance to their perfect sympathy and friendship.

A year had elapsed since, in the manner shown, I received the key to so many of the baron's seeming inconsistencies—when, as we were passing one morning into the Salle St. Agnes at the Hotel

Dieu, we were surprised to find, standing at the door of the ward—the venerable and humble minister of Auvergne. His face brightened at the approach of the baron, and he bowed respectfully in greeting him.

"What brings you here again, old friend?" inquired the surgeon; "no relapse, I trust?"

"Gratitude," replied the priest. A large basket was on his arm—his shoes were covered with dust—he had journeyed far on foot. "It is a year since I left this roof with my life restored to me, under God's blessing, by you. I could not let the anniversary slip away without paying you a visit, and bringing you a trifling present. It is scarcely worth your acceptance—but it is the best my grateful heart can offer, and I thought you would receive it kindly. A few chickens from the poultry yard, and a little fruit from the orchard."

The baron received the gift with a better grace than I had seen him accept a much handsomer fee. He invited the priest to his house, detained him there for some hours, and dismissed him with many presents for the poor among his flock at Auvergne.

And thus stood matters when the last stroke of my two years was sounded, and I was summoned home. I left the baron, need I say, with real regret; he was not pleased at my departure. I engaged to write to him, and to pay another visit to Paris as soon as my affairs permitted me. I have never trod French soil since; I never saw the baron afterward. My curiosity, however, did not suffer me to be in ignorance of my friend's proceedings; and what I have now to add is gathered from a communication, received shortly after the baron's death, from his faithful and attached François.

For seven years the priest came annually with his gifts to the Hotel Dieu, and on each occasion was the baron's visitor; at first for a day or two, but afterward for a week—and then longer still. During the second visitation, it was discovered that the minister was related distantly to the baron's former friend, Sebastian. As soon as this was known, the surgeon offered the good man a home and an annuity. The former he modestly declined: the latter he accepted, distributing it in alms among the needy who abounded in his parish. The surgeon and the priest became great friends and frequent correspondents. The temper of the baron altered. He grew less morose; less violent; less self-indulgent; less bigoted. He became the pupil of the simple priest, and profited by his instruction and example. Seven years after my departure from Paris, the baron fell ill; and the priest of Auvergne, summoned to his bedside, ministered there, and gave his blessing to a meek, obedient child. He died, and the priest, shedding tears of sorrow and of joy commingled, closed his glassy eyes. What passed between them in his latest moments may not be repeated. François heard but a sentence as he knelt at his master's pillow. It was among the last he uttered.

"François, love the Auvergnais: they have saved your poor master—body and soul!"

That body was borne to the grave by the students of the Hotel Dieu—the grayheaded priest following in the train; and the soul—Heaven in its infinite mercy hath surely not forgotten.

ON DUELLING AND ITS PUNISHMENT.

PUNCH TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.

SIR ROBERT PEEL,

In the Times of the 29th ult., MR. TURNER is reported to have asked you whether Her Majesty's Government intended to bring in a bill for the more effectual suppression of duelling; and you, in reply to this question, are reported to have answered, in your place in the House of Commons, in the negative.

You are further reported to have said, that you "thought that Her Majesty's Government had sufficiently evinced their willingness to exert their legitimate power and influence against the practice of duelling."

Furthermore you are reported, in exemplification of your own and your colleagues' willingness to suppress duelling, to have spoken to the effect following:—

"COLONEL FAWCETT was a man of great military reputation, and had distinguished himself in the service of his country. He was unfortunately killed in a duel, and when his widow applied for that pension to which she would have been entitled had he lost his life in any other way than by the hand of his adversary, Her Majesty's Government felt themselves compelled to refuse to grant that pension."

In the said Times, of the date aforesaid, it is likewise alleged that MR. SMITH, your Attorney-General for Ireland, did, in his place in open Court, deliver to MR. FITZGIBBON, one of the opposing counsel on the trial of DANIEL O'CONNELL, a challenge to fight a duel, and that you have not only taken no notice of the conduct of the said SMITH, but have rather made much of him, as of one who has done the state service.

Having asserted these facts, the Times proceeds to comment on them in a manner by no means complimentary to you; and if the facts were true, you would not only deserve all that is said of you, but, I will candidly tell you, a great deal more.

But surely the facts cannot be true. The Times for once has been hoaxed; "Aliquando bonus"—but you are a classic, Sir Robert, and I need not complete the quotation.

What! Can I believe, in the first place, that you said that the Ministry, of which you are at the head, had no intention of bringing in a bill to prevent duelling, when such a bill is so much wanted, and whereas it would be so easy to frame one? Is it not obvious that a law which made any one guilty of sending a challenge, fighting a duel, or being in any way a party to either transaction, liable to be sent for six months to the treadmill, would have the desired effect. Am I to think you an ass, SIR ROBERT PEEL! Pooh! You took honors at Oxford.

In the next place, will any one tell me that you allowed a barrister, whose business was wrangling, whose profession must have habituated him to give and take insults, and for whom, therefore, provocation was a trumpery excuse, to commit—at least, attempt to commit, at least, which comes to the same thing—such a crime as that imputed to MR. SMITH, with utter impunity, and at the same time visited the like offence in a soldier on the person of his poor widow! Nonsense! Putting the widow out of the question, is it possible that you could permit a lawyer to break the law which he had no vocation to break, without animadversion even; and dream of punishing an officer for a crime which, under military regulations, for whose maintenance you are responsible, is actually in the way of his business! Stuff! When, too, the officer was one who had fought and bled for his country, and the lawyer merely a political partisan! Fiddle-de-dee! I would not believe you guilty of such villainous partiality, such inconsistent meanness, for a moment.

But, to think that you, with such an opportunity of discountenancing a great wickedness presented you, as its public perpetration by an officer of the Crown, should have neglected it, to inflict a vicarious punishment on an unfortunate lady, whose situation claimed your every sympathy, is monstrous. You could have done no such thing, and even could you have been so base, surely the DUKE OF WELLINGTON, recollecting his affair with LORD WINCHELSEA, never would have agreed to it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, I will not, I cannot believe that you have acted the part which has been ascribed to you. Why, in a melodrama, at the Surrey Theatre, had an unjust vizier behaved in such a manner, the gallery would have cried "Yah!" upon him. Forgive me one quotation, not classical, but to the point. "The man who could injure a defenceless female is unworthy the name of a Briton."

I have been daily expecting to see a letter from you to the Times, denying the charges contained in it. But self-confident innocence, the "mens conscia recti"—you know what that means, SIR ROBERT, has restrained you, I suppose. I do not believe those charges; but other people do; wherefore have I felt called upon thus to step forward in your vindication.

"Pudet hæc opprobria vobis
Et dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli."

Your sincere well-wisher,

PUNCH.

LIFTS FOR LAZY LAWYERS.

Q. WHAT is an Original Bill?

A. Don't know, but should think that Shakespeare is the most "Original Bill" on record.

Q. Is a next friend moveable, and how?

A. Yes, by asking him to accept a Bill for you.

Q. What are the privileges of the peerage?

A. Stealing knockers and fighting duels with impunity.

From the Quarterly Review.

HUME AND HIS INFLUENCE UPON HISTORY.

Histoire de la Conquête de l'Angleterre par les Normands. Par Augustin Thierry, de l'Institut Royal de France. Quatrième édition. Bruxelles. 1842.

THIERRY, largely and approvingly quoted by Sir James Mackintosh, and praised by many English reviewers, has, without absolutely superseding any of our "standard" authorities, become, through the medium of translations and cheap editions, a popular book. So much attention has been excited by the novelty of his very doubtful views, which we trust to have ere long an opportunity of discussing, that it has tended to revive the scheme, often suggested but never yet adopted, of publishing an annotated Hume.

"Hume, after all"—it was urged by an able advocate of the plan, whom, according to the fashion of the days of Berkeley and Hervey, we will designate as Alciphron—"Hume, after all, retains his literary ascendancy. People will turn to him naturally as the educational book, the unchallenged source of authority. New histories, such as Thierry, may enjoy a flash of reputation, but they will not be considered as the sober, regular book, the outfit of the new book-case in the newly-furnished breakfast-room, newly occupied by the newly-married expectants of a numerous family. As Professor Smyth says, in his Lectures, It is Hume who is read by every one. Hume is the historian whose views and opinions insensibly become our own. He is respected and admired by the most enlightened reader: he is the guide and philosopher of the ordinary reader, to whose mind, on all the topics connected with our history, he entirely gives the tone and law. Were, however, the merit of Hume's history less than it is, the stamp given by the name of a standard work will always sustain its value as a literary or commercial speculation. Hume may be truly characterized as History for the Million. In our active age, the prevailing desire is to acquire the largest show of information with the smallest expense of thought. Just as you buy a tool-chest or a medicine-chest, because it contains all the hammers and chisels, or tinctures and powders which you want, all ready chosen for you without any trouble of your own—even so do people purchase the standard work for their handsome, select libraries, because they expect, and rightly, that it will fill up the gap on their shelves and the void in their heads, without any further pains."

Your comparison, however apposite—was the reply of Euphranor—cannot be carried entirely through. He who purchases the tool-chest endeavors to ascertain the temper of the tools: he assures himself that the shear-steel is Holtzapfel's and not Sheffield ware. It is not the mere "town made" which will satisfy him. In the medicine-chest, you take pains enough to ensure that the contents of phials and boxes shall be the right thing: no willow-bark instead of Battley's cinchona: genuine unadulterated senna. Still more anxiously would you keep away from the shop, however gay and attractive, if you knew that the pharmacopolist had been tried and convicted for selling oxalic acid in the place of Epsom salts, or arsenic for magnesia. But with respect to the "standard work," or the whole legion of educational works, equally "standard" in their degree, is the same salutary caution employed? Rarely does the teacher, who places the book before the pupil, take the trouble to consider the character of the mind whence the work emanates, or the tendency of the doctrines which it may boldly display or coyly conceal. How often does the careful mother, who anxiously guards her children against opening any but "Sunday books" on the Lord's day, resume on the Monday her regular course of readings—lessons on history, lessons on botany, lessons on geology, taken from productions in which, either in express terms or by inference, Holy Scripture is either so excluded as to destroy all trust in its reality, or represented as a fable!

"Surely not so"—said Alciphron:—"name them."

Nay—quoth Euphranor—it is mamma's business, not mine; let her set her wits to work, and examine the first dozen of the rubbish which she shoots upon the school-room table.

"We are wandering from our question"—resumed Alciphron:—"do not suppose that I contend for the absolute perfection of Hume's history. In many respects, it may not satisfy the awakened curiosity of the public mind. Copious sources of information, unexplored in Hume's day, have been made known since his time by the diligence of our modern antiquaries. Sounder criticism is employed in judging the mediæval period: more truly do we appreciate the poetical character of the middle ages, the splendors of chivalry, the charm of romance, the beauty of the structures, the merit of the artists who, sixty years since, were equally condemned by the man of letters and the virtuoso. Above all, we begin to understand how extensive is the inquiry involved in the annals of mankind; for the enlarged researches of our own times make us now far more sensible of the exact extent of our ignorance. There is as much graphic archaeology and curious quaintness in any one number of Charles Knight's London or Old England, or my friend Felix Summerly's Guide-books, as, under Pitt's administration, would have set up an Antiquarian Society—president, council, director, and all the members to boot. But our abundance will facilitate the editorial task. Hume's short-comings may be completely remedied by the note, the excursus, the appendix, and the essay. All those who possess the information and talent needed for correcting Hume's errors or making good his deficiencies, will have a far better chance of profit or fame by annexing their information to his pages, than through any independent production of their own. Embark in the vessel which has so long braved the storms of criticism: the good ship Hume will always make a prosperous voyage, and find a market for her wares in ports which to every other flag will be closed. It is in vain—as observed by a shrewd critic of our own day—that we shall look elsewhere for those general and comprehensive views, that sagacity and judgment, those masterly lessons of political wisdom, that profound knowledge of human nature, that calm philosophy and dispassionate balancing of opinion, which delight and instruct us in the pages of Hume. Hume is justly placed, by common consent, at the head of our philosophic historians: he is not more distinguished for his philosophy than for his sagacity and judgment, his feeling and pathos.—Hume may be deficient in diligence and research, but, as I have before said, how easily can any defects arising from imperfect information, be supplied by those, who, with less genius and philosophy, have more opportunity of collecting materials, more assiduity, more knowledge! And if there be any tendencies at variance with received opinions, surely a calm and temperate correction of his errors, will sufficiently enable the reader to maintain a due impartiality.”

You are quoting, O Alciphron—was the reply of Euphranor—the words of the late John Allen, who, as an acute, diligent, and critical investigator of history, is entitled to great respect; but the task of correction would not be so easy as you suppose. Fully do I acknowledge the cleverness displayed in Hume's history, though I should not characterize his qualities exactly in the same terms. Allen's language is even more tinged by affection than that of the lover; for in the very same article he says,—“We are thoroughly sensible of the deficiencies in what constitute the chief merit of an historian, fidelity and regard to truth.”—Professor Smyth goes a deal farther. He warns us to be “ever suspicious” of the author's “particular prejudices.” He virtually accuses his favorite writer of a perpetual falsification of his subject, “by ascribing to the personages of history, as they pass before him, the views and opinions of later ages: those sentiments and reasonings which his own enlightened and powerful mind was able to form, not those which either really were or could be formed by men thinking or acting many centuries before.” And he sums up the literary character of the “beautiful narrative” by telling us that “in Hume's history truth is continually mixed up with misrepresentation, and the whole mass of the reasoning, which in its final impression is materially wrong, is so interspersed with observations which are in themselves perfectly right, that the reader is at no time sufficiently on his guard, and is at last betrayed into conclusions totally unwarrantable, and at variance with his best feelings and soundest opinions.”*

How can an editor deal with such a writer—an historian who neither knows the truth, nor cares to know it, and whose wilful perversions must provoke a continual, though ineffectual, refutation! The perpetual commentary must become a perpetual running fire against the text. Let it be further recollected that the “particular prejudices” of Hume may chance to run counter to an editor's best interests and feelings. If you, Alciphron, held a good estate in the county of Berks, by your father's will, would you like to attempt the correction of a topographer who had such a “particular prejudice” against testamentary devises as to represent them to be grounded, in every case, upon fraud! How could any Englishman bear to edit a general history of England, composed by Monsieur De Nigremment the Frenchman, who, entertaining the most “particular prejudices” against the British sea-service, always advocates his own opinion by so artfully mixing up truth with misrepresentation, as to make all our naval men appear odious or ridiculous; and to induce us to believe that our naval service is equally mischievous and contemptible; our wooden walls, not the defences of the realm, but useless sources of extravagant expense; our sailors, ruffians, serving merely for plunder; the “whole scope” of all our Admiralty orders directed to the same wicked object; our commanders, knaves or fools, traitors or cowards; who represents Howe as a ninny, and Collingwood as a brute; and who, in narrating the last days of Nelson, fraudulently omits his “England expects every man to do his duty;” lest, by quoting these emphatic words, he should preserve a memorial of the ardent and sincere patriotism of the dying hero!

An editor appears to me to be nearly in your position when you introduce a stranger to your friend. In this case, you wish—if consistent with truth—to become the entire voucher for the character of the party: if you cannot go to that full extent, then, in connexion with the introduction, you feel yourself obliged to put your friend sufficiently upon the qui vive to protect himself in his intercourse. As the world goes, you may often be compelled, even for your friend's benefit, to place him in close quarters with an individual whose connexion or acquaintance cannot be pursued or cultivated without caution.—“Chipchase is an honest workman, but very cross—John Bean takes good care of his horses, though he is not a teetotaller—Sir Richard enjoys capital credit upon 'Change, but he is apt to be tricky.”—In all such cases the merit or talent, such as it may be, is accepted as a compensation for the defect. So far as concerns the particular purposes required, the balance is on the right side. But you would find it rather awkward, had you to state “Lorenzo is a delightful companion, full of wit, talent, and in- and in Smyth's Lectures, vol. i., Lecture V., which we request our readers to peruse attentively, comparing it with this article.

* The passages quoted by Alciphron and Euphranor will be found in the Edinburgh Review, No. 83, p. 5, &c.;

formation; he has only one fault, his whole heart and soul is given up to gallantry: he never loses sight of his purpose. He has written a most clever essay upon 'the natural history of chastity'—to prove, not only the bad influence exercised by the 'popular notions of chastity' upon morality, but that, in point of fact, chastity never exists; and that she who is apparently the most virtuous differs only from the most profligate by 'cant and grimace.' Lorenzo is most actively consistent—he tries to seduce every woman he can get at. When you have him in your house he will endeavor on all occasions to put his doctrines into practice, whether he meets your smart lady's maid in the park or your staid governess on the stairs, plays an accompaniment to your spinster cousin, assists your wife at the dinner-table, reads a sermon to your budding daughter, or escorts your well matured sister to the opera."—Would it not probably occur to you that your friend would consider it rather inexpedient to begin by shaking hands with a scoundrel, whom he would soon be compelled to get rid of by kicking him out of doors!

Hume's merits must be examined with reference to the era in which he flourished. Previously to Hume, it can hardly be said that England possessed historical literature in the æsthetic sense of the term. Adopting the Gibbonian phrase, it was our reproach that no British altars had been raised to the muse of History. All who, since Hume, have earned any commanding reputation, are more or less his disciples; and all our juvenile and educational histories, and conversations, and outlines, are, in the main, composed out of Hume's material—occasionally minced up with a few pious reflections, or even with texts, in order to correct the taint of the food thus dished up for the rising generation. Even Turner strongly partakes of his flavor.

Before Hume, we had many valuable and laborious early writers, such as Hall and Grafton, Speed and honest Stow, who chronicled events with diligence, giving that instruction which facts, faithfully though unskilfully narrated, afforded to the multitude, when the comparative sterility of the press rendered reading scarcer and reflection more abundant. "Baker's Chronicle," in the hall window, the one book conned over by the fine old English gentleman, taught him to think for himself. May be his chaplain helped him a little. The modern English gentleman thinks as he is taught by his newspaper. Besides such Gothic chroniclers, for we name Baker only as the exemplar, there were other writers who had made a nearer approach to the science of history, by treating the subject with reference to the principles of government, or the doctrines of party. They aspired to the more ambitious rank of instructors; yet we had not any works which, viewed as literary compositions, were distinguished either by style or sentiment. Many might be consulted for information, none had striven for literary eminence.

Omitting the writers confined to particular eras or reigns, there were six who, as precursors of Hume, had, with more extended views than mere annalists, planned or executed the task of compiling a general history of England.

First appears Brady. The functions of this learned man exhibited an odd combination of pluralities: a doctor of medicine by profession, an antiquary by fancy, he united in his person the offices of Regius Professor in his faculty at Cambridge, Master of Caius College at Cambridge, and Keeper of the Records in the Tower; being, moreover, one of the household physicians of James II., and, as such, one of the attesting witnesses of the birth of his unfortunate son. Brady was also much connected with Sydenham. Strange to say, he pursued his literary studies, and preserved his reputation for professional skill. In our days, the "three black graces" respectively impose three degrees of literary exclusiveness upon their respective professors. Mother Church is most indulgent towards her children; provided they "perform" one service on Sunday, she nods and allows them to expatiate as they may. Themis shows more jealousy; when she is courted by the student, she smiles and says, "Young man, recollect I must have you all to myself. It is not for the like of you to suppose that you are to be indulged like the suitors of whom I have been sure—a Brougham or a Jeffrey, a Talfourd or a Merivale. No,—when you have wedded me, you must give up all flirtations with the Muses. If you forget yourself, you shall not touch a shilling of my property, and I dare say I shall end by suing for a divorce from such an unfaithful partner." Esculapius is the harshest of all: if his son prints his footsteps upon ground forbidden to medical intellect, he at once cuts off the extravagant heir with an empty pill-box.

In Brady's time, far more toleration was allowed. He grew rich, received fees, and flourished, albeit he was a distinguished antiquary and historian. The first, or introductory volume of Brady's History, containing a summary of the origin and progress of the constitution, with a valuable Glossary, was published in 1684; the second in 1685; the third, which ends with the reign of Richard II., in 1700. Brady was sincere in his belief that the people had no political rights, excepting what they had begged, bought, or stolen from the king. Considered as an historical investigator of constitutional law, rather than as a narrator of facts, Brady has much merit, though he draws erroneous conclusions from authentic evidence. He assumes that, whenever any grant in favor of the people proceeded from the Crown, their right originated out of the grant; whereas, in fact, it more frequently happens that such a grant is only a confirmation of a previously existing right, or the recognition of a prevailing principle in the constitution, subsisting by custom and usage, but which now required to be defined, because government sought to violate the understanding, or refuse the concessions which might render the struggle unnecessary: popular rights previously held in solution, but precipitated by excess of royal prerogative or party pertinacity.

"Our late great parliamentary revolution," said Alciphron, hearing this observation, "is a case in point: it was the refusal of the franchise to Manchester which solidified parliamentary reform—a few drops more of Eldonine, and we should have had the People's Charter." But this is a vexed question, which Euphranor advises us for the present to decline, and we must therefore return again to our historians.

Partial, however, as Brady may have been, he was an honest writer; rigidly accurate in his quotations, and, having appended numerous original documents to his text, he affords us the means of refuting his own mistakes, and is still in many points a useful guide.

Brady was the champion of Toryism and hereditary right; Tyrrell took up the gauntlet on the side of the Whigs and the Revolution, by producing, in 1698, "The General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, from the earliest accounts of time to the reign of his present Majesty William III., taken from most ancient Records, MSS., and printed Historians, with Memorials of the most eminent Persons in Church and State, as also the foundation of the most noted Monasteries and both Universities." Four successive volumes followed; the last appeared in 1704, when, like Brady, he was silenced in his controversy by death; and the same era, the conclusion of the reign of Richard II., ends his "Complete History."

As a necessary consequence of Tyrrell's antagonism to Brady, he runs fast and far away from the truth in the opposite direction. If not absolutely the founder, yet he gave a great help to the respectable, but somewhat prosy school, who systematize Anglo-Saxon liberty; believe that King Alfred instituted trial by jury; portray King John as signing Magna Charter with a long goose-quill; and, always confounding the means with the end, consider political freedom as identical with national happiness. His "History" is a Whig pamphlet in five volumes folio. Puzzled, and yet sincere, Tyrrell waded diligently through the best authorities; he neglected no source of information. We believe that he has hardly omitted any one fact of importance: and yet you read through his history without being able to recollect one of the events which he has narrated with drowsy fidelity. Like all writers of his class, he is a telescope with dulled glasses; he brings the object nearer to you, but so dim and confused that you have no distinct image at all.

With better fortune than his predecessors, Lawrence Eachard was enabled to fulfil his plan of "giving to the Englishman his own country's story." He undertook his useful and important work, for such it certainly is, under the clear conviction that he was called to the task by a sense of duty as a divine. England wanted a church and state history, a history which might teach Englishmen to respect their national constitution as well as their national religion, without egging one on against the other: he therefore wrote as a professed teacher, influenced by doctrines which it was his calling openly to propagate and confirm. Eachard's principle, however he may have carried it through, was the right one. A soldier would deem it an insult if you supposed he forgot his commission when he appears in plain clothes. Equally should a clergyman make all around him constantly know and remember his order, although his surplice may be put off. The first volume, which extends to the end of James I., is the least important. He did not neglect original authorities, but, according to the prevailing fashion, he considered the "monastic writers" as "being highly disagreeable to the taste and genius of our refined age." In the second and third volumes, which carry on the history to the "late happy Revolution," Eachard becomes a writer of intrinsic worth. He exercised a satisfactory diligence in collecting all the printed authorities, not merely such as are historical in the strict sense of the term, but of that miscellaneous illustrative class, pamphlets, lampoons, trials, and the like, neglected by his contemporaries, but of which he fully knew the value. Eachard was also assisted by manuscript and oral information, so that in the latter portion of the work he becomes an original authority. It is a grave, magisterial, sober, sensible book, in Oxford binding. His narration is deficient in talent or liveliness; but want of elegance and spirit is compensated by the business-like clearness of his style, and the excellent arrangement of his matter. His work, in spite of the attacks of scurrilous Oldmixon, and the criticism of the miserable free-thinker, Conyers Middleton, acquired considerable credit, and may be read with advantage by those who value plain historical information, full and solid: but they must not look for any solution of difficult problems, or any nice elucidations of character.

In the capacity of the patriarch of book-makers, the earliest professional author known to have been paid by the sheet, Guthrie, whose ponderous Geographical Grammar still lingers in its fourteenth edition, deserves a memorial. Let subscriptions be raised at every trade-dinner for the erection of the statue in papier maché, in the dark court opposite Stationers' Hall, in the centre of the little grubby, scrubby, shabby green. As an historian, few words will suffice for poor Guthrie. He was a Tory by principle and an author by necessity. Steadily did he fill page after page, under the stimulus of political feeling and the pressure of domestic penury. Such was the patient complacency of his customers, that Guthrie's history, being intended to be popular, fills two enormous folios, a stone-weight of literature. Guthrie's work is decently and comprehensively executed; but he has omitted references to proofs and authorities, so that his compilation, far too unwieldy for any ordinary reader in our degenerate days, is nearly useless to historical inquirers.

The history of reputations ill deserved, would form a large and interesting chapter in the annals of literature. When it shall be investigated by some future D'Israeli, a prominent station must be found therein for Rapin. Laborious and yet superficial, pompous and shallow, his foreign birth, education, and habitat, all unfitted him for the task. We must recollect, however, in judging him, that he wrote for foreigners; that is to say, for the continental public, and not for ourselves. Rapin tells us so with a candor which excuses the author, though it does not neutralize the errors which he has propagated. Rapin had some appreciation of the higher qualities of an historian—but his model of composition was Mezeray; his sentiments those of Bayle. He judged all matters, religious or political, in the spirit of a French refugee: feelings fully natural and excusable in one who had escaped the persecutions sanctioned by the name of Louis le Grand. Yet our toleration for his opinions must not induce us to conceal that Rapin, in his worthless farrago, is consistently an enemy to monarchy. Whenever the subject gives him an opportunity, he never fails to speak out: his sober republicanism is wholly different from the radicalism of the present day, and yet it is not without its influence in the same cause. Rapin's history ends with Charles I. The remaining portions of the French text (of his avowed English continuators we do not speak) are all written by different hands. Salmon says that the history was worked up by a club or society of Dutch Calvinists, French Huguenots, (Durand, the minister of the Savoy, being one,) English Presbyterians, and Scotch Cameronians. There may have been something of design, but there was more of book-making. Amsterdam was then the Manchester of this manufacture; and Rapin dying before he had completed his work, Abraham Rogissart, the bookseller, had it "got up" from his papers, in order not to lose the benefit of a publication from which much profit was derived.

To counteract Rapin, Thomas Salmon, whom we have just quoted, produced his History of England, comprehending, as we are informed by his elaborate title-page, printed with a wonderful variety of type—upper-case, lower-case, Roman, Italic, red letter, and black letter—"Remarks on Rapin, Burnet, and other Republican writers, vindicating the just Right of the Established Church, and the Prerogatives of the Crown against the wild schemes of Enthusiasts and Levellers, no less active and diligent in promoting the subversion of this beautiful frame of government, than their artful predecessors in hypocrisy, who converted the Monarchy into a Commonwealth and the Church into a Chaos of impious Sects." Salmon did not come from a bad stock: he was brother of the well-known historian of Essex. His fortunes, however, had been oddly chequered: he had served in the wars in Flanders, (we suspect as a private,) had been much at sea, twice to the Indies, and had kept two coffee-houses in a small way, first at Oxford and then in London. Whilst following the last-mentioned avocation, he compiled the "Modern Universal History," in which the English history is included, and several other useful works. His English history is fairly executed, and has occasionally those touches of liveliness which knowledge of the world imparts even to inferior talent. As a critic, Salmon has given many useful corrections of the "republican writers," not only in his history, but in his "Examination" of Burnet's Life and Times.

Brady and Tyrell, but more particularly the former, well understood research. An historical antiquary now arose, in the person of Thomas Carte, who far surpassed any of his predecessors. Carte was an indefatigable investigator of unpublished documents, particularly of state-papers, but he was somewhat deficient in the gift of knowing when to undervalue the result of his own researches. Alas! it is the common error of antiquaries to reckon the worth of the prey by the difficulty of the chase, and to consider that the mere accident of the information existing in manuscript—and above all in a manuscript penes me—must of necessity ensure the value of the article. He has overlooked important authorities, amongst others, strange to say, some of the publications of Tom Hearne; a great wonder, because Tom Carte ought to have turned to him by pure instinct as an unsworn brother. Adhering to the unfortunate house of Stuart, and having become cognizant of some plot for their restoration, Carte attained the uncomfortable honor of having his name placarded on the walls, in a proclamation which offered one thousand pounds for his apprehension; but he was able to escape to France, where he continued many years. The Benedictine school was flourishing there, and he had good opportunity of profiting by their labors. These excellent men were busily employed in editing the various sources of mediæval history; and their example, as well as the general tone of their erudition, so different from the Parisian coteries in which Hume afterwards flourished, gave Carte a deeper insight into the mode of conducting historical inquiry, than he could have obtained in England. Patronized by Dr. Mead, Carte had previously published his noble edition of Thuanus, which, after his recall to England, was followed by the "History of the Duke of Ormond." In the latter work he necessarily examined the character of Charles I. This production opened the way for a task of greater magnitude. Feeling, in common with others, the need of opposing a more effectual antidote to the erroneous views of Rapin, than the well-meant, though not profound, attempts of Salmon, he planned his "Society for encouraging the writing of a History of England," with the avowed view of being supported by such encouragement. Carte fully knew his ground, and the difficulties he should have to encounter, and he went to work as a man determined to overcome them.

A great number of "noblemen and gentlemen signed an instrument, obliging themselves to contribute, the former their twenty, the latter their ten guineas a year, towards the charges of the work and materials." The documents which our author circulated amongst his subscribers, before he began to publish the History, entitled "A Collection of the several Papers published by Mr. Carte in relation to his History of England," show how thoroughly he had considered the subject in all its bearings. A full knowledge of the contents of our own archives, many of which were then of difficult access, a thorough acquaintance with the continental collections, a due and critical appreciation of the value of the ancient sources of information, all testify to his qualifications for the task. He received munificent support. Oxford University and five of the principal colleges appeared as subscribers. Prudent Cambridge wholly kept aloof; but the reserve of Alma Mater was more than compensated by the solid patronage of the Corporation of London and of the opulent city companies. The first volume of the "General History of England, by Thomas Carte, an Englishman," was worthy of the ample assistance the author had obtained. His quaint denomination must be explained. Carte, though in holy orders, dared not write himself clerk, and would not write himself gentleman; he was a member of a secret and proscribed hierarchy; therefore he probably thought, that, since he could not add any designation of station, he would claim no other description save that which he derived from his country. Carte exercised great control over his principles: his Jacobitism can only be detected in his fairness towards monarchy, nor is the allegiance due to the House of Hanover ever endangered by the historian's affection to the Stuart cause. Without doubt, he was rather desirous not to put the Treasury again to the trouble of offering a thousand pounds for lodging him in any of his Majesty's gaols. Throughout the whole of the work, which Carte continued till the year 1642, there is only one passage in which his Jacobitism crops out, betraying the sentiments of the party to which he belonged. Never was the love of the White Rose more innocently, some folks would say more absurdly, displayed.

Speaking of the right of anointing, practised, according to ancient usage, at the coronation, he refutes the injudicious arguments of those who rest the jurisdiction of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters upon this ceremony, contending that such power is incident to royalty, and inherently vested, in all sovereigns. Had he stopped there, and then taken the oaths, all would have been excellent. Even a Whig minister might have "thought of him," as the phrase is; or his friends might have told him so. But, unluckily, he was tempted on a little bit further; and he proceeds to confute another opinion, that the gift of healing the scrofulous humor, called the king's evil, by the royal touch, a belief which has furnished an entertaining chapter in Mr. Pettigrew's very curious history of "Medical Superstitions," was to be attributed to the virtue imparted by the same ceremony; "for," says he, "I myself have seen a very remarkable instance of such a cure, which could not possibly be ascribed to royal unction." The individual supposed to have received this miraculous healing, was a certain Christopher Lovel, a native of Wells, who, having resided at Bristol as a laborer, was sorely afflicted with the disease. During many years, as Carte tells us, had he tried all the remedies which the art of medicine could administer, without receiving benefit. An old sailor, his uncle, about to sail to Cork, received Lovel on board his vessel: another voyage brought him to St. Malo in the Isle of Rhé. Hence Lovel crossed the country to Paris; ultimately he reached Avignon. "At this last place," says Carte, "he was touched by the eldest lineal descendant of a race of kings;" and, upon returning to his birth-place, he appeared, as people thought, entirely cured. Upon hearing this story, the first impression is, that Christopher Lovel was benefited by change of air and scene, diet and exercise, in the course of his long peregrinations by land and by sea; and any wise man, even though not a doctor, would assuredly, before he committed himself, have said, "Let us wait awhile, and see whether the disease be entirely removed." Accordingly, at no long period afterwards, the disease did in fact reappear. Whilst the unfortunate Jacobite thus lost his cause by failing in the ordeal which he had waged, he suffered all the odium of gaining a victory. Carte's enemies, and they were many in his own craft, took up the matter no less fiercely than as if the patient had been really and thoroughly healed, thereby giving the most undisputable proof of the legitimacy of the Pretender. Had Christopher Lovel been produced, as fresh as a rose and as sound as an apple, at the bar of the House of Lords—for the purpose of giving evidence to set aside the Act of Settlement, a louder hurly-burly could not have been raised. Pamphlets abounded. Silvanus Urban, usually open to all parties and influenced by none, lost all fellow-feeling. Mysterious paragraphs appeared, in which significant letters interchanged with more significant dashes—"N—j—r, P—t—r," excited all the horror of loyalty against the luckless T—s C—e. London citizens took fright. Pursuant to a vote of Common Council, Mr. Chamberlain, by order of Mr. Town, withdrew their subscription. Many other of Carte's supporter's followed their example from a real horror of Jacobitism; more, lest they should incur suspicion of favoring the Stuart cause—thus saving at once their reputation and their money. Still Carte's spirit was unsubdued: he continued to labor at his work. The remaining volumes appeared in due succession; and, had not death arrested his pen, he would, without doubt, have completed the book to the Revolution. As before mentioned, it ends with 1642. Carte's transcripts form a very valuable and extensive collection, and are now deposited in the Bodleian, where they constitute a memorial of conscientious honesty; for though Carte did not live to complete his plans, still he fully performed his duty towards those who supported him. He brought together all the materials for the edifice, which he was bound to raise.

Such were the precursors, who, with unequal qualities and success, had prepared the way for Hume. Being in 1752 appointed librarian of the Faculty of Advocates, an office from which he received little or no emolument, but which gave him the command of the largest library in Scotland, he then, as he tells us, formed the plan of writing the "History of England;" "but, frightened with the notion of continuing a narrative through a period of 1700 years, I commenced with the accession of the House of Stuart, an epoch when I thought the misrepresentations of faction began chiefly to take place." Two years elapsed before the appearance of the first volume of the "History," containing the period from the accession of James I. to the Revolution. The second followed in 1756. The history of the House of Tudor was next published in 1759; and the more early part, beginning, according to custom, with the Druids and Julius Cesar, was given to the public in 1761. This retrograde process is not ill adapted for the purpose of giving an effective and persuasive unity: it better enables the writer to single out such results as may agree with the causes which he chooses to assign. Keen novel-readers often begin with the catastrophe, in order to judge of the conduct of the tale. A writer of history may follow an analogous plan in order to ensure a striking development. Hume's "History" thus falls into three sections, and there are diversities of execution in each. Unquestionably, the portion in which Hume shows most grasp of mind is the Stuart history, yet one spirit pervades the whole.

Previously to the appearance of the history, the librarian, petted and favored as he may have been by private friendship, had not manifested any ability reasonably leading to the supposition that he would ever be numbered among the great men of the age. Had it not been for the notoriety attached to his "philosophical" principles, no impartial observer would have anticipated that David was likely to attract the notice of posterity, amidst the crowd of gentlemen who write with ease. He had tried a profusion of little essays, little treatises, little didactic dialogues upon metaphysics, philosophy, political economy, arts and sciences, trade, commerce, and polygamy, politics and constitutional policy, and historical antiquities—none very brilliant. Until he became a narrator, he never discovered the means of exerting his influential powers. Hume was destined to become a magnificent performer; but he began professing upon the wrong instruments; they had not sufficient compass—they wanted power and depth of tone; he kept hitting and hammering arias and fantasias upon the harpsichord, instead of expatiating in all the mazes of a grand concerto upon the violoncello. When he did change for the right instrument, he made it speak: and he took his proper place in the orchestra; but of that hereafter.

Hume's first offering to the literary world, as we are told in "My own Life," was "a Treatise of Human Nature, being an Attempt to introduce the Experimental Method of Reasoning, into moral subjects;" not a very intelligible title, even when, by substituting on for of, we render it somewhat more conformable to the vulgar idiom of our language. "Never," adds he, "was any literary attempt more unfortunate than my Treatise: it fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction as even to excite a murmur among the zealots." And he proceeds to represent how cheerfully he sustained the disappointment, and then recovered from the blow. In this auto-biographical confession, which contains two facts, the failure of the work and Hume's own conduct, there are two misrepresentations: the baby was not still-born—it was quite alive, and cried lustily, so as to excite the ogres, that is to say, the reviewers, to strangle it: an operation effectually performed, in the Journal entitled "The Works of the Learned." In the next place, Hume, instead of submitting with stoical indifference to the loss of said baby, raged like a lioness deprived of her cubs. Rushing into the shop of Jacob Robinson, the publisher of the Review, he out with his sword and demanded satisfaction. Jacob took refuge within his proper stronghold, and entrenched himself behind the counter, and thus escaped being pinked after the most approved fashion. Both parties acted very naturally—the stoical philosopher in being furious at the criticism, and the bookseller in declining to become a martyr for his editor; but "My own Life" is wholly silent about the matter. "My own Life," indeed, belongs to a class of compositions rarely commanding much confidence: say, one in a hundred. Autos usually takes good care not to tell any tales, which, in his own conceit, would lower his repute with Heteros—not one in a thousand. In all such compositions there is a great root of self-deception. We are far more proud of confessing our secret sins, than of recalling the recollection of our open follies. But the Philosophical Historian is superlatively egotistical and self-adulatory; he rolls and swelters in vanity.

All his miscellaneous productions, excepting only his "Natural History of Religion," and some slight Essays upon the "passions," "tragedy," and "taste," appeared before the publication of the first Stuart volume. Hume's general information, his apparent mildness and good temper, his gentlemanlike flow of language when he was not provoked, his conversational powers, and the general tendency of his moral and philosophical essays, gained him much notoriety and favor in the literary circles and coteries at Edinburgh. Deism was spreading, with exceeding rapidity, amongst the more intellectual classes of the northern capital. Philosophy became almost indispensable for preserving literary caste. Free-thinking, however, was then a quasi-aristocratical luxury. It had not yet descended to the Lord Provost and the Town-Council; and when Hume became a candidate for the chair of Moral Philosophy, the "zealots" having been bold enough to assert that he was an apostle of infidelity, he lost his election.

Such contests are usually poor tests of sound principle; however, on this occasion, the opposition was honest and sincere. It was instigated by the more orthodox and uncompromising members of the Kirk, who really adhered in heart and life to Christianity as taught by Calvin and John Knox; and Hume hated them henceforward with his whole soul. But the "enthusiasts" constituted a minority—both a moral and a numerical minority; all the ministry who professed liberal opinions, valued and sought Hume's friendship. Stigmatized as the propagandist of unbelief, he was consoled, supported, protected by the cordial friendship of the most distinguished members of the Scottish establishment—Blair, Wallace, Drysdale, Wishart, Jardine, Home, Robertson, and Carlyle. This reverend patronage, not any ability or cleverness of the writer, gave activity to Hume's venom. It removed the reproach previously attached to infidelity. It at once took off the interdict. Those who are the warmest adherents to Hume's irreligion have never dared to risk their own literary reputation by praising the talent of Hume, as evinced in the most offensive of his publications, such as the "Natural History of Religion," which includes the "Bad Influence of Popular Religions on Morality," the "Essay on Miracles," and the "Inquiry concerning the Human Understanding;" and when Magee ("On Atonement and Sacrifice," Vol. ii., p. 276,) spoke of them as "standing memorials of a heart as wicked, and a head as weak, as ever pretended to the character of philosopher and moralist," it is the harshness of the language, not the injustice of the sentiment, which can in any degree dispose us against the criticism. Deficient in any sustained argument, prolix and inconclusive, his hold upon your attention principally arises from the effort which you are constantly compelled to make, in order to follow the reasoning, which vanishes as soon as it begins to assume a definite form. If you are an antagonist, he wears you, not by his blows, but by continually slipping out of your grasp. Such works would absolutely have destroyed Hume's reputation as a philosophical reasoner, had he not been an unbeliever—had not opposition to faith been usually in those days considered as a primâ facie proof of a strong and vigorous mind.

The "Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals," may stand high in the scale of mediocrity. What have we in this pragmatic dissertation? A favorable approbation of qualities commonly favored; a dislike of vices commonly odious; common-place observations brought forth with placid solemnity; obvious truths intermixed with as obvious fallacies. Cold approbation is the utmost Hume bestows. He has no objection to the more amiable of the natural good qualities of mankind, if they trouble him not in his easy way. Without seeking to encourage any vice which might diminish the safety of society, he is apathetic even in the cause of pagan virtue.

The best of Hume's miscellaneous productions are his political and constitutional essays; they are clear and sensible, and they have all the force resulting from a shrewd and tranquil intellect. He recommends himself by his disinvoltura and worldly good sense, and a due appreciation of the popular fallacies by which the multitude are deluded. These pieces have the value of slight sketches by a good artist, free and expressive, but they need finish and carrying out into compositions. The most elaborate of them is the "Essay upon the Populousness of Ancient Nations." Its reasonings received an elaborate reply from Wallace; and Gibbon, in his valuable "Adversaria," has pointed out some striking inaccuracies. It is now chiefly remarkable, as having elicited from Hume an important and instructive description of his peculiar tactics. In a second edition, he added the following curious note:—

"An ingenious author has honored this discourse with an answer full of politeness, erudition, and good sense. So learned a refutation would have made the author suspect that his reasonings were entirely overthrown, had he not used the precaution from the beginning to keep himself on the sceptical side; and, having taken this advantage of the ground, he was enabled, though with much inferior force, to preserve himself from a total defeat. That reverend gentleman will always find, where his antagonist is so entrenched, that it will be very difficult to force him. Varro, in such a situation, could defend himself against Hannibal, Pharnaces against Cæsar."

But becoming afterwards aware, that this was an unguarded disclosure of the trick which gave most success to his sophistry, he omitted it, when, for a third time, he republished the essay in an octavo form.

In the large library, which, as he tells us, suggested his work, Hume wanted, like his predecessors, important materials then concealed in manuscript, but now familiar to every historical inquirer. Domesday, the groundwork of Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman territorial organization, was enshrined in the Chapter House at Westminster, protected strictly under lock and key: rarely could the edifice be entered; if the antiquary sought to consult the treasure, thirteen shillings and fourpence of lawful money must be paid for each inspection of the volume; guarded so jealously that the finger was never allowed to wander beyond the margin, lest the characters should sustain injury from contact with unexchequered hands. He had to labor under many other similar disadvantages, removed by more recent editorial diligence.

Such deficiencies, though they may diminish the completeness of history, are not detrimental to the literary character of the historian. Ordinary and vulgarized sources will usually give all that is needed for a broad outline, which may be rendered sufficiently effective, as a test of the author's talent, with a few minor details. "Here are some new and unpublished materials for the History of the Siege of Rhodes, M. l'Abbé." The reply of M. l'Abbé Vertot—as we have it in the facetious, anecdotic chapter of the French school-grammars of the last age—was, "Mon siège est fait." In the case of Vertot, the answer has become a standing joke against his memory, but the point of the sarcasm is given by his general untrustworthiness. Had M. l'Abbé been faithful to the extent of his knowledge, no candid fellow-laborer would be inclined to blame him for being content to work well upon a limited stock. In discussing Hume's claims to be adopted as "the guide and philosopher," who, "on all topics connected with our history entirely gives the law," it is therefore important to ascertain whether he employed due diligence, in studying the materials which were accessible to him, and in availing himself of the ample library, which, as he informs us, stimulated him to his enterprise. Gibbon thought not: he describes Hume's History as "elegant, but superficial;" apparently a slight epithet of blame, but which, employed by Gibbon, obtains great intensity. Congenial, unhappily, as their opinions might be in some respects, no two literary characters could be more distinct. Hume's historical Muse is dressed à la Pompadour: she is so painted that you never see her true complexion, you never get deeper than the rouge and the fard. Hume, in his best moods, only fluttered about the truth; never sought to know it. Gibbon sought to know the truth; but for the purpose of wickedly and perfidiously perverting it. Yet how admirable was the talent exerted by Gibbon, in hostility to the Power by whom the gift was bestowed—his nice sense of the due subordination of the different branches, into which he divided his studies; the good sense which taught him to intersperse them amidst each other, so varied as to relieve the mind, and yet so continuous as not to distract attention—to slacken the bow, but never leave it unstrung! His constant vigilance to improve every opportunity—recovering his Greek, to the sound of the fife and the tattoo, when on duty at Devizes; placing Homer in parallel with the verse of Pope and the geography of Strabo; comparing the returned numbers of the establishment of the Berkshire militia, with its actual rank and file, five hundred and sixty nominal, and two hundred and seventy-three effective, and hence drawing his inferences respecting the real magnitude of the armies commemorated in history.

Hume, at least in the papers which have been published, abstains from affording us any similar information. "My own Life" is silent concerning my own studies during the progress of the history; nor have we any means "of visting the fattest of epicurean hogs in his styte,"—this is Gibbon's kind phrase, explained by the ingenious index-maker as "a jocose allusion to Mr. Hume's indolence." The only glimpse we gain is through a story told by a late venerable Scottish crony. Some one having hinted that David had neglected an authority he ought to have consulted, the old gentleman replied,—“Why, mon, David read a vast deal before he set about a piece of his book; but his usual seat was the sofa, and he often wrote with his legs up; and it would have been unco fashionable to have moved across the room when any little doubt occurred.”

In the absence of more precise information, we must endeavor to ascertain, by internal evidence, the books which Hume had by his side, when, compiling the earlier portions of his history, he worked in this somewhat American guise. It has been ably shown by the most competent judge amongst our contemporaries, (Ed. Rev. Vol. liii., p. 15,) that, from Carte, Hume borrowed not only the arrangement of events but the structure of his expressions, giving, however, the color of his own thought and style to the narration, and occasionally verifying Carte's statement by referring to his quotations. Hume made nearly as much use of Tyrrell, balancing the narratives of the two historians, wisely availing himself of the hints given by Whig and Tory. Brady was his principal help for constitutional information. Original sources were occasionally consulted by him, though very uncritically and sparingly; some of considerable importance are wholly passed by; for example, the anonymous life of Richard II., published by Hearne. The reason is obvious; Carte unaccountably neglected it, therefore Hume was ignorant of the book's existence. Hume may have turned over the leaves of the chroniclers, but he never rendered them the object of study, and never distinguished between primary and secondary authorities. Of Church history, he knew absolutely nothing. Slight references to the imperfect English Concilia by Spelman, testify his ignorance or neglect of the more complete edition which we owe to Wilkins; a book which, a quarter of a century ago, was estimated as waste paper, but which now is worth more pounds than it was then worth shillings. Hume was entirely unacquainted with any of the ample collections, in which the transactions of the Church are recorded. A few passages, relating to Ecclesiastical law and history, are borrowed from the pungent Satires of Fra Paolo Sarpi: his facts for the Crusades, from Maimbourg or Vertot; his notices of continental history, generally, from the Essai sur les Mœurs, by Voltaire, and some other of the then fashionable works of French infidel literature. In the Stuart portions, Hume worked more freely and independently, from original writers; though Eachard, and also Bishop Kennet's compilation, useful for the documents and textual extracts it contains, were serviceable in saving the walk across the room.

Possibly many elucidations of Hume's literary character might be derived from the large collection of his correspondence, now deposited in the Library of the Edinburgh Royal Society. An editor would, however, find difficulty in dealing with the papers, so as to afford sufficient instruction, and, at the same time, avoid public offence. Selections from correspondence are worth little, unless they are sufficiently ample to exhibit a continuous view of the mind and pursuits of the man, and the mutual interchange of thought. Those who have examined the Hume papers—which we know only by report—speak highly of their interest, but add, that they furnish painful disclosures concerning the opinions then prevailing amongst the clergy of the northern metropolis; distinguished ministers of the Gospel encouraging the scoffs of their familiar friend, the author of the "Essay upon Miracles," and echoing the blasphemies of their associate, the author of the "Essay upon Suicide." Can we doubt but that Hume, who possessed within him the natural germ of many virtues, was exceedingly strengthened in his infidelity by the inconsistency of those whom he terms "religionists" leading him to the conclusion that "their conviction is in all ages more affected than real, and scarcely ever approaches in any degree to that solid belief and persuasion, which governs us in the common affairs of life! The usual course of men's conduct belies their words, and shows that their assent in these matters is some unaccountable operation of the mind between disbelief and conviction, but approaching nearer to the former than the latter."—Thus generalizing from his knowledge of the private sentiments of these betrayers of their Lord, these preachers of the Gospel, honoring the reviler of their Saviour, whose talents and worldly respectability added to their evil influence, he became firmly convinced that "priests of all religion are the same," seeking merely the gratification of their own sordid and selfish passions and propensities.

The "careless inimitable beauties of Hume," as they are styled by Gibbon, that is to say, his solecisms, his Scotticisms, his Gallicisms, his violation of the rules of English grammar, and still more of English idiom, were criticised with some severity by Dr. Priestley, in his "English Grammar," the rarest of his productions. "The mere language of an historian," as Dr. Arnold observes, "will furnish us with something of a key to his mind—will tell us, or at least give us cause to presume, in what his main strength lies, and in what he is deficient."

Hume's language shows us that his main strength lies in his art of rhetorical persuasion—in his striving always to lead the hearer to form inferences beyond his words—in his being able to throw out his written discourse with the ease of conversation, avoiding its triviality—and in a thorough appreciation of the respect which an author gains, who can neither be depreciated for vulgarity nor ridiculed for bombast. On the other hand, Hume's language equally discloses his deficiency in historical knowledge, evinced by his inability to relate his history in appropriate diction: he wants the happy medium between that paraphrase which obliterates the character of the original, and the untrue fidelity, which even still more would disguise its real features. Whoever writes the history of remote times, is virtually a translator; and a strict and literal translation fully meets the meaning of the German term. It is an übersetzung, an oversetting. Translation, it has been well observed, is "a problem, how, two languages being given, the nearest approximation may be made in the second, to the expression of ideas already conveyed through the medium of the first." Perhaps the worst solution is the conceit of rendering sound for sound, in which the sound usually ceases to be an echo of the sense. Speak, in translating from Norsk or Anglo-Saxon, of the stink of a rose, that is to say, the rose's smell—the dream of a fiddle instead of its tone—the green beam for the growing tree—the smear-monger for the butter-merchant;—represent a mother as lamenting that her knave's lungs are addled, instead of her boy being ill of consumption;—describe the preacher holding forth from his pulpit as the beadle spelling from the steeple;—or, recurring to the original sense, when sound fails you, praise the excellent taste of his majesty of Bavaria in erecting the marble slaughter-house to the honor of Germania's worthies—such Teutonisms would not add to the clearness of our ideas. Very insidious, in all cases, are the deceptions suggested by titles of dignity, designations connected with state or office, of which the signification changes so rapidly from age to age, whilst the symbol remains the same. Dominus, or lord, conveys in the originals no peculiar notion of pre-eminence. It is sufficiently humble in the familiar compound of landlord; but speak of the lord of the land, and what a vision it raises of feudal dignity! In words which, according to the laws of language, you must employ, the great difficulty consists in guarding against ambiguities, arising from the change of meaning. Parliament is not a senate occupied in making speeches and passing laws, but the king, enthroned at the head of his great court of remedial justice; a bishop's palace, nothing regal, but a place, a mansion; throne, unconnected with royalty, and only the official seat of the prelate. The historian should consider himself as an interpreter, standing between two nations, and he cannot well execute his task, unless he has lived with both. He must be familiarized, not merely with their language, but with their habits, and customs, and thoughts. He must be able to reduce all the conventional phrases of society into truth, to know when the speech which makes the roof resound means nothing—and be equally able to find the expressive meaning of silence. A very useful introduction to the study of patristical latinity—a main source, together with the Vulgate, of the mediæval idioms—will be found in Mr. Woodham's Tertullian. It is unnecessary to remark that the baser latinity of the mediæval writers differs widely from that of classical authors; but the discrepancy lies far deeper than the adoption of barbarous words, whose signification can be disclosed by a glossary, or the solecisms which can be corrected by grammatical rules. Their rough refectory—and kitchen—Latin, came natural to them; they thought in it; hence, though employing uncouth and ungraceful language, they expressed themselves, when needed, with terseness and power. It also exhibits strong idiomatic peculiarities, not merely of individuals, but of æras. Anglo-Norman latinity differs much from the later Plantagenet latinity. Compare, for example, a few sentences of Ordericus Vitalis, or William of Malmesbury, with the pseudo-Inglulphus, forged, as we have shown, subsequently to the reign of Edward II.,* or Knighton. Hume, compiling chiefly from dull and vapid translations and compilations, and quite unable to catch a distinct perception of the originals, never approaches to the truth of historical diction, though he fully attains its rhetorical beauty.

Helped onwards by such guides as Carte and Tyrrell, it was impossible that so acute a writer as Hume could commit any palpable blunder in the main facts of his history; but he absolutely teems with all the errors which can be committed by talent, when endeavoring to disguise ignorance by putting on the airs of knowledge. Hume's history is made out of the cast of a cast, in which all the sharpness of the original has been lost. He gives great effect to the dull and rounded forms, by touching up the figures with his chisel, and recutting them so as to suit his conception; but this process, cleverly as it may be executed, only denaturalizes them the more.

We are amused at the absurdity of the romancers of the middle ages, who portray Alexander in full armor, and Nectanebus hearing mass in the Temple of Termagaunt. These anachronisms, the proofs of a total misconception of the Grecian age, are not a whit greater than when Hume speaks of "Anglo-Saxon gentlemen." The notion of a gentleman is a complex idea, entirely belonging to our own times—it implies courtesy of manners, education, a qualification of property not defined by pounds, shillings, and pence, but which places him above poverty, though not necessarily in opulence; and belongs to a state of society which never could have existed in the Anglo-Saxon age—nor could the term ever have been employed by any writer who had the Saxon Chronicle before him.

The Gallicism Tiberiade reveals Hume travelling to Tiberias in the Holy Land, under the guidance of the Abbé, and not of William of Tyre.

Edwin, in Hume's History, retires "to his estates in the North, with the view of commencing an insurrection"—just as a Cumberland squire might have done in the '45. Possibly Hume may have found in Rapin, that Edwin fled to his états. Unless Hume's readers obtain information elsewhere, it will be difficult for them to understand that Edwin retreated to his great feudal earldom, as it would be called, which he possessed with quasi-regal power.

Another example is somewhat more complicated. What confidence would be placed in a writer, who, expatiating upon the policy of our own times, were to say that landed property may be recovered, by filing a bill in the Court of Common Pleas, or bringing an ejectment in the Court of Chancery? True, this is a misapplication of mere technical terms, but the technicality involves essentials: a writer thus blundering, would at once exhibit himself as woefully incompetent to discuss the merits or demerits of our jurisprudence. Hume, in stating that Henry II. "admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by an assize or jury of twelve freeholders," as if the terms were synonymous, displays exactly the same species of ignorance. The assize was an array of recognitors of twelve knights, elected by four other knights, under a special ordinance of Henry II.; the jury was summoned by the sheriff, by assent of the parties. The difference between the assize and the jurata constitutes one of the most instructive portions of the learning of our ancient law.

Hume is fierce against the middle ages for their ignorance of geography.—"The imperfect communication amongst the kingdoms, and their ignorance of each other's situations, made it impracticable for them to combine in one project or effort."—Hume was no less ignorant of the political geography of those times, without which it is quite as impracticable for an historian to combine his facts for the instruction of his readers. He creates a kingdom of Naples in the twelfth century, when the continental dominions of the King of Sicily consisted of the duchy of Apulia and the principality of Capua. He speaks of Italy and Germany in relation to the disputes between Pope and Emperor. Now his Italy is merely Lombardy. Germany, as we now see it colored on the map, did not then exist. The countries which he means are the territories of the empire, bounded by the Rhone on the one side, and the wilds of the Lithuanians, and Prussians and Sclavonians, on the east.

* Sources of English History, "Quart. Rev.," vol. xxxiv. p. 296; in which article we have spoken fully of Hume's uncritical use of the ancient sources.

Whilst Hume discusses, describes, condemns the manners and customs and ignorance of the middle ages, he, with dogmatic confidence, betrays in every allusion, that he never can remove himself out of the eighteenth century. Unreal ideas of the past are constantly united to a more real sense of the present; his descriptions remind one of a showman's booth in a fair—a scene with daubed temples and dingy groves, and, around and behind, the shops and lamp-posts of the market-place. Thus, speaking of the Anglo-Saxon free pledge, "No man," he says, "could change his habitation without a warrant or certificate from the borsholder of the tithing to which he formerly belonged." Farmer Ethelwolf puts on his great coat, and, going to the shop of Mr. Grimbald, a tithing-man and tobacconist, walks up to the counter, and tells him that he is about to move next Michaelmas, and requests his certificate, which Grimbald duly delivers, and receives a shilling for his pains. This is the train of ideas which Hume's description of the proceeding suggests.

Suppose that an historian, describing the reign of George I., were to observe, "There were not many bills of exchange in circulation in those days, and losses for want of such securities—a sure mark of a rude state of commerce—were very frequent; for the art of copperplate engraving was so little known that you could hardly ever buy blank bills of exchange in the stationers' shops." Even such, is the reasoning of Hume in the following passage:—"And it appears from Glanville, the famous justiciary of Henry II., that, in his time, when any man died intestate, an accident which must have been very frequent when the art of writing was so little known, the king, or the lord of the fief, pretended to seize all the movables, and to exclude every heir, even the children of the deceased—a sure mark of a tyrannical and arbitrary government."

Hume evidently supposed that writing was essential for declaring testamentary intentions. But, according to the jurisprudence of the middle ages, it was not essential; nuncupative testaments, or bequests made by word of mouth, might be equally effectual. Writing was no more needed in the first instance, for the purpose of preventing a man in the reign of Henry II. from dying intestate, than copperplate engraving was in the reign of George I. for the purpose of giving a legal bill of exchange. Practically, the greater proportion of wills in the middle ages were unwritten deathbed declarations, made in the presence of witnesses—who subsequently appeared before a competent authority; and to this circumstance we may trace some of the most marked characteristics of mediæval testamentary dispositions, as distinguished from our own.

When Hume personifies the papal authority in the twelfth century by "the triple crown," and represents the Pontiff, at the same era, as launching his thunders from the "Vatican," he shows that he deserves the same confidence in his knowledge of the papal history, as if, writing the history of France, he were to embody the valor of France during the crusades under the symbol of the tricolor, or describe St. Louis as issuing his ordinances from the Tuileries. The second crown did not appear on the tiara till after Boniface VIII. (1294–1303,) whilst the third was only added in the thirteenth century by Boniface IX. (1389–1404;) and the Vatican never became the official residence of the popes, until the widowhood of Rome ceased, by the return of the pontiffs from Avignon.

In every touch we detect the inaccuracy of the picture. Hume tells us, that, in the twelfth century, parish registers were not regularly kept! Not regularly kept! Parish registers were never kept in any part of the world until the sixteenth century. The only mode by which the Piovano of San' Giovanni, the baptistery of Florence, took an account of the infants whom he baptized, (and all the infants of the city were brought thither,) was by putting beans into a bag—a white bean for a girl, and a black bean for a boy—and then casting them up at the end of the year.

During the Anglo-Saxon period, Hume informs us that "deeds relating to civil transactions, bargains and sales, manumissions of slaves, and the like, were inserted in the blank leaves of the parish Bible," kept, it is to be presumed, in the vestry, printed by his Majesty's printer, and bound in rough calf. We shall soon have to speak of the Bible during the Anglo-Saxon period. If Hume had consulted history with any attention, he would have said that such instruments were occasionally recorded in the blank leaves of a Missal, or the Gospel, or the Psalter, or some other portion of the Scripture, treasured in a great monastery; but the examples are rare, and do not require the prominence which he has bestowed upon them.

Hume's inaccuracies go at once to the competency of the historian—the flaws in the metal, which show that the piece will not stand fire—specks on the rind, which betray the unsoundness of the fruit, rotten to the core.

Our philosopher was free from one sin—the pride which apes humility. His autobiography lies like an epitaph. He discounted his own legacy of posthumous praise, and exonerated his executors from the liability of payment. He extols his own sobriety and his own industry in the strongest terms. Had he these qualifications? If exerted, they would have enabled him, like Carte, to emulate the exactness of the French Benedictines; and his negligence discredits him the more.

Hume the librarian, laboring, like Guthrie, to earn an honest penny by writing for the booksellers at so much a sheet, might have been useful, or at least innocuous.

Hume the metaphysician possessed the rare gift of being able to compare probabilities, and, at the same time, to suspend his judgment. Hence the ability with which he has treated the character of Mary, a question upon which either side may be taken with equal scepticism or equal credulity. If he had been gifted with a truth-seeking mind, this talent would have conducted him to the best principles of historical investigation. He would have disciplined us in the least cultivated branch of historical science, the logic of history.

Hume the politician, as we can fully judge from his slight but able constitutional essays, might have conveyed wise practical lessons through the medium of our national history. Calm and unimaginative, great names had no influence over him; there was no object to which he bowed; he entered the Temple of Fame, refusing to worship any popular idol. Head or stamp would not induce him to receive base metal as precious coin. He who had the courage to designate the works of Locke, and Sidney, and Hoadley, as "compositions the most despicable both for style and matter," was truly able to count the cost of exposing himself to the hostility of literary prejudice and party feeling. No one had shown more clearly than Hume the utter fallacy of the original-compact doctrines: he could admit the lovely vision of a government framed upon philosophical theory, and yet refute the Utopian absurdity of reducing it into practice. Hume was not one of those who repudiate Oxford, and graduate at Laputa. Do we seek a demonstration of the inoperativeness of popular election, as the means of collecting popular opinion—where can more able arguments be found than in Hume?

Hume the travelled scholar, inspired by the ambition of literary fame, the ruling passion, as he tells us, of his life, had it fully in his power to have composed a history, in which an even flow of style, polished though not forcible, a courteous and gentlemanlike dignity, a happy disposition of incidents, and the delicate taste which, preventing his attaining the sublime, always guarded him against the ridiculous, would have furnished a narrative in which instruction pleasantly conveyed might have compensated for the absence of original inquiry. Hume is a great master in historical discourse. He is a consummate Rhetor. As a composition, considered without reference to truth or principle, his Stuart apology is unrivalled.

But all his powers—they were great, and might have been noble—are rendered useless by the consummate Rhetor's continued perversion of history into a panegyric of infidelity. His metaphysical writings have always been more known than read—so dull, that even the zest of doing a wrong thing can hardly now persuade a reader to grapple with their drowsy inanity. Even the warmth and talents of his opponents could never criticise them into popularity. At last he discovered his peculiar talent. It was this acquisition of self-knowledge, and not the opportunities of his office, which induced him, like Voltaire, to adopt history as the more effective vehicle of his opinions; and he fully succeeded. "INFIDELITY FOR THE MIL-LION" is the heading for Hume's history, than which only one other—and is it needful to name Gibbon?—has exerted a more baneful influence upon English literature, and through English literature upon the civilized world. Antipathy to faith had become engrafted upon his moral constitution. Like Gibbon, he was possessed with malignant hatred against all goodness and holiness. "Never lose an opportunity," was the advice given by a kindred spirit, "of placing gunpowder, grain by grain, under the gigantic edifice of superstition, until the mine shall be charged with a sufficient quantity to blow up the whole." Hume did not dare to fire the train. He would have dreaded the smoke and noise of an explosion. Adopting the coarse but forcible expression, suggested by a crime unknown in the "dark ages," and generated in the full blaze of civilization, he always tried to burke religion. Temper, as well as prudence, had from the first beginning rendered him sober. Personal considerations had due influence: he courted not the honors of martyrdom. Opinion imposed some check; law more. In England there was a boundary which could not be quite safely passed. Some examples had occurred sufficient to warn him. Like Aagill, or Toland, or Woolston, or Peter Annet, he might be seduced beyond the bounds of conventional impunity granted to free-thinking, and find himself in the presentment of the grand jury, with a prospect of Newgate and the pillory in the background: far enough off, yet disagreeable objects, looming in the horizon. At Edinburgh, an ecclesiastical prosecution brushed by him. "An overture" was made in the General Assembly, for appointing a committee to call the philosopher before the synod, as the author of books "containing the most rude and open attacks upon the Gospel; and principles evidently subversive even of natural religion and the foundations of morality, if not establishing direct atheism."

A further examination of this very remarkable transaction would exceed our limits: the endeavor thus made by the orthodox members of the Kirk, to testify against the progress of infidelity, was frustrated not by dint of reasoning, but by the indefatigable exertions of his clerical friends. We have seen what high and influential names were numbered amongst them. The strongest argument which these ministers of the Gospel employed on behalf of their client, was, "that Mr. Hume was really no Christian, had not so much as the profession of it, and therefore was to be considered as one who is without, and not a subject of Christian discipline." Thus did the most eminent, in the world's opinion, of the teachers of Christianity in Scotland plead Hume's declared infidelity as the reason for espousing his cause, and protecting him from ecclesiastical censure. Pending the proceedings, the more faithful of the clergy did their duty, by endeavoring to warn their people against him. His chief opponent was Anderson, "the literary champion of the fanatics," who dealt with Hume by "constantly appealing to the Bible, the usual resource of the priest in every difficulty." We take the words of his biographer, as the best exponent of the antagonistic feelings by which Hume was supported or opposed.

Yet Hume did not escape entirely without damage. Infidelity stood between him and the much-coveted professorial chair. By the rebound of the attack made in the General Assembly, he was compelled to resign his librarianship. Though little hurt, he was somewhat scared; and whilst it increased his grim antipathy to the faithful Calvinistic clergy, the "fanatics" and "enthusiasts," he was the more wary in avoiding any very tangible opportunity of falling into their power—a power fast diminishing, but yet sufficiently formidable to disturb the Sybarite on his rose-leaves. Caution, therefore, was always needed: a restraint to which he submitted the more willingly, since he conceived that his own quiet plan of operation would be quite as sure, in the long run, as the more brilliant and sounding measures adopted by the other active members of the philosophical circle, the "sensible, knowing, and polite company, with which Paris abounds more than any other city in the world." He comforted himself in his dying hours with the hope of the ultimate advent of unbelief triumphant. "Have a little patience, good Charon: I have been endeavoring to open the eyes of the public; if I live a few years longer, I may have the satisfaction of seeing the downfall of some of the prevailing systems of superstition."

To this one object, the destruction of "religious fictions and chimeras," all Hume's endeavors were directed. It was the one end and intent of the History, which gives to the whole the epic unity, whence its seductive merit is in great measure derived. Hume's mode of dealing with religion shows the cowardice of his heart: he dreaded lest conviction should come upon him against his will. He was constantly trying to stupify his own conscience, lest the pain of perceiving any reality in things unseen should come on. The first object of Hume is to nullify religion. All the workings of Providence in worldly affairs are denied; or blurred, when he cannot deny them. All active operation of holiness, all sincerity, is excluded. He constantly labors to suppress any belief in belief, as an efficient cause of action: he will rather infer any other influential motive. Silence, argumentation, equivocation, absolute falsity, are all employed with equal dexterity, and in sovereign contempt of all the laws by which the conscience of an historian should be ruled. But if he cannot blot out religion entirely, he lowers, degrades, deforms it; yet he prefers to affect contempt, rather than express absolute aversion; he treats faith rather as a meanness, which the enlightened philosopher is ashamed to notice, than as an enemy who needs to be actively expelled. Ever and anon, however, his hatred becomes apparent; and he forgoes even the conventional decencies of language in the bitterness of his heart. When his so-called history is not an inferential argument against religion, it is an invective. Could the powers of Belial be described more forcibly, than in the following remarkable passage?—"Hume, without positively asserting much more than he can prove, gives prominence to all the circumstances which support his case. He glides lightly over those which are unfavorable to it. His own witnesses are applauded and encouraged; the statements which seem to throw discredit on them are controverted; the contradictions into which they fall are explained away; a clear and connected abstract of their evidence is given. Everything that is offered on the other side is scrutinized with the utmost severity; every suspicious circumstance is a ground for comment and invective; what cannot be denied is extenuated or passed by without notice. Concessions even are sometimes made; but this insidious candor only increases the effect of this vast mass of sophistry."—And in every shape, Hume is the Belial advocate of infidelity.

When reading Hume's History, we must carefully keep in view the meaning of the terms which he employs; his technical language must be translated by turning to his own dictionary—Religion is with Hume either Superstition or Fanaticism. He so applies and counterchanges these opprobrious terms as to include every possible form of Christianity. In the Churches of Rome and England, superstition predominates; in the Calvinistic Churches, which he detested most, fanaticism; though all are equally assailed. When he bombards St. Peter's, his shells glance off upon St. Paul's. His spear pierces through Archbishop Anselm, and pins Archbishop Howley to the wall. The filth with which he bespatters the Lateran Council, defiles the General Assembly. But, alas! each religious body, viewing only the damage done to its opponents, has been insensible of the hurt which its own cause receives from the bitter enemy of their common Head. Too successful has been the policy adopted by him, of "opposing one species of superstition to another," and thus profiting by the dissensions which he helps to raise.

* From Mr. Macaulay's article upon "History," Edinburgh Review, No. xciv., p. 359. We have no hesitation in affixing Mr. Macaulay's name to this admirable and in most respects incontrovertible essay. Since he has not reprinted it in his collection, we trust he will reproduce it in an enlarged form, perhaps reconsidering his judgment of the Greek historians.

All who oppose Hume's political principles—Towers, Stuart, Brodie, Fox, Laing, Allen, Smyth, Macaulay—reproach him with unfairness and insincerity—correct his misrepresentations, brand his crafty perversion of truth. The most lenient, and yet in some respects the most severe, of his critics, Professor Smyth, warns us to be "ever suspicious" of the historian's particular prejudices. Every accusation they prefer against him, by reason of his fraudulent partisanship of prerogative, applies with far greater force against him as a fraudulent opponent of revelation.

Hume's estimate of the merit or demerit belonging to any institution—or any individual—is exactly in proportion to the absence of so deleterious an influence as Christianity. Hume is always on his guard; no holiness, no beauty, no purity, no utility, can by any chance betray or seduce him to find an excuse for the sin of religion.

Professor Smyth, warning his readers against the continued fraud and falsity of the "guide and philosopher," and expatiating upon the sagacity and skill displayed by Hume in perverting the authorities whom he employs, proceeds,—

"But what reader turns to consult his references, or examine his original authorities? What effect does this distrust, after all, produce? Practically, none. In defiance of it, is not the general influence of his work on the general reader just such as the author would have wished; as strong and permanent as if every statement and opinion in his History had deserved our perfect assent and approbation?"

"I must confess that this appears to me so entirely the fact, judging from all that I have experienced in myself and observed in others, that I do not conceive a lecturer in history could render (could offer, at least) a more important service to an English auditory than by following Mr. Hume, step by step, through the whole of his account; and showing what were his fair, and what his unfair inferences; what his just representations, and what his improper colorings; what his mistakes, and, above all, what his omissions: in short, what were the dangers, and what the advantages, that must attend the perusal of so popular and able a performance."—Lectures on Modern History, vol. i., pp. 127, 128.

Some few observations and examples will exemplify how truly the Professor's censures are deserved: but we must be content to await an explanation of the principles which justify the public teacher of youth in bestowing the most affectionate and warmest praise upon such a propagator of falsity. Would it not have been desirable than an instructor of the rising generation should pass some censure upon these violations of natural morality, some regret for talents thus misapplied?

Hume's sagacity taught him in most cases to avoid absolute falsehoods. You can rarely apprehend him in flagrant delict. Hume's misrepresentations are usually couched in those vague, broad, general charges which he propounds as certain, without bringing forward any proof. Now, it is very difficult to refute charges so propounded, because their contradiction must always be a negative pregnant, involving counter assertions, which throw the whole burthen of proof upon those who wish to dispel the error. To revert to Euphranor's illustration, if a French writer were to state that the whole scope of our Admiralty orders since the reign of Queen Elizabeth "is directed to the purpose of plunder," there would be no incontrovertible refutation, excepting by producing the whole series of documents. So it is in Hume: his calumnies are couched in those stereotyped phrases, which, through him, and, we may also add, through Robertson, are now adopted as first principles of historical information and knowledge—"ignorance and absurdity;" "days of ignorance;" "disputes of the most ridiculous kind, and entirely worthy of those ignorant and barbarous ages;"—assertions that the clergy "subsisted only by absurdities and nonsense;"—that "nonsense passed for demonstration;"—that "bounty to the Church atoned for every violence against society;" that "the people, abandoned to the worst crimes and superstitions, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed upon them by their spiritual pastors." To demonstrate the prejudice, the unfairness, the wicked untruths of such accusations, the first step in the process must necessarily be to know what they mean. "Ignorance" may be ignorance of evil—absurdities may be the highest truths. According to Hume, belief in a special Providence is a gross absurdity. It is painful to us to be compelled to notice impiety in a conversational tone, but the nature of our subject compels us to do so. In the next place, the general influence of Hume's general propositions can only be counteracted by a faithful development of the practice and doctrine, life and conversation, of the ages and persons so recklessly defamed. The task, we rejoice to say, has been nobly begun by Mr. Maitland, in his Essays upon the Dark Ages, which have appeared in their present form, since this article was first sent to the printer. Terse, witty, powerful in reasoning, pious in spirit, and profoundly learned, Mr. Maitland has, by a well chosen selection of topics, enabled every reader to judge of the gross misrepresentations which have been promulgated by those popular writers, who, in Professor Smyth's words, have hitherto given the tone and the law to the public mind. We trust that such a work as Mr. Maitland's will not be confined to the instruction of readers. Let us hope that it will produce students: encouraging those who, deriving knowledge from original sources by patient assiduity, thence acquire self-reliance and independence of judgment, so much needed in this over-active age, when so many endeavor to be up and doing, and so few sit down and think. For this purpose there must be a diligent study of mediæval divinity.

Considered merely as affording the means of historical information, this pursuit will become indispensable, when, with more philosophy than has hitherto been exerted, we endeavor to penetrate into the moral organization of mediæval society. Are we interested by the structure of the abbey or the cathedral?—Is it not at least as important to become acquainted with the doctrines which were taught by those who ministered at the altar? Our present love of antiquity may lead to unsound conclusions. Many are tempted to a blind and indiscriminate worship of past times, not only shutting their eyes against unfavorable facts, however clearly proved—but ascribing to the middle ages gifts of impeccability and perfect holiness, which revelation teaches us to be incompatible with human nature; others, constituting a more numerous class, are caught by the vulgar bait of antiquarianism. Our attention is in danger of being engrossed by the archæology of the curiosity shops. Unless this tendency be corrected, we shall be overwhelmed with literary dealers in the rococo of history: archæology, if pursued merely with reference to art or decoration, to manners and customs, to incident and romance, is little more. Without doubt, in a subordinate relation, all such inquiries are useful, but they are only secondary and subordinate: it is the bane of sound instruction to consider them in themselves as objects of knowledge. History so treated, substitutes the illuminated miniature of a manuscript, with its bright colors and false perspective, for a real view of the state of society. How has the study of classical antiquity been rendered beneficial to the intellect? It is because the history and philosophy and literature of Greece and Rome have been rendered ethical; because they have been pursued for the purpose of distinguishing between the transitory forms which they assume, and the principles of permanent application and utility which they include. To the Christian teachers of the middle ages we deny the honor and worship which we lavish upon the wise amongst the heathen. In place of seeking the highest utility, we play with the eccentricities and peculiarities which amuse us from their novelty or singularity, which minister to intellectual frivolity, which gratify the ear or the eye—the baubles supplying the subject of a melodrame or the drawing for an album, the arrangement of a tableau, the poetry of an annual, or the frippery of a fancy-ball.

Very important are these doctrinal works in explaining how the comparative paucity of copies of the Holy Scriptures influenced, and, paradoxical as it may appear, promoted, their study during the middle ages. Until about the twelfth century, the productions of the inspired writers were not commonly found otherwise than in separate manuscripts, as is the case in the East at the present day. “So scarce are the copies,” is the remark of a recent traveller, “that I have not found but a single Nestorian, and that was the patriarch, who possessed an entire Bible; even that was in half-a-dozen volumes. One man has the Gospels, another the Epistles, and so on.”* It was, therefore, only with much trouble and expense that a complete set of the detached pieces of Holy Writ could be formed. The donor of the Book of Kings or the Book of Chronicles is recorded as a benefactor in the annals of the monastery. Few libraries before the Hildebrandian era—the great era of revival—possessed Law and Prophets, and historical and poetical books, and Gospels, and Acts, and Epistles, and Apocalypse, transcribed uniformly in the one volume which we call the Bible—a term unknown till about the thirteenth century, such a volume being previously designated as the Bibliotheca, or the Pandects. The scarcity of a complete textual copy of the entire Scriptures—the deep feeling of their inestimable value—the exertions bestowed by monks and clergy for their diffusion—all appear from a remarkable anecdote in the life of St. Ceolfred (ob. 716.) This holy man, the abbot of Wearmouth and Jarrow, caused three Pandects to be copied. Two were placed in his monastery, in order that the whole body of Scriptures might be conveniently ready and at hand for consultation or perusal in any particular chapter; the third he himself conveyed to Rome, and presented to St. Peter's: thus proving equally the value of the volume and the diligence of the Anglo-Saxon Church—Northumbria, so lately a pagan realm, aiding by her industry and learning the capital of the Christian world.

New generations arose; time advanced; the patient industry of the inmates of the Scriptorium multiplied the copies of Holy Writ, until the wider diffusion of Scripture was permitted by a process—art, it cannot be called—so easy, so familiar, so long known, that the concealment of the printing-press from mankind until these our latter ages, is one of the most remarkable instances, revealing to us the constant control exercised over human intellect by the Power from whom it flows. In the mean while, and until printing was thus called into operation, the whole course of religious instruction consisted in a constant endeavor to imbue the learned clergy, and the unlettered laity, with the knowledge of the Word of God. Hence, for the clergy, the formation of the Concordance, binding, as it were, the Holy Scriptures into one whole, and rendering the inspired writers their own commentators; and it was in the “darkness” of the thirteenth century, that, by Hugo de Sancto Caro, this great and laborious work was performed. Hence, for the laity, the common use of pictures. Objectionable as such a mode of instruction may become, it was then beneficially employed, as the means of realizing an historical knowledge of Holy Writ. How few amongst us identify, in our own minds, the personality of the individuals, and the actual occurrence of the events, mentioned or recorded in sacred history! How rarely do we strengthen ourselves in the conviction that the Deluge is as real an event as the fire of London! Historical belief and doctrinal belief are inseparably combined: take either away, the other fails. Reject the historical event, and you destroy the sacrament which it typifies. Even the mystery or stage-play, in which the events of Scripture were dramatized, was beneficial. In certain states of society, there is scarcely any sense of the ridiculous. The rude dramas which amuse the half-scoffing antiquary, conveyed sound instruction to the wondering multitude. The more the volumes of the Holy Scriptures were scarce, the more was Scripture knowledge valued. Scriptural knowledge acquired activity from its concentration. The narrowness of the stream added to the force of the current; what was lost in breadth was gained in intensity. Scripture was forced upon the reader, upon the hearer, upon the monk in his cell, upon the crowd assembled round the cross. Consult the mediæval sermons and homilies: what are they but continuous lectures upon the Holy Scriptures! The Song of Songs alone furnishes eighty-six sermons to St. Bernard, of singular excellence. Their treatises of divinity, properly so called (for the scholastic dialectics belong to a different class) overflow with scriptural knowledge; and generally may be designated as Scripture extracts connected by ample glosses and expositions. Above all, was the Bible brought home to the people by the constant appeal to Holy Writ—in discourse or in argument, in theory or in practice, for support or example—connecting it with all the affairs of human life. The Scriptures entered as an element of all learning, of all literature, of jurisprudence, and of all knowledge. Theology was honored as the queen of science. The opening speeches to Parliament were scriptural discourses; and this circumstance has been alluded to with ridicule, by the very writers who most strongly condemn the middle ages for their neglect and concealment of Holy Writ. Every theory, every investigation, was based and founded upon Scripture; for, in the memorable words of the venerable Primate of our Church, mankind truly and practically acknowledged the all-important duty of “approaching the oracles of Divine truth with that humble docility, and that prostration of the understanding and the will, which are indispensable to Christian instruction.”* Can we say that the far greater diffusion of scriptural knowledge in our times produces that vital result? Do we, like them, obey the whole tenor of the volume, which teaches us the duty of bringing intellect into continual subjection to revelation? Considered merely as a book, none was perused with greater delight—no poem had so great a hold upon the imagination. The Bible, in all its variety, was presented to them, not as a huge bundle of texts, but as one wonderful epic beginning before time—ending in eternity.

* Grant on the Nestorians, p. 67.

It would require years—years well employed—to investigate the literature of mediæval divinity. Even the most moderate tincture is sufficient to correct the amazing misrepresentations which have been propagated respecting the religious morality of the middle ages; and, with respect to Hume's wholesale falsities, take the following passage:—

“However little versed in the Scriptures, they [the ecclesiastics] had been able to discover that, under the Jewish law, a tenth of all the produce of land was conferred on the priesthood; and forgetting, what they themselves taught, that the moral part only of that law was obligatory on Christians, they insisted that this donation conveyed a perpetual property, inherent, by divine right, in those who officiated at the altar. During some centuries, the whole scope of sermons and homilies was directed to this purpose: and one would have imagined, from the general tenor of these discourses, that all the practical parts of Christianity were comprised in the exact and faithful payments of tithes to the clergy.”

Such are the accusations preferred by the philosopher, who, denying the miracles of the Gospel, confessed that he had never read through the New Testament. Of the knowledge possessed by the clergy, whom the sneering enemy of revelation represents as “little versed in Scripture,” we have already spoken. With respect to the accusation which charges the entire body of Christian teachers with the foul and deliberate perversion of the whole scope of their teaching, for the purpose of ministering to their own sordid avarice, it is not merely an untruth, but an untruth destitute even of a pretence by which it could be suggested. In no one of the sermons or homilies of Bede, Ælfric, Gregory, Anselm, Bernard, Gerson, or Thomas à Kempis, (names amongst the most important of the ministers of the Gospel during the middle ages,) or in the treatise of Alan de Lisle, destined for the instruction of the extempore preacher, is there a single passage by which the payment of ecclesiastical alms or tithes is recommended, enforced, or enjoined. Nor do we believe that, if the whole body of mediæval divinity, printed or manuscript, were ransacked, any evidence could be found by which the calumny could be in the slightest degree sustained. The historian would not have dared to broach the falsity, had he not been able to rely upon an ignorance amongst his readers, to which his own impudence could be the only parallel.

As history unfolds, and each successive personage is put upon his trial before Hume, he very carefully examines into character. Can it be shown that king or statesman has reviled the Word of God, oppressed the priesthood, robbed the church—then the judge charges the jury to take the evidence of good character into consideration. If, on the contrary, witnesses come forward, showing that the culprit has been guilty of Christianity—then, in passing sentence, this previous conviction calls for aggravation of punishment. We have thus, in all Hume's delineations of character—delineations far more frequently displaying the common-place contrasts of a theme, than the skill of a philosophical inquirer—a constant source of falsification. "Rufus," says Hume, "was a violent and tyrannical prince, a perfidious, encroaching, and dangerous neighbor, an unkind and ungenerous relation, and was equally prodigal and rapacious in the management of his treasury. If he possessed abilities, he lay so much under the government of impetuous passions, that he made little use of them in his administration." Yet Hume lets him off with many a good word. His open profaneness is excused, as the result of "sharp wit;" and, with great kindness and consideration, he warns us, that we must be "cautious of admitting every thing related by the monkish historians to the disadvantage of this prince;" he, Hume, having already admitted and enlarged upon every fact related by the monkish historians, which shows his profligate and reckless tyranny.

* Charge delivered to the Clergy of London, at the Primary Visitation, 1814, by William, Lord Bishop of London.

Because Henry I. persecuted Archbishop Anselm, he receives Hume's high praise for his "prudence and moderation of temper;" the proofs of these good qualities being, e. g., his cutting off the noses of his grandchildren, the offspring of his illegitimate daughter Juliana, and plucking out the eyes of Lucas de la Barre.

Whenever it is possible, by misrepresentation, or by concealment, or by sophistry, to calumniate any individual exercising religious functions, or to depreciate any one in whose character religion forms an element, or to carp at any action grounded upon religion, Hume never fails to improve the opportunity. We have thus a perpetual source of falsification in the biographies of the leading personages. Ecclesiastics were compelled, from their situation, to take a prominent part in the business of the world; they were statesmen, politicians; now the leaders of opposition, now the prime ministers of the sovereign. Whether it was expedient that the members of the hierarchy should be called upon thus to mix in secular affairs, whether it were a privilege or a burthen, or a temptation, are questions which we shall not discuss. But this constant unfairness ruins the mere historical narrative.

Take, for example, Lanfranc. "Lanfranc was a Milanese monk." Lanfranc was not a Milanese monk; he was born in an independent and hostile state, the city of Pavia. Hume, turning to Guthrie's Grammar, and finding that Pavia was included in the Duchy of Milan, supposed that it was equally so in the eleventh century. Moreover, though Lanfranc was a monk, he did not become so till long after he had crossed the Alps, when he professed in the rising monastery of Bec Hellouin: afterwards he became abbot of Caen, whence he was translated to Canterbury. "This prelate was rigid in defending the prerogatives of his station; and, after a long process before the Pope, he obliged Thomas, a Norman monk, who had been appointed to the see of York, to acknowledge the primacy of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Where ambition can be so happy as to cover his enterprises, even to the person himself, under the appearance of principle, it is the most incurable and inflexible of human passions," &c.—True enough, but the maxim, ingeniously hitched in between the account of Lanfranc's contest and a falsified statement of his zeal for the papacy, does not apply to either. Whether Canterbury or York should possess the primacy was a mixed question of legal right and constitutional privilege. The primacy had been long disputed, upon grounds as strictly technical as those which give an individual a right to an estate. York acted with considerable pertinacity. Some of the earlier evidences were ambiguous. Adverse possession might, in some cases, be surmised; the suit was to be decided, therefore, by the construction of legal instruments and by evidence. Archbishop Lanfranc brought his suit against Archbishop Thomas, in the same manner as two peers might have contested the possession of a barony in Parliament. Moreover, the claim was one which Lanfranc could not surrender. Had he yielded, he would have sacrificed the rights of his successors, the liberties of the English people. As primate, he was the first member of the Great Council of the realm. Through the Archbishop, upon each coronation, the compact was concluded between the sovereign and the subject. Furthermore, Lanfranc's success established the principle, that whatever rights had legally subsisted before the Conquest, were to be preserved and maintained, unaffected by the accession of the new dynasty. Lanfranc, maintaining the rights of his see, protected all his successors—all his order. It is they who, at the present time, are still reaping the benefit: it was their battles which Lanfranc fought. The decision given in Lanfranc's case governed all similar cases; and, followed by the resistance of his successor Anselm to the spoliation and oppressions of Rufus and Beaucerk, protected the rights of every diocese and diocesan, every dean and deanery, every parish priest and parish throughout the kingdom. Every churchman in England holds his preferment as the heir of Lanfranc and of Anselm.

Hume accuses Lanfranc of "zeal in promoting the interests of the papacy, by which he himself augmented his own authority." But the fact is, that Lanfranc in no manner augmented his authority through the Papacy; and his conduct contributed greatly to keep the Church of England in that state of isolation from the other portions of the Western Church, which so remarkably characterizes the Conqueror's reign. William, who had been willing enough to support his claims by the sanction of Alexander II., presented a firm front to Hildebrand. "No Pope shall be acknowledged in England without my assent," was the declaration of the Conqueror. Lanfranc, the "Milanese monk," acted so completely in conformity to this declaration, as to lead to the supposition that he obeyed a course which he himself had advised. The "process" before the Pope went off without effect. The contest between him and the Archbishop of York was decided as if it were entirely a civil question, by the King and the Great Council or Parliament—and not by papal authority, as Hume leads his readers to suppose. When Guibert of Ravenna was appointed to the papacy by the Emperor, Lanfranc maintained an armed neutrality. He refused to acknowledge Clement III., and did not send his adhesion to Gregory VII. Had Lanfranc's successors adopted the same course, England would have been lost to Rome. Yet all these important facts are concealed by Hume, in order to establish a charge of "zeal for the papacy." Hume's notice of Lanfranc's learning is confined to a silly sneer: "he wrote a defence of the real presence against Berengarius; and in those ages of stupidity and ignorance he was greatly applauded for that performance." Lanfranc's treatise possesses singular dialectic acuteness and dexterity. Without being in the least convinced by his arguments, we may fully admire his skill. Lanfranc contended for doctrines which he conceived he was bound to support: he appealed to public opinion, and by argument gained the victory.

But Lanfranc's fame had been long since established; it did not depend upon his polemic discussions. Lanfranc led the intellectual movement of his age: Lanfranc was acknowledged to be the great teacher of Latin Christendom. Hume remarks, that "knowledge and liberal education were somewhat more common in the southern countries." But the seat of liberal education was more truly in the North. From the remotest parts, not only of Latin or Western Europe, but even of Greece, students of all classes and ages resorted to Bec Hellouin, as to another Athens. Removed from his university, for such his humble monastery had become, to Caen, and thence exalted to the primacy of England, his pastoral duties compelled a new application of his literary labors. He entered a less ambitious, but not less useful career. Lanfranc now employed himself upon his edition of the Holy Scriptures. The texts of the biblical books had been miserably corrupted by the ignorance of the later Anglo-Saxon transcribers, one of the many results of the calamitous invasion of the Danes, which no exertion had been able wholly to remove. Much of this correction was effected by Lanfranc's own application and learning: manuscripts, with his autograph corrections, existed in France previous to the Revolution; others may perhaps lurk in our libraries. But he also provided, as far as he could, for futurity—by training up many disciples for the same important task. Of Lanfranc's character and influence as prime minister, Hume says absolutely nothing. Lanfranc's letters or despatches, to which the historian never makes a single reference, display his vigilance and his charity. Whilst defending the power of his sovereign he became a father to the English. He rejoiced to adopt the name of Englishman. Rufus was educated by Lanfranc. One of the most remarkable proofs of the archbishop's intellectual power, and of the good use to which he turned that power, was that, so long as he lived, the wickedness and tyranny of his pupil were entirely restrained. Hence Lanfranc's death was lamented as the greatest calamity which England could sustain. Of all these characteristics, not a word is to be found in Hume. Concerning all these practical effects of good sense, and learning, and talent, and piety, exhibited in the most distinguished character of the early Anglo-Norman era, the historian of England is entirely silent.

Bentham amused himself, and his readers also, by proposing that criminals should be exhibited to public contempt, with masks emblematical of the bad passions which seduced them to crime. Hume, as a writer, has anticipated the utilitarian jurist. He has two sets of such masks, in which he usually exposes his churchmen to scorn and contempt: the wolf-mask, and the fox-mask. Gregory the Great is shown up as wolf: the unwearying and successful labors of the pontiff for the conversion of the English, arise simply from raving, craving ambition. Augustine, the apostle of the English, wears the fox-mask: his mission is a consistent and successful course of hypocrisy. Whenever religion can be laid to the charge of any individual, conclude him, says Hume, to be either knave or fool: consider it as an incontrovertible principle, "that a general presumption lies against either the understanding or the morals, of any one who is dignified with the title of Saint in those ignorant ages."

When victimizing Pope Gregory, or Augustine, or Lanfranc, Hume knew he was on the safe side, and that his readers would go with him; but what, if, by a strange contingency, some individual thoroughly besotted and perverted by faith, should happen to be a popular favorite? Now it does so happen that Hume, by the pressure from without, feels himself under the awkward and imperative obligation of joining in the homage universally rendered to an individual, holding a proud and eminent station in English history, but of whom it must be most truly said that "superstition" was the ruling passion. The materials for the biography of this bigot are peculiarly ample. Not merely do the contemporary historians abound with minute details of his life and actions, but we possess also his own declarations of his sentiments, for he happens to have been an author, as well as a patron of literature. Moreover, as a royal author, he speaks in the public documents dictated by his own heart and mind. From these materials, so unusually trustworthy and abundant, and which form the sources of this sovereign's history, we can collect that he "received every word uttered by the clergy as the most sacred oracles," and "admitted all their pretensions to superior sanctity." "Stupidly debased," he was "wholly given up to an abject and illiberal devotion." In every trial, every emergency, this "weak and superstitious prince trusted to supernatural assistance:" "his whole mind was sunk into the lowest submission and abasement, and devoted to the monkish virtues of mortification, penance, and humility." If there was any individual in whom, more than another, all the miserable absurdity of superstition is thus exemplified, it is in this prince. Yet, in spite of all this ignorance and folly, it was needful that Hume, if he wished to preserve the favor of his readers, should represent him—and it is Alfred of whom we are speaking—as "the model of that perfect character, which, under the denomination of a sage or wise man, philosophers have been fond of delineating, rather as a fiction of their imagination than in hopes of ever seeing it really existing;" and as "the wisest and best prince that had ever adorned the annals of any nation."

What, therefore, was to be done in this dilemma? how was Alfred to be rendered such a sage, such a wise man, as the philosopher could applaud? The process was quite easy. In Hume's very elaborate life of Alfred, which occupies one fourth of the "History of England," up to that period, he has concealed every passage, every fact, every incident, every transaction, displaying that active belief in Christianity, which governed the whole tenor and course of Alfred's life. The sedulous care which Hume has bestowed, in obscuring and deleting the memorials of Alfred's Christianity, may be judged of by the three following specimens:—

"He usually divided his time into three portions; one was employed in sleep and the refectation of his body by diet and exercise; another, in the dispatch of business; a third, in study and devotion . . . and by such a regular distribution of his time, though he often labored under great bodily infirmities, this martial hero, who fought in person fifty-six battles by sea and land, was able, during a life of no extraordinary length, to acquire more knowledge, and even to compose more books, than most studious men, though blessed with the greatest labor and application, have in more fortunate ages, made the object of their uninterrupted industry."

Without containing anything which is absolutely false, the above passages contain nothing which is true. Alfred's mind and exertions, according to the impression produced by Hume, were all but wholly engrossed by his temporal concerns: the regular distribution of his time was solely intended to enable him to combine the character of an active warrior and a vigilant sovereign with that of a literary student. Whereas the whole end and intent of Alfred's course of life, of which one half was given to God, was to combine the active duties of a sovereign with the strict devotion of a recluse; to keep his heart out of the world, in which he was compelled, by God's appointment, to converse—to bear the crown as his cross; so that the performance of his duties towards God might not be rendered a temptation for shrinking from those labors and responsibilities which God had imposed.

"Alfred set apart a seventh portion of his own revenue for maintaining a number of workmen, whom he constantly employed in rebuilding the ruined cities, castles, palaces, and monasteries. Even the elegancies of life were brought to him from the Mediterranean and the Indies; and his subjects, by seeing those productions of the peaceful arts, were taught to respect the virtues of justice and industry, from which alone they could arise."

Who, in this narrative, could discover that Alfred set apart one half of his entire revenue for pious purposes, in order that, so far as his station admitted, he might fulfil the obligation of poverty? *

* Stinted as we are for space, we cannot, as we should wish, bring before the reader the passages from the original writers, which would show how entirely all trustworthiness must be denied to Hume. In the following extracts, relating to the employment of Alfred's revenues, besides suppressing the application of one half to religious purposes, he has falsified the portion relating to the expenditure upon the workmen. Asser says nothing whatever of monasteries in his account of the appropriation of the building-third of the secular portion of Alfred's revenue, (being one sixth of the whole revenue, and not one seventh.) This sixth was employed upon secular buildings, probably fortresses or bridges, or other public works; but as Hume might apprehend that some of his readers would recollect Alfred did found two monasteries of great celebrity, and repair many others, he has artfully introduced them as an incidental item in the general estimates of the expenditure.

"His ita definitis, solito suo more, intra semetipsum cogitabat, quid adhuc addere potuisset, quod plus placeret ad piam meditationem; non inaniter incepta, utiliter inventa, utilis servata est: nam jamdudum in lege scriptum audierat, Dominum decimam sibi multipliciter redditurum promississe; atque fideliter servasse, decimamque sibi multipliciter redditurum fuisse. Hoc exemplo instigatus, et antecessorum morem volens transcendere, dimidiam servitii sui partem, diurni scilicet, et nocturni temporis; nec non etiam dimidiam partem omnium divitarum, quæ annualiter ad eum cum justitia moderanter acquisitæ pervenire consueverant, Deo devote et fideliter toto cordis affectu, pius mediator se daturum sponndit; quod et quantum potest humana discretio discernere et servare, subtiliter ac sapienter adimplere studuit. Sed ut solito suo more cautus evitaret, quod in alio divine Scripturæ loco cautum est; si recte offeras, recte autem non divides, peccas: quod Deo libenter deoverat, quo modo recte dividere posset, cogitavit: et, ut dixit Salomon, Cor regis in manu Domini, id est, consilium; consilio divinitus invento omnium unius cujusque anni censuum successum bifarie, primitus ministros suos dividere æqua lance imperavit."

A very interesting account of the application of the first third of the half amongst his soldiery and household being given, the coeval historian proceeds:—

"Talibus itaque primam de tribus prædictis partibus partem, unicuique tamen secundum propriam dignitatem, et etiam secundum proprium ministerium largiebatur: secundam autem operatoribus, quos ex multis gentibus

"Sensible that the people at all times, especially when their understandings are obstructed by ignorance and bad education, are not much susceptible of speculative instruction, Alfred endeavored to convey his morality by apologues, parables, stories, apophthegms, couched in poetry; and besides propagating amongst his subjects former compositions of that kind which he found in the Saxon tongue, he exercised his genius in inventing works of like nature, as well as in translating from the Greek the elegant fables of Æsop. He also gave Saxon translations of Orosius and Bede's histories; and of Boethius concerning the Consolations of Philosophy."

In this enumeration of the works produced by Alfred, or under his direction, Hume, extracting from Spelman's Life, in which the catalogue is complete, quietly leaves out all such as are contaminated by Christianity. All Alfred's translations of the Pastoral of St. Gregory—the Dialogues of the same Pope—the Soliloquies of St. Augustine—the Psalms—several other portions of the Bible—and his "Hand-Book"—(selections from the Scriptures, with commentaries and reflections,) constantly borne about him—and to which he added at every interval of leisure, even in the midst of his secular employments. The whole object of Alfred's instruction was intended for the diffusion, not of literature in its modern sense, but of such portions of human knowledge as might be rendered subservient to Faith. Hume, by repainting Alfred's portrait in coarse and gaudy colors, has thus daubed out all the characteristics of Alfred's individuality—his religious foundations, his devotional charity—his labors for the diffusion of the Scriptures—his constant seeking comfort and support from divine truth—his bodily penances and mortifications—and, above all, that, as king and legislator, Alfred entirely based his laws upon the Bible, declaring to his people that immutable truth collectos et comparatos propemodum innumerabiles habebat in omni terreno edificio edoctos; tertiam autem ejusdem partem advenis ex omni gente ad eum advenientibus, longe propeque positis, et pecuniam ab illo exigentibus, etiam et non exigentibus, unicuique secundum propriam dignitatem mirabili dispensatione laudabiliter, et (sicut scriptum est, Hilarem patorem diligit Deus) hilariter impendebat.

"Secundum vero patrem omnium divitiarum suarum, quæ annuiter ad eum ex omni censu perveniebant, et in fisco reputabantur (sicut jam paulo ante commemoravimus) plena voluntate Deo derivit, et in quatuor partibus etiam curiose suos ministros illam dividere imperavit; ea conditione, ut prima pars illius divisionis pauperibus uniuscujusque gentis, qui ad eum veniebant, discretissime erogaretur: memorabat etiam in hoc, quantum humana discretio custodire poterat, illius sancti Papæ Gregorii observantiam esse sententiam, qua discretam mentionem dividende elemosynæ ita dicens agebat: Nec parvum cui multum: nec multum cui parvum: nec nihil cui aliquid, nec aliquid cui nihil. Secundam autem duobus monasteriis, quæ ipse fieri imperaverat, et servitibus in his Deo (de quibus paulo ante latius disseruimus;) tertiam scholæ (Oxford University?) quam ex multis sue propriæ gentis nobilibus studiosissimæ congregaverat; quartam circum finitimas in omni Saxonia et Mercia monasteriis, et etiam quibusdam annis per vices in Britannia et Cornubia, Gallia, Armorica, Northymbria, et aliquando etiam in Hybernia, ecclesiis et servis Dei inhabitantibus, secundum possibilitatem suam aut ante distribuit, aut sequenti tempore erogare proposuit, vita sibi et prosperitate salva."—Asser, 66—67.

which no other king or legislator has been sufficiently enlightened to proclaim, that if they obeyed the precepts of Almighty God, no other law would be required. Read Alfred's character as it is presented by Hume to the reader, particularly to the youthful reader, and the "sovereign, the warrior, the politician, and the patron of literature" becomes the counterpart of Frederick of Prussia, whose epithet of "the Great" is the very curse of the kingdom over which he ruled.

Yet one proof more must be given of Hume's falsification of history, resulting from his inveterate hostility against religion. Relating not to the "dark ages," but to a period near and familiar, it will best enable the readers of Hume to comprehend and abhor the deceptions practised upon them by their philosopher and guide. As the moral fraud—for to call it a literary fraud would be far too lenient a designation—which he has perpetrated in his narrative of the death of Charles I., possesses singular interest, and has been wholly unnoticed and undetected, we shall lay the evidence before our readers as fully as the limits of this publication will admit, in order that they may judge for themselves.

Hume quotes, as his groundwork, Herbert's "Memoirs," which he consulted carefully; the copy he used being in the Advocates' library, and containing his pencil-marks; and Walker's "History of Independency."—But he does not quote Lloyd's "History," Whitelocke's "Memorials," and Warwick's "Memoirs," from whence he derived the most important passages relating to the king's interview with his children and his conduct upon the scaffold, including his dying speech; and we cannot think that this suppression of references is the result of accident. We give the whole of Hume's narrative in continuity; and request our readers will take the trouble to read it attentively, and then to read the authorities, to which we have made references in Hume's text, with equal attention. From the latter we have extracted all the most important passages.

HUME'S NARRATIVE.

(I.)—"Three days were allowed the king between his sentence and his execution. This interval he passed with great tranquillity, chiefly in reading and devotion.

(II.)—"All his family that remained in England were allowed access to him. It consisted only of the Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Gloucester; for the Duke of York had made his escape. Gloucester was little more than an infant: the princess, notwithstanding her tender years, showed an advanced judgment; and the calamities of her family had made a deep impression upon her. After many pious consolations and advices, the king gave her in charge to tell the queen, that, during the whole course of his life, he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her; and that his conjugal tenderness and his life should have an equal duration.

(III. IV.)—"To the young duke, too, he could not forbear giving some advice, in order to season his mind with early principles of loyalty and obedience towards his brother, who was so soon to be his sovereign. Holding him on his knee, he said, 'Now they will cut off thy father's head.' At these words the child looked very steadfastly upon him. 'Mark, child! what I say: they will cut off my head! and perhaps make thee a king: but mark what I say, thou must not be a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers' heads when they can catch them! and thy head too they will cut off at last! therefore, I charge thee, do not be made a king by them!' The duke, sighing, replied, 'I will be torn in pieces first!' So determined an answer from one of such tender years, filled the king's eyes with tears of joy and admiration.

(V. VI.)—"Every night, during this interval, the king slept sound as usual; though the noise of workmen, employed in framing the scaffold, and other preparations for his execution, continually resounded in his ears. The morning of the fatal day (30th Jan.) he rose early; and calling Herbert, one of his attendants, he bade him employ more than usual care in dressing him, and preparing him for so great and joyful a solemnity. Bishop Juxon, a man endowed with the same mild and steady virtues by which the king himself was so much distinguished, assisted him in his devotions, and paid the last melancholy duties to his friend and sovereign.

(VII. VIII.)—"The street before Whitehall was the place destined for the execution: for it was intended, by choosing that very place, in sight of his own palace, to display more evidently the triumph of popular justice over royal majesty. When the king came upon the scaffold, he found it so surrounded with soldiers that he could not expect to be heard by any of the people: he addressed, therefore, his discourse to the few persons who were about him; particularly Colonel Tomlinson, to whose care he had lately been committed, and upon whom, as upon many others, his amiable deportment had wrought an entire conversion. He justified his own innocence in the late fatal wars, and observed that he had not taken arms till after the Parliament had enlisted forces; nor had he any other object in his warlike operations than to preserve that authority entire, which his predecessors had transmitted to him. He threw not, however, the blame upon the Parliament; but was more inclined to think that ill instruments had interposed, and raised in them fears and jealousies with regard to his intentions. Though innocent towards his people, he acknowledged the equity of his execution in the eyes of his Maker; and observed, that an unjust sentence, which he had suffered to take effect, was now punished by an unjust sentence upon himself. He forgave all his enemies, even the chief instruments of his death; but exhorted them and the whole nation to return to the ways of peace, by paying obedience to their lawful sovereign, his son and successor. When he was preparing himself for the block, Bishop Juxon called to him, 'There is, Sir, but one stage more, which, though turbulent and troublesome, is yet a very short one. Consider, it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven: and there you shall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you hasten, a crown of glory.'—'I go,' replied the king, 'from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can have place.' At one blow was his head severed from his body. A man in a vizor performed the office of executioner: another, in a like disguise, held up to the spectators the head streaming with blood, and cried aloud, This is the head of a traitor!"

HUME'S AUTHORITIES.

(1.) "The king, at the rising of the Court, was with a guard of halberdiers returned to White-hall in a close chair, through King-street, both sides whereof had a guard of foot-soldiers, who were silent as his Majesty pass'd. But shop-stalls and windows were full of people, many of which shed tears, and some of them with audible voices pray'd for the king, who through the privy-garden was carried to his bed-chamber; whence, after two hours space, he was removed to St. James's. * *

"The king now bidding farewell to the world, his whole business was a serious preparation for death, which opens the door unto eternity; in order thereunto, he laid aside all other thoughts, and spent the remainder of his time in prayer and other pious exercises of devotion, and in conference with that meek and learned Bishop Dr. Juxon, who, under God, was a great support to him in that his afflicted condition; and resolving to sequester himself so, as he might have no disturbance to his mind, nor interruption to his meditations, he order'd Mr. Herbert to excuse it to any that might have the desire to visit him. * *

"At this time also came to St. James's Mr. Calamy, Mr. Vines, Mr. Carryl, Mr. Dell, and some other London-Ministers, who presented their duty to the king, with their humble desires to pray with him, and perform other offices of service, if his Majesty pleas'd to accept of 'em. The king return'd them thanks for their love to his soul, hoping that they, and all other his good subjects, would, in their addresses to God, be mindful of him. But in regard he had made choice of Dr. Juxon (whom for many years he had known to be a pious and learned divine, and able to administer ghostly comfort to his soul, suitable to his present condition) he would have none other. These Ministers were no sooner gone, but Mr. John Goodwyn (Minister in Coleman-street) came likewise upon the same account, to tender his service, which the king also thank'd him for, and dismiss'd him with the like friendly answer. * *

"That evening, Mr. Seamour (a gentleman then attending the Prince of Wales in his bed-chamber) by Colonel Hacker's permission, came to his Majesty's bed-chamber door, desiring to speak with the King from the Prince of Wales; being admitted, he presented his Majesty with a letter from his Highness the Prince of Wales, bearing date from the Hague the 23d day of January -48. (Old Style.) Mr. Seamour, at his entrance, fell into a passion, having formerly seen his Majesty in a glorious state, and now in a dolorous; and having kiss'd the king's hand, clasp'd about his legs, lamentably mourning. Hacker came in with the gentleman and was abash'd. But so soon as his Majesty had read his son's sorrowing letter, and heard what his servant had to say, and imparted to him what his Majesty thought fit in return, the Prince's servant took his leave, and was no sooner gone but the king went to his devotion, Dr. Juxon praying with him, and reading some select chapters out of sacred Scripture."—Herbert, p. 117.

(II.) "Morning being come, the Bishop was early with the king, and after prayers his Majesty broke the seals open, and shew'd them what was contain'd in it; there were diamonds and jewels, most part broken Georges and Garters. You see (said he) all the wealth now in my power to give my two children. Next day Princess Elizabeth, and the Duke of Gloucester, her brother, came to take their sad farewell of the king their father, and to ask his blessing. This was the 29th of Jan. The princess being the elder, was the most sensible of her royal father's condition, as appear'd by her sorrowful look and excessive weeping; and her little brother seeing his sister weep, he took the like impression, though, by reason of his tender age, he could not have the like apprehension. The king rais'd them both from off their knees; he kiss'd them, gave them his blessing, and setting them on his knees, admonish'd them concerning their duty and loyal observance to the queen their mother, the prince that was his successor, love to the Duke of York, and his other relations. The king then gave them all his jewels, save the George he wore, which was cut in an onyx with great curiosity, and set about with 21 fair diamonds, and the reverse set with the like number; and again kissing his children, had such pretty and pertinent answers from them both, as drew tears of joy and love from his eyes; and then praying God Almighty to bless 'em, he turned about, expressing a tender and fatherly affection. Most sorrowful was this parting, the young princess shedding tears and crying lamentably, so as mov'd others to pity, that formerly were hard-hearted; and at opening the bed-chamber door, the king return'd hastily from the window, and kiss'd 'em and blessed 'em; so parted.

"This demonstration of a pious affection exceedingly comforted the king in this his affliction; so that in a grateful return he went immediately to prayer, the good bishop and Mr. Herbert being only present."—Herbert, p. 125.

(III.) "His (the king's) last words being taken in writing, and communicated to the world by the Lady Elizabeth his daughter, a lady of most eminent endowments, who, though born to the supreme fortune, yet lived in continual tears, and died confined at Carisbrook (whither her father was cheated) in the Isle of Wight—are to this effect:—

"A True Relation of the King's Speech to the Lady Elizabeth and the Duke of Gloucester, the Day before his Death.

"His children being come to meet him, he first gave his blessing to the Lady Elizabeth, and bad her remember to tell her brother James, whenever she should see him, that it was his father's last desire that he should no more look upon Charles as his eldest brother only, but be obedient unto him as his sovereign, and that they should love one another and forgive their father's enemies. Then said the king to her, 'Sweet-heart, you'll forget this.' 'No,' said she, 'I shall never forget it whilst I live;' and pouring forth abundance of tears, promised him to write down the particulars. Then the king, taking the Duke of Gloucester upon his knee, said, 'Sweet-heart, now they will cut off thy father's head;' upon which words the child looked very steadfastly at him, 'Mark, child, what I say; they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king; but mark what I say, you must not be a king, so long as your brothers do live, for they will cut off your brothers' heads, when they can catch them, and cut off thy head too at last, and therefore I charge you do not be made a king by them.' At which the child sighing, said, 'I will be torn in pieces first;' which falling so unexpectedly from one so young, it made the king rejoice exceedingly."

"Another Relation from the Lady Elizabeth's own Hand.

"What the king said to me, Jan. 29th, 1648, being the last time I had the happiness to see him: He told me, he was glad I was come; and although he had not time to say much, yet somewhat he had to say to me, which he had not to another, or leave in writing, because he feared their cruelty was such as that they would not have permitted him to write to me. He wished me not to grieve and torment myself for him, for that it would be a glorious death that he should dye, it being for the laws and liberties of this land, and for maintaining the true Protestant Religion. He bid me read 'Bishop Andrews' Sermons,' 'Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity,' and 'Bishop Laud's Book against Fisher' which would ground me against Popery. He told me he had forgiven all his enemies, and hoped God would forgive them also, and commanded us and all the rest of my brothers and sisters to forgive them. He bid me tell my mother that his thoughts never strayed from her, and that his love should be the same to the last. Withal he commanded me and my brother to be obedient to her, and bid me send his blessing to the rest of my brothers and sisters, with commendation to all his friends. So after he had given me his blessing I took my leave.

"Further, he commanded us all to forgive those people, but never to trust them, for they had been most false to him and to those that gave them power, and he feared also to their own souls; and desired me not to grieve for him, for he should dye a Martyr, and that he doubted not but the Lord would settle his throne upon his son, and that we should be all happier than we could have expected to have been, if he had lived; with many other things, which at present I cannot remember.

"(Signed) ELIZABETH."

—Lloyd's Life of Charles I., 215.

(IV.) "That day the Bishop of London, after prayers, preached before the king: his text was the second chapter of the Romans, and sixteenth verse; the words are, 'At that day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ,' &c., inferring from thence, that although God's judgments be for some deferred, he will nevertheless proceed to a strict examination of what is both said and done by every man; yea, the most hidden thoughts and imaginations of men will most certainly be made to appear at the day of judgment, when the Lord Jesus Christ shall be upon his high tribunal; all designs, tho' conceal'd in this life, shall then be plainly discover'd; he then proceeded to the present sad occasion, and after that, administered the Sacrament. That day the king eat and drank very sparingly, most part of the day being spent in prayer and meditation; it was some hours after night, e'er Dr. Juxon took leave of the king, who willed him to be early with him the next morning.

"After the bishop was gone to his lodging, the king continu'd reading and praying more than two hours after. The king commanded Mr. Herbert to lie by his bed-side upon a pallet, where he took small rest, that being the last night his gracious sovereign and master enjoy'd; but nevertheless the king for four hours, or thereabouts, slept soundly, and awaking about two hours afore day, he opened his curtain to call Mr. Herbert; there being a great cake of wax set in a silver bason, that then, as at all other times, burned all night; so that he perceiv'd him somewhat disturb'd in sleep; but calling him bad him rise; 'For,' said his Majesty, 'I will get up, having a great work to do this day;' however, he would know why he was so troubled in his sleep? He reply'd, 'May it please your Majesty, I was dreaming.' 'I would know your dream,' said the king; which being told, his Majesty said, 'It was remarkable. Herbert, this is my second marriage-day; I would be as trim to-day as may be; for before night I hope to be espoused to my blessed Jesus.' He then appointed what cloaths he would wear; 'Let me have a shirt on more than ordinary,' said the king, by reason the season is so sharp as probably may make me shake, which some observers will imagine proceeds from fear. I would have no such imputation. I fear not Death! Death is not terrible to me. I bless my God I am prepar'd.'

"These, or words to this effect, his Majesty spoke to Mr. Herbert, as he was making ready. Soon after came Dr. Juxon, bishop of London, precisely at the time his Majesty the night before had appointed him. Mr. Herbert then falling upon his knees, humbly beg'd his Majesty's pardon, if he had at any time been negligent in his duty, whilst he had the honor to serve him. The king thereupon gave him his hand to kiss, having the day before been graciously pleased, under his royal hand, to give him a certificate expressing that the said Mr. Herbert was not impos'd upon him, but by his Majesty made choice of to attend him in his bed-chamber, and had serv'd him with faithfulness and loyal affection. At the same time his Majesty also deliver'd him his Bible, in the margin whereof he had with his own hand writ many annotations and quotations, and charged him to give it the Prince so soon as he returned; repeating what he had enjoyed the Princess Elizabeth, his daughter, that he would be dutiful and indulgent to the queen his mother, (to whom his Majesty writ two days before by Mr. Seymour,) affectionate to his brothers and sisters, who also were to be observant and dutiful to him their sovereign; and for as much as from his heart he had forgiven his enemies, and in perfect charity with all men would leave the world, he had advised the prince his son to exceed in mercy, not in rigor; and, as to episcopacy, it was still his opinion, that it is of Apostolique institution, and in this kingdom exercised from the primitive times, and therein, as in all other his affairs, pray'd God to vouchsafe him, both in reference to Church and State, a pious and a discerning spirit; and that it was his last and earnest request, that he would frequently read the Bible, which in all the time of his affliction had been his best instructor and delight; and to meditate upon what he read; as also such other books as might improve his knowledge. . . .

"He likewise commanded Mr. Herbert to give to the Princess Elizabeth 'Doctor Andrews' Sermons,' 'Archbishop Laud against Fisher the Jesuit,' which book (the king said) would ground her against Popery, and 'Mr. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity.' To the Duke of Gloucester, 'King James's Works,' and 'Dr. Hammond's Practical Catechism.'"—Herbert, p. 126.

(V.) "His Majesty then bade him withdraw; for he was about an hour in private with the bishop; and being call'd in, the bishop went to prayer; and reading also the 27th chapter of the Gospel of St. Matthew, which relateth the Passion of our Blessed Saviour. The king, after the service was done, ask'd the bishop 'If he had made choice of that chapter, being so applicable to his present condition?' The bishop reply'd, 'May it please your Gracious Majesty, it is the proper Lesson for the Day, as appears by the Kalender;' which the king was much affected with, so aptly serving as a seasonable preparation for his death that day.

"So as his Majesty, abandoning all thoughts of earthly concerns, continu'd in prayer and meditation, and concluded with a cheerful submission to the will and pleasure of the Almighty, saying, 'He was ready to resign himself into the hands of Christ Jesus, being, with the Kingly Prophet, shut up in the hands of his enemies; as is expressed in the 31st Psalm, and the 8th verse.'"—Herbert, p. 132.

(VI.) "The Chapter of the day fell out to be that of the Passion of our Saviour, wherein it was mentioned that they led him away for envy and crucified their king, which he thought had been the bishop's choosing; but when he found it was the Canon of the Rubric, he put off his hat, and said to the bishop, 'God's will be done.'"—Warwick's Memoirs, p. 385.

(VII.) "Upon the king's right hand went the bishop, and Colonel Tomlinson on his left, with whom his Majesty had some discourse by the way; Mr. Herbert was next the king; after him the guards. In this manner went the king through the Park; and coming to the stair, the king passed along the galleries unto his bed-chamber, where, after a little repose, the bishop went to prayer; which being done, his Majesty bid Mr. Herbert bring him some bread and wine, which being brought, the king broke the manchet, and eat a mouthful of it, and drank a small glassful of claret wine, and then was some time in private with the bishop, expecting when Hacker would the third and last time give warning. Mean time his Majesty told Mr. Herbert which satin night-cap he would use, which being provided, and the king at private prayer, Mr. Herbert addressed himself to the bishop, and told him, 'The king had ordered him to have a white satin night-cap ready, but he was not able to endure the sight of that violence they upon the scaffold would offer the king.' The good bishop bid him then give him the cap, and wait at the end of the banquetting-house, near the scaffold, to take care of the king's body; 'for,' said he, 'that, and his interment, will be our last office.'"—Herbert, p. 134.

(VIII.)—"I think it my duty, to God first, and to my country, for to clear myself, both as an honest man, and a good king, and a good Christian. I call God to witness, to whom I must shortly render an account, that I never did intend to encroach upon their privileges. As to the guilt of those enormous crimes which are laid against me, I hope in God that God will clear me of it. God forbid that I should be so ill a Christian as not to say that God's judgments are upon me. For to show you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is a good man,'—pointing to Dr. Juxon,—'that will bear me witness that I have forgiven all the world, and even those who have been the chief causes of my death: who they are God knows, I do not desire to know; I pray God forgive them. I pray God with St. Stephen, that this be not laid to their charge. Sirs, to put you in the right way, believe it, you will never do right, now

God will never prosper you until you give him his due. You must give God his due by regulating rightly his Church according to his Scripture. A national synod, freely called, freely debating amongst themselves, must do this. I declare before you all that I die a Christian according to the profession of the Church of England as I found it left me by my fathers.'"—Whitelock's Memorials, p. 375.

Has the reader performed our injunction? Has he compared Hume with the original authorities; and will not the comparison convince him, that Hume's narrative, tranquil, clear, and pathetic—unquestionably possessing a very high degree of rhetorical merit—persuasive without the show of argument, solemn without affectation, dignified without grandiloquence, the more impressive from its apparent simplicity—combines every species of untruth: the suppressio veri, the suggestio falsi, and the fallacy, more efficient, because less susceptible of detection, than either—the artificial light thrown on peculiar incidents, for the purpose of disguising others by comparative shade?

But now we must venture to impose a second injunction. In order to test the effect which this wonderful piece of sophistry is intended to produce, read Hume again, compare Hume with Hume, and throw yourself into the mind of a student required by the examination-paper, to "Give the religious and moral character of Charles I. as exemplified in his death; and state the reasons of your opinion as deduced from the work of Hume." Then pause, and decide whether the following answer does not contain the opinions which Hume has taught you to deduce and to form.

Religious and Moral Character of Charles I. as deduced from Hume.

"That the virtue of Charles I. was in some degree tinctured by superstition, cannot be denied; but whilst the elegant historian, whom we deservedly consider as the soundest champion of monarchy, most candidly admits this tendency as the chief defect of the king's character, it is equally evident that the blemish existed only in the smallest degree, so as to be an evanescent quantity, scarcely to be discerned. Possibly nothing more than the doubt, the uncertainty, the suspense of judgment, naturally resulting from our most accurate scrutiny into religion.

"Consider the manner in which Charles passed the three awful days allowed to him between his sentence and his execution. Lay your hand upon your heart, and, after giving the most serious consideration to the natural history of religion, as exemplified in the whole history of the human race, declare whether you can think that the king's conviction approached in any degree to that solid belief and persuasion, which governed him in the common affairs of life. He now avowed by his acts the doubts he entertained; and fully showed, that, whatever assent his outward demeanor may at any previous time have given to the doctrines of superstition, it was an unaccountable operation of the mind between disbelief and conviction, but approaching much nearer to the former than to the latter. Charles, in the awful hour of death, never betrayed any weakness which a philosopher would despise.

"When dissolution is brought on by the ordinary course of malady or the decay of nature, the last symptoms which the intellect discovers are disorder, weakness, insensibility, and stupidity, the forerunners of the annihilation of the soul; and it is then always most susceptible of religious fictions and chimeras. The griefs and afflictions which Charles had sustained, the horror of a public execution, might have troubled his mind even more than pain or sickness; yet—instead of making any of the preparations suggested by popular credulity, whether nursed by superstition or inflamed by fanaticism, as the means of appeasing an unknown and vindictive being—the main, and, as it should seem, almost the only object which occupied his thoughts, was securing the succession of the throne to his son, by the prerogative right of primogeniture. On the morning of his execution, during his most pathetic interview with his infant children, his mind was wholly engrossed by that object. Young as these infants were, he would, had religious conviction predominated over doubt, have endeavored, at such a solemn moment, to impress on their tender hearts some notions of the faith which has been ascribed to him. No such effort was made by him. Equally removed from superstition and fanaticism, he may have endeavored to comfort them by the usual commonplaces; but he received them without a blessing, and dismissed them forever without a prayer.

"Indeed, there are no incidents in the life of the king that more strongly mark the noble independence of his mind, than the minuter circumstances attending this, the most affecting passage in his history. One of his own chaplains, Hammond, had been remarkable for his diligence in catechising youth, that is to say, instructing them in the nonsense which passed for religion.—Did Charles deem it right to enable his infant boy, the Duke of Gloucester, to obtain any perplexing knowledge of such absurdities? No! Charles wholly discarded it.—The Princess Elizabeth was a child endowed with judgment beyond her years, and capable of appreciating any advice which he might have bestowed, and of understanding the doctrinal works advocating the theological extravagances then so much in vogue. But when any man of sense takes up a volume of divinity, what are the questions which he asks?—Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or number? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact and existence? No. Commit it then to the flames, for it contains nothing but sophistry and illusion. So thought Charles, now that intellect asserted her full empire. Of these writers, many were familiarly known to Charles, both through their works and his personal connexion with the men; and he had quoted them with sufficient point, when he could employ their arguments against his political enemies. But what was his conduct now? Did he attempt to strengthen the religious obedience of his child by recommending to her the sophistries of Hooker? No.—Did he teach her to seek consolation in the superstitions of Andrews? No. With philosophical contempt he rejected them all.

"Indeed, many men of sense might think that Charles carried his indifference almost too far, considering the need of conciliating the predominant opinions of the vulgar. The mere suspicion of being inclined to the Popish superstition had been most calamitous to him; and he was now consigning his children to the care of a mother zealously affected to that superstition, and yet without bestowing the slightest caution against the errors which she might instil into their minds. But it will be answered, Was it to be expected that Charles, with his dying breath, would adopt any course which might diminish the affection of his children towards the wife whom he so tenderly loved, or encourage them to depreciate the parent whom he taught them to respect and honor? Certainly not; but, had he been sincere in his religious convictions—and let it be recollected, that the great lesson to be derived from the contemplation of the death of Charles I. is the absence of any practical influence possessed by religious tenets—he might have afforded the most efficient caution to his children, without expressing the slightest want of confidence in their mother, or even mentioning her name. Amongst the works of Laud is his celebrated reply to Fisher, which all zealots must consider as the most cogent refutation of Popery ever produced; for whilst the crafty archbishop annihilates his antagonist, he never uses any argument which could be employed against the superstition of the Church of England by the fanatics; yet Charles, anxious, no doubt, that his children should be preserved, as far as possible, from the contagion of all religious opinions, never even alluded to a book which might have influenced their conscience in favor of any positive belief.

"On the scaffold, his dying words contained a most earnest exhortation to his subjects to pay obedience to his son as their lawful king. Whilst he thus employed the last moments of his existence in laboring to support the royal prerogative, by the sympathy which his fate excited amongst his bitterest enemies, he purposely, deliberately, and advisedly abstained from any expression or exhortation displaying any attachment or feeling of duty towards the Church, for which he had contended so earnestly, when its interests were connected with the rights of the crown.

"The total want of any allusion to the late established religion is most remarkable. The more we investigate the character of Charles as delineated by Hume, the more shall we be confirmed in the opinion that his superstition had now entirely passed away; at least not a trace of it can be found in Hume's accurate narrative. The only incident which might tend to show that Charles had the slightest recollection of the Church of England, any veneration for its priesthood, is the circumstance that Bishop Juxon assisted him in some species of devotion when on the scaffold. Yet, as far as we can discover from the conduct of Charles, he justly regarded priests as the invention of a timorous and abject superstition. Rejecting the foundation of a priesthood, the absurd superstructure of an apostolic succession would of course fall to the ground. We have no reason to suppose that Bishop Juxon was chosen by the king, or that Charles would not equally have accepted of what were then termed spiritual consolations from the fanatical ministers, or indeed that he required any religious consolation at all. It was only in the capacity of a friend that the bishop paid the last melancholy duties to his sovereign. In every respect the conduct of Charles, in repudiating all adherence to the superstitions of the Church of England, was calm and solid. The period of dissimulation had passed by. Whatever ridicule may, by a philosophical mind, be thrown upon pious ceremonies, they are unquestionably advantageous to the rude multitude; and upon that ground, no doubt, Charles I. had so strenuously contended for the share of popish ceremonies which the Church of England, as is well known, had retained. They were now wholly and entirely cast off. Charles discarded all the mummery of a liturgy, all the solemn farces of lessons and gospels, rubrics and set forms of prayer; and, freeing himself from all superstitious influences, he disdained to partake of the communion, which, according to the rites of the Church of England, he was enjoined to have sought in his dying hour.

"No philosophical mind can doubt the origin of the works which superstition and fanaticism equally receive as the production of those who have been tempted to appear as prophets or ambassadors from Heaven: books presented to us by a barbarous and ignorant people, written in an age when they were still more barbarous, and resembling those fabulous accounts which every nation gives of its origin. Charles fully appreciated the insufficiency of such testimony. We have the strongest proofs that he never entered into the delusion, from the marked circumstance, that, during the three days which, as before mentioned, were allowed him between his sentence and his execution, an interval which he passed in great tranquillity, the Scriptures, as they are called, were never in his hands; nor did he, according to the practice of all religionists, whether guided by superstition or fanaticism, seek any comfort in his affliction from a book so contrary to human reason. Charles neither saw the Bible, nor heard the Bible, nor read the Bible, nor touched the Bible, nor expressed any belief in the Bible, nor recommended the Bible to his children or his friends. Do we need any stronger proof that Charles was a philosopher in the fullest sense of the term? His devotions, as we must style them according to the conventional language of society, appear to be nothing more than that reverence which every philosopher renders to the hypothesis by which he endeavors to account for the unalterable and immutable order of the universe. His allusions to passing from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can take place, if they mean anything beyond a species of rhetorical play upon words, only imply that he contemplated the eternal rest of annihilation. For they were wholly detached from any other expressions implying any belief in a future state. Charles may have admitted its possibility, but nothing more. And how could it be otherwise? Even at this day, the Christian religion cannot be believed by any reasonable person without a miracle; and whoever is moved by faith to assent to it, is conscious of a continued miracle in his own person, which subverts all the principles of his understanding, and gives him a determination to believe what is most contrary to custom and experience. This miracle was not worked in Charles; and he died without making the slightest, the most remote, the most transient profession of Christianity."

Such, then, are the inferences intended to be deduced by Hume, who, in his most dishonest statement, has, as will be seen by comparison with his sources, purposely omitted every historical memorial or record testifying either the king's allegiance to the Church, or his unshaken faith as a Christian. Charles truly suffered death for the belief that Christianity, according to the profession of the Church of England, was the fundamental law of the state, unchangeable by any political or constitutional power, being an obligation contracted with the Almighty, from which he could not be absolved by any human authority. Let it further be remarked, that, whilst Hume falsifies the narrative by expunging all the particulars teaching the reader to profit by the religious sentiments of the monarch, he endeavors to excite a factitious sympathy, by the false and theatrical representation of the king's hearing the noise of the scaffold, which authentic accounts entirely disprove.* And, for the same purpose of effect, whilst Hume gives to the interview with the children more prominence of detail than its relative importance requires, he suppresses that portion of the king's advice which most peculiarly discloses the mind of the dying father, namely, the recommendation made by Charles of Hammond, Hooker, Andrews, and Laud, as the expositors of the doctrines of that Protestant Church of England, for which he and Laud equally died as martyrs.

Detrimental as Hume may be, when speaking his own sentiments in his own book, the evil which he effects in person is small when compared to the diffusion of his irreligion, by those who are frequently unconscious of the mischief which they perpetrate;—we mean the writers who have been guided by him in what is at this day the most important branch of our literature—the numerous compilers of educational works; and in order that our readers may pursue the inquiry for themselves, we wish them to consult three of the most popular histories of this class, Keightley, Gleig, and Markham; and selecting the death of Charles I., judge for themselves whether this event—of all others in our annals, the most interesting to the imagination—has been presented by those writers to the rising generation in such a tone or spirit as to inculcate any dutiful affection towards the Church, or aid the parent in bringing up the child in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

These three writers may in some measure elucidate the manner in which Hume's influence has operated upon his successors, according to their individual characters and opportunities. Mr. Keightley, a man of considerable diligence and energy, has been taught by Hume's skepticism to boast that he "belongs to no sect or party in religion or politics;" hence he gives only "a moderate preference to the Church of England, without taking upon him to assert that it absolutely is the best;" and the same indifference has caused him, in his Outlines of history, to obtrude upon youth some of the most offensive doctrines which German neology can afford. In the death of Charles, all he finds edifying is that Hugh Peters prayed for him!

Mr. Gleig is an amiable and most pleasing writer; when he works freely upon his own ground, speaks his own sentiments, and embodies his own observations, he produces narratives of rare and unaffected vigor and elegance;* but when he is tempted to put on the sleeves and apron of a bookmaker, his genius deserts him. He is above such work, and goes about it accordingly. The circumstances under which he produced his "Family History," as a mere bespoken task, to be put on the list of a Society, rendered it, we can suppose, needful that he should take what he found most ready at hand. He perhaps went a step beyond Hume; but the only word of instruction which he can insert in the narrative of the death of the royal martyr, is the dry historical fact, that Charles avowed himself a member of the Protestant Church of England. There is nothing positively wrong in Mr. Gleig's work—but, out of sight, out of mind; Christian knowledge is as diligently weeded out from this "Family History" as Hume himself could desire.

Yet perhaps the strongest case of the treacherous seductions of Hume is to be found in Mrs. Markham's history. We do not in the least doubt, from a close examination of the work, that when the author began it for the use of her own children, she resorted at once to the historian whom she had been taught to consider as her philosopher and guide. From her father, the inventor of the power-loom, she may have heard the name of Adam Smith mentioned with the highest honor; and Adam Smith, in the letter prefixed to the History, has told her—as he tells our children, if we place Hume in their hands—that Hume's character approached as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit; and therefore there is hardly any portion of the work in which the professors of religion are mentioned, into which the sentiments of Hume are not infused. These passages are fortunately not numerous; and we do most earnestly hope that, if a production, in many respects so useful, and which has obtained so much currency, should come to another edition, they may be all modified or expunged.

Hume has been, and is still, valued by many, as a defender of monarchical principles; but his support kills the root of loyalty. By advocating the duty of obedience to the sovereign, simply with reference to human relations, he deprives allegiance of the only sure foundation upon which it can rest.

Perhaps the speculative atheism of Hume—for it is a violation of the warning not to call evil

* This has been done so effectually by Mr. Brodie, and by Mr. Laing, that it is unnecessary to go into further particulars.

* We are pleased to notice "The Light Dragoon" of the present season, as entirely worthy of the pen that wrote "The Subaltern," and the "Narrative of the American Campaign in 1814."

good, if, when required to pass judgment, we designate his principles by any other name—may render his history, in some respects, more pernicious, if that be possible, than the ribald aggressive infidelity of Gibbon. Arsenic may warn us by the pain which the poison occasions, but narcotics steal life away. Hume constantly tempts us to deny the existence of the Supreme Being, before whom he trembles. He raises his foul and pestilential mists, seeking to exclude from the universe the beams of the Sun of Righteousness, whom he hates and defies. The main object and end of history is the setting forth God's glory, so as to show that national happiness arises from doing His appointed work, and that national punishments are the results of national sins; yet let it not be supposed that, in order to render history beneficial, it must of necessity be expressly written upon religious principles, still less that facts should be coarsely and presumptuously wrested, for the purpose of justifying the ways of God to man. If there be one thing worse than a pious fraud, it is a pious fallacy. Any narrative of the affairs of the world, when not corrupted by the Lying Spirit of unbelief, sufficiently declares the superintending power of the Almighty. Fire and hail, snows and vapors, wind and storm, all the inanimate objects of nature, are seen fulfilling His word: and the simple statement of the vicissitudes and fortunes of the kings and nations of the earth will always declare the terrors of His judgments, and the mercies of His love. But the Deistical philosopher—the foolish and impotent rebel against the Almighty—strives to annul the evidence given by the light of nature. He would deprive mankind of all the hope, and trust, and joy, which can sustain us in our pilgrimage, seducing us to be his companion in the downward path, conducting to the portals of the shadow of death—

*"Per me si va nella città dolente,
Per me si va nel eterno dolore,
Per me si va tra la perduta gente—
* * Lasciate ogni speranza voi ch' entrate."*

From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE EMIGRANTS OF SAN TOMMASO.

Written while waiting the solemnization of a High Mass, performed for the Belgian emigrants previous to embarkation for America.

BY MRS. GORE.

Give them your parting prayers!—not much to grant
To brethren banished from their native shore,— Desperate with penury,—subdued by want,—
Cast forth like Ishmael from the patriarch's door.
His sterile portion in the earth is theirs,—
The desert's loneliness, and drought, and fear;—
Sons of the free woman!—Bestow your prayers!
"KYRIE ELEISON!—Lord of Mercy—hear!"

Yours are the flocks, the herds, the fertile fields,
The pleasant pastures by their fathers trod;
The corn, and wine, and oil, their birthright yields,
The hallow'd hearths,—the temples of their God!
Theirs, the savanna by the mountain side,
Mocking their labors with its threats of dearth;
No traces of their fathers' steps to guide
Their trembling children o'er that trackless earth.

When from the floating ark of refuge driven
The pilot dove flew forth across the main,
At evening tide, free as the winds of Heaven,
The weary wanderer sought its home again.
But these go forth and must return no more,
No homeward path across the opposing wave!
There where their anchor bites the dreary shore,
There, is their savage dwelling,—there, their grave!

Talk not of splintering masts or raging skies,—
The troubled ocean of a tropic clime;
Within the port a direr peril lies,
Where war the maddening waves of want and crime.

Loud roars the storm on yon wild shore afar,
Man against man incensed in hungry strife;
Oh! worse than all the elements at war,
The fierce contentions of a lawless life!

Bright the effulgence of a southern sky,
Beauteous the blossoms with its verdure bleat;
Strange birds on starry wings glance radiant by,
New stars adorn the Antarctic firmament.
But on no kindred thing descends the ray,—
No hearts they love those fragrant wonders bless,—
"KYRIE ELEISON!—Lord of Mercy!—may Thy hand be with them in the wilderness!"

The pristine curse still blights that hateful spot!
No legends consecrate its joyless home,—
Traditionary links that bind our lot
With ages past, and ages yet to come!—
Trec, rock, or stream—what memories endear?
No tyrant perish'd there,—no hero bled!—
Mute is the olden time whose voice might cheer,
The daily struggle for their bitter bread!

Climb they the mountain!—From the vale beneath
Nor hum of men,—nor village chime ascends;
O'er Nature's breathless form,—how fair in death,—
The solemn pall of Solitude extends.
Or, higher yet, when from the topmost bound,
Illimitable space their eyes survey,
Still—still—that vast horizon circleth round
But coiling serpents and the beast of prey!

Ye disinherited of earth and sea!—
High in your Heaven of Heavens, a better land
May yet be yours,—where no contentions be,
No trampling foot of pride,—no grasping hand.
Raise, raise your hopes unto that brighter shore,— Expand your sails, and seek that happier home.
"KYRIE ELEISON!—Lord of Mercy, hear
The sufferers' fervent prayer,—Thy Kingdom COME!"

THE NEW FAITH.

[Sir Robert Peel's ministry, strong as it is, was out-voted upon a question of so regulating the working hours at factories, as to employ women and children but ten hours a day. Against this motion it is alleged that American, German and French competition is already so great as to threaten England with the loss of her foreign markets;—and therefore the increase of expense which such a blow would occasion cannot be borne.]

This may become a question of great importance in the political world. Its interest to all who feel for human misery can hardly be increased.]

From the Spectator.

Those who remember that scarcely half-a-dozen petitions for Parliamentary Reform were presented to the House of Commons during the six years preceding the fierce agitation of 1831 and 1832, will not imagine that the question of legislative interference with the hours of labor is likely to "blow over" because it has come upon us suddenly and unexpectedly. Its practical importance is too manifest to admit of such a notion. May we not rather believe that a proposal which has threatened the existence of so strong an Administration as the present, which is breaking up old parties and producing new alliances, which is the subject of as eager and bitter controversy as any of us can remember, must be founded on opinions which, though of no long growth, have yet taken a firm root in the public mind? Nor is it less doubtful that these opinions involve consequences of far greater moment than the economical loss and social gain which would result from shortening the time of labor for women and children in certain manufactures. Lord ASHLEY may not be conscious of his mission, but he is really the organ of a new faith, compared with which the once ardent desire of this nation for a change in the composition of the House of Commons appears insignificant; and he asks us to take the first step in a course of legislation which may be properly termed revolutionary, if we use the word to express much difference from the existing order of things.

In the usual condition of every people there is a governing class, few in proportion to the whole number, and distinguished from the mass by a superior knowledge, which is indeed the source of their power. Under ordinary circumstances, this ruling class, though they may always lean towards what they deem most advantageous to themselves, yet manage, somehow or other, to exercise their authority so far in accordance with the sentiments of the whole people as to obtain respect and obedience. It is only when they fail to do this that revolution comes—when either from some corruption of the ruling order they have become incapable of governing, or when that ruling order, who got on well enough before, remain blind to some great change in the people, and become, because unchanged themselves, as incapable of governing as in the other case. Or both causes may operate at once, as in the French Revolution. Now, in England, at least under the constitution of 1688, the ruling order have invariably accommodated themselves to the prevalent opinion of the country. Whether, at this time or that, they did right or wrong according to present notions, they have ever done what was requisite to prevent lasting collision between the Legislature and the people at large. All their wars were popular in the beginning; and whenever peace was generally desired, war ceased. So with respect to economical matters, it is indubitable that the "commercial policy" of the British Legislature, when most at variance with present ideas—when it comprised every sort of interference with the production and distribution of wealth—was highly agreeable to the classes who had any opinion on the subject; while Lord JOHN RUSSELL's late bid for retention of office, and Sir ROBERT PEEL's proclaimed difference "in the abstract" with many of his supporters, show that only a powerful interest or two, whose strength is continually decreasing, stand in the way of the complete adoption by Parliament of the Free-trade doctrines of the present day. It would be easy to cite more examples of the way in which public opinion operates on the ruling order under our constitution.

We might presume, therefore, even if there were no other evidence of the fact, that the recent vote of the House of Commons in favor of Lord ASHLEY's Ten-hours' proposal, was not a freak of the majority on that occasion, but the expression by them of an opinion which has taken pretty strong hold of the public mind. It is an opinion of quite recent growth, hardly developed or matured by anybody, certainly not yet expounded so as to obtain the confident approval of cautious thinkers, who, if they utter it, speak with hesitation and avowed reluctance; but it is nevertheless one of those opinions which come unbidden, which are adopted instinctively, which partake largely of feeling, and which have always had more influence on human affairs than any elaborated doctrine whatever. It is a rebellion, of sentiment if you please, against that part of the doctrine of the Economists and Free-traders which says that every man is the best judge and guardian of his own interests. Glaring facts contradict the assertion. Of late years and in this country, the experiment of letting the common people alone to take care of themselves has been fairly tried; and we see the result in the state of those who form the bulk of the nation. What are they, whether in mines, or factories, or agricultural villages!—a thoroughly servile class, socially cut off from their employers; doomed to excessive toil and perpetual want; ignorant, vicious, desperate; and, above all, lamentably short of means for improving their condition by their own unaided efforts. This has come of letting them alone to "manage their own affairs in their own way;" for even the New Poor-law, though a measure of legislation affecting a large portion of the laboring class, was designed to have, and has had, the effect of "throwing them on their own resources." More perfect liberty to dispose of themselves as they pleased, less protection or interference from the State, than our common people have had for ten years past, it is hardly possible to imagine. It will not do to say that they are no worse off than formerly, but only appear so because we now inquire about them more. They are worse off in two respects,—first, as the whole method of factory employment, which treats the human being as nothing better than part of the machinery, has resulted from the modern use of steam; and, secondly, as the factory method of employment has been adopted by the farmer, whose laborers once used to belong to his family. The class of laborers for hire, with the exception always of skilled mechanics, has obviously become cheaper and more helpless under the system of letting them alone to take care of themselves. Extraordinary individuals among them improve their condition; many more have a desire of improvement unknown to their forefathers; but as a class they are cheaper than cattle and nearly as helpless. Well, their numbers continually increase with the increase of the capital whose slaves they are; modern benevolence observes them closer; the spectacle has become revolting to humanity; and hence the new faith—which is, that it is the proper business of the ruling order to take some care of those who can take little or none of themselves.

A new faith it is, but only as being different from that which was last established; for "there is no new thing under the sun;" and, assuredly, a belief in the necessity of government, and in the obligation of rulers to exert their power and superior intelligence in favor of the helpless, is a good deal older than ADAM SMITH and Laissez-faire. And yet we must not deem it a relapse into our grandfathers' notions about interference by authority with the ways of wealth. As uttered by Lord HOWICK and Mr. C. BULLER, (though anything but explained by either,) it says that the weal of a nation is more to be desired than its wealth; that the mass of the people, if left wholly to their own guidance, will be miserable and degraded in proportion as the cheapness of their labor reduces the cost of production, and augments that surplus produce which forms the wealth of the community; and that it is a proper function or duty of the Legislature, if possible, to correct the political-economy law of competition, as it affects the unrepresented, ignorant, helpless class of laborers for hire, by the interposition of an act of Parliament which would save them from excessive toil and diminish to the same extent the surplus produce of their labor. In this view of the matter, wealth is not despised, but treated as inferior to happiness: political economy is not set at nought, but acknowledged, and allowed much weight: the proposed interference by law bears no resemblance to monopolies, or bounties, or "commercial policy" duties, but is like the protection which the law affords to minors against their own improvidence, and to all the industrious classes by the political institution of Sunday.

This last is the most pertinent illustration. Let it be supposed for a moment that the religious sanction which forbids work on Sunday were removed: would the most zealous advocate of Laissez-faire think of repealing the acts of Parliament which set apart one day in seven for rest? Would not the whole country demand by acclamation new laws to supply the absence of the religious sanction? And why!—because if the religious stay of Sunday were removed, no other being provided by Parliament, so surely would the political-economy law of competition, operating both upon capitalists and laborers, gradually overcome the habit of resting on the seventh day, and deprive the common people of an inestimable blessing. But in that case, labor would be cheaper, the cost of production less, and surplus produce, or national wealth, greater by a seventh. We should have to choose between a seventh day of rest on the one hand, and a seventh more wealth on the other; and if we preferred the leisure to the greater produce, (as everybody but a brute of a landlord, or farmer, or mill-owner, here and there, would certainly do,) we should acquire it by means of legislation at utter variance with the doctrine that if you will but let people alone they are sure to manage better for themselves than anybody can manage for them.

Another imagined case will prove instructive with respect to the real amount of the economical sacrifice which the nation must make as the purchase-money of some leisure for the working classes. If a Ten-hours' law, embracing all employments, had existed for years, what would be the consequences of its repeal as regards wealth? Competition among the laborers would prevent any increase of wages. Labor would therefore be cheaper, and the cost of production less. Hence a larger surplus produce—an increase of that portion of the produce which remains after replacing capital with ordinary profits. At first, this gain would be enjoyed by the capitalists in the form of higher profits; but presently, their competition with each other would induce them to carry on business for ordinary profit—for that minimum of profit which is an inducement to the carrying on of business. What would then become of that portion of the produce which was more than sufficient for replacing capital with ordinary profits? What would become of it depends on the manner in which the capitalists would abandon it. Their competition with each other would induce them to give it up in different ways, according to circumstances—either by paying more rent wherever the principle of rent was in force, or by selling at lower prices, or, in some cases, partly in one way and partly in the other. After a while, therefore, neither the capitalist nor the laborer, as such, would be any better off than before. The effect would be the same in character as that of improvements in the productive power of capital and labor generally, such as have taken place during the present century in agriculture and manufactures, and have prodigiously augmented the wealth of the nation without raising profits or wages in any employment whatever. The effect would be to augment the means, and even to increase the numbers, of that portion of the community which consumes without producing. Captain BASIL HALL called them "the pending class;" but omitted to explain, that its absence in America is due to the unlimited extent of that field of employment for capital and labor, which maintains high wages and high profits in spite of the law of competition. Inasmuch, too, as we are supposing an increase of all kinds of produce in proportion to the capital and labor employed, food of course included, the base of society would be extended, and there would be more capitalists and laborers as well as more of the merely consuming class. Some variations might take place in the extent and character of employments; for the greater quantity of food might be produced by a smaller population, and there is no saying what forms of demand the increased means of the consuming class would take; but the general result would be a multiplication of people, with a more remarkable contrast than ever between the wealth of the rich and the poverty of the poor. The abolition of Sunday would operate just in the same way. And now it may be asked, if a Ten-hours' law were in the statute-book, would the economical gain from repealing it be thought worth the social sacrifice? Should we deliberately multiply society at the cost of its deterioration?

Another and a very important consideration arises here. Admitting that a general Ten-hours' law would have the same kind of effects on wealth as a general decrease of the powers of capital and labor, it follows that a general increase of those powers by means of improved processes would have the same effects, if equal in degree, as a restoration of the two hours which had been cut off from each day's labor. The national wealth would be the same, whether we had twelve hours' labor and no improved processes, or the improved processes and only ten hours' labor. Thus, for example, supposing that a Ten-hours' law for agriculture had been passed before Lord ALTHORP induced Parliament to repeal the Excise-duty on tiles, the improved drainage which has resulted from that measure might long ere now have increased the productive power of capital in agriculture as much as it had been decreased by the Ten-hours' law. In that case, the working peasantry would have gained the two hours a day, and nobody would have lost anything. Turning to realities, can it be doubted that the general powers of production have been augmented of late years, by means of improved processes, to an amount exceeding the sixth of the whole!—by more, that is, than would have sufficed to counteract the economical operation of a Ten-hours' law passed before the improvements began! In what, then, consists the danger (always supposing discretion in the manner) of shortening the hours of labor to no greater extent than improved processes might be expected to work in the opposite direction? If Parliament had now to give the Sunday for rest, they might give it by degrees, half an hour at a time, with a certainty that improvements in the arts of production would gradually make up for that decrease of productive power. The loss of a seventh here would be covered by the gain of a seventh there; as soon as the account had been balanced, further improvements of skill would add as now to the heap of wealth; and the vast social advantage of the Sunday would have been gained in perpetuity.

We do not care to notice here the special case of over-worked women and children, because it is only the principles of the new faith that we are just now desirous of examining; and we are satisfied, moreover, that whenever they shall find sufficient favor with the public to give Lord ASHLEY success in his present object, they must receive a far wider application than has yet been seriously contemplated by anybody. No professor of them can uphold the Corn-law without gross inconsistency or hypocrisy. The general purpose is, to make laws for relieving the common people from the evils of competition; but the Corn-law circumscribes the field of employment for capital and labor, keeps profits and wages down to the minimum, and is a principal cause of that suffering which the project of Short-time is designed to alleviate. How, again, can Lord ASHLEY ask the mill-owners to consent to a measure which they believe would tend to diminish their profits, when he joins in denying them a free choice of markets in which to dispose of their goods? Then, further, it is said with no little show of reason, that if a Ten-hours' law enhanced the cost of production in manufactures by a sixth, it would turn the scale against us in foreign markets, and deprive England of her export trade; but, nevertheless, Lord ASHLEY helps to forbid that compensating diminution of the cost of production in manufactures, which would be occasioned by the free importation of food. On the other hand, an inevitable effect of repealing the Corn-law would be to throw a large proportion of the laborers in agriculture out of employment altogether, and produce an extent and degree of misery frightful to contemplate: so here is a job of work for the advocates of paternal government, for which the most rational and consistent of them seem as little prepared as the others. Then, furthermore, several of the means by which it is proposed that legislation should better the condition of the poor, would operate, like vaccination or other sanatory precautions—like a Ten-hours' law, be it said, in passing—by decreasing mortality and rendering the competition of numbers severer than before. Competition, universal and intense competition, is the disease; and if we only repress the symptoms in one place, they will break out in another. A comprehensive treatment of the malady itself would probably combine colonization with free trade in food: but, while the latter is withheld by Parliament, the former is merely left to be brought into disrepute by the red-tape of the Colonial Office. And finally, (for we must stop somewhere, though the theme is inexhaustible,) education by the State is a noted specific; which, however, it will be simply impossible to administer so long as competition shall deprive the ignorant classes of leisure for receiving instruction. If the principles of the new faith should ever be carried out, there will be plenty for the ruling order to do.

That faith gains ground, however. All the women of the classes who really influence legislation, have imbibed it more or less; and their weight will not be despised by such as took note how Queen CAROLINE's trial conduced to the Reform Bill. The basest of the votes given in support of Lord ASHLEY's motion may somewhat damage the cause; but they also indicate that it has become of sufficient importance to be available for party purposes. Whenever it shall be traded with for personal aggrandizement, as Abolition and Missions to the Heathen have been by a vermin which prey upon benevolence, we may begin to think that Sir ROBERT PEEL's honest resistance will soon be fruitless. The time may not be so far off when opposition to it will be a disqualification, and its advocacy one title to high office. If ever that time should come, the faith will be theorized by many a busy brain and ready pen. At present, we must repeat, it is little more than an instinct

From the London Punch.

THE PAUPER'S CHRISTMAS CAROL.

FULL of drink and full of meat,
On our SAVIOUR's natal day,
CHARITY's perennial treat;
Thus I heard a Pauper say:—

"Ought not I to dance and sing Thus supplied with famous cheer?"

Heigho!

I hardly know—

Christmas comes but once a year!

"After labor's long turmoil,
Sorry fare and frequent fast,
Two-and-fifty weeks of toil,
Pudding-time is come at last!
But are raisins high or low,
Flour and suet cheap or dear?"

Heigho!

I hardly know—

Christmas comes but once a year!

"Fed upon the coarsest fare
Three hundred days and sixty-four
But for one on viands rare,
Just as if I was n't poor!
Ought not I to bless my stars,
Warden, clerk, and overseer?"

Heigho!

I hardly know—

Christmas comes but once a year!

"Treated like a welcome guest,
One of Nature's social chain,
Seated, tended on, and press'd—
But when shall I be press'd again,
Twice to pudding, thrice to beef,
A dozen times to ale and beer?"

Heigho!

I hardly know,

Christmas comes but once a year!

"Come to-morrow, how it will;
Diet scant and usage rough,
Hunger once has had its fill,
Thirst for once has had enough,
But shall I ever dine again?
Or see another feast appear?"

Heigho!

I only know—

Christmas comes but once a year.

"Frozen cares begin to melt,
Hopes revive and spirits flow—
Feeling as I have not felt
Since a dozen months ago—
Glad enough to sing a song—
To-morrow shall I volunteer?"

Heigho!

I hardly know—

Christmas comes but once a year.

"Bright and blessed is the time,
Sorrows end and joys begin,
While the bells with merry chime
Ring the Day of Plenty in!
But the happy tide to hail
With a sigh or with a tear,

Heigho!

I hardly know—

Christmas comes but once a year!"

SONG.—BY SAMUEL LOVER.

THE EMIGRANT MOTHER, THE NIGHT BEFORE SHE SAILS FROM IRELAND.

SLEEP, darling, sleep, while my tears wet thy pillow,
Sleep without rocking, this last night here;
To-morrow thou 'lt rock on the deep foaming billow,
The winds for thy lullaby then thou 'lt hear:
But when across the wide wave yonder,
In freedom, thro' stranger-lands we wander;
O then, with a holier feeling, and fonder,
My heart—dearest Erin, will turn to thee!

To the land of the stranger, my boy, we are going,
Where flowers, and birds, and their songs are new:
We'll miss, in the spring, our own wild-flowers rowing,

And listen in vain for the sweet cuckoo.
But in our dreams, so sweetly ringing,
We'll fancy we hear the spring bird singing,
And gather the flowers in our wild valley springing,
And weep, when we wake, that the dream is untrue!

Hood's Magazine.

THE LIVING AGE.

No. 4.—8 JUNE, 1844.

CONTENTS.

|   | PAGE.  |
|---|--|
| 1. Life of Beau Brummell—by Captain Jesse, . . . . .                    | Examiner , . . . . . 195                        |
| 2. Discovery of African Guano, . . . . .                                | Bell's Messenger , . . . . . 197                |
| 3. The Bridge of Sighs, . . . . .                                       | Hood's Magazine , . . . . . 198                 |
| 4. Submarine Researches, . . . . .                                      | Edinburgh Philosophical Journal , . . . . . 199 |
| 5. FRANCE.—Railways—St. Domingo, . . . . .                              | . . . . . 202  |
| 6. TURKEY.—Suppression of a Revolution, . . . . .                       | . . . . . 202  |
| 7. The Military Annual, . . . . .                                       | Bell's Messenger , . . . . . 204                |
| 8. The Polka, . . . . .   | New Monthly Magazine , . . . . . 205            |
| 9. Thorwaldsen, . . . . .   | Britannia , . . . . . 205                       |
| 10. Flames in Volcanoes, . . . . .                                      | Edinburgh Philosophical Journal , . . . . . 209 |
| 11. Nemesis War Steamer in China, . . . . .                             | Examiner , . . . . . 212                        |
| 12. Researches on Light, . . . . .                                      | Examiner , . . . . . 213                        |
| 13. The Partie Fine, . . . . .  | New Monthly Magazine , . . . . . 214            |
| 14. Power of Friendship, . . . . .                                      | Hood's Magazine , . . . . . 219                 |
| 15. Brougham Vindicated, . . . . .                                      | Examiner , . . . . . 221                        |
| 16. Penny Postage, . . . . .  | Examiner , . . . . . 221                        |
| 17. Deceased People whom we meet daily, . . . . .                       | New Monthly Magazine , . . . . . 222            |
| 18. Admiral St. Vincent, . . . . .                                      | Edinburgh Review , . . . . . 225                |
| 19. Christopher Marlow—Joshua Sylvester—RichardBarnfield, . . . . . | Chambers' Cyclopaedia , . . . . . 246           |
| 20. King of Prussia, . . . . .  | Punch , . . . . . 248                           |
| 21. Law of Parent and Child, . . . . .                                  | Punch , . . . . . 248                           |
| 22. Shopping in London, . . . . .                                       | Bentley's Miscellany , . . . . . 250            |
| 23. Mr. Lover Travelling, . . . . .                                     | Hood's Magazine , . . . . . 255                 |

POETRY.—Why do the Flowers Bloom, 206—Birth-Day Prophecy, 211—The Gladness of May, 217—The Workhouse Clock—The Disgusted Wife—The First Warbler, 218—Wakley's Last, 220—The Husband to his Latch Key, 226.

SCRAPS.—Glaciarium, 201—Rev. Sydney Smith and Mr. Everett, 204—Society for Promoting the Restoration of the Jews—Holy Thursday in Vienna—Society for Teaching the Blind—Exhumation in Africa—Guano in Gardens—Steam Ascent of the Cataract of the Nile—Pennsylvania Law, 207—Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly—A Baby Wanted—Death of a Character, 208—Ojibbeway Indians—Exhibition at Paris—Paper-Making, 217—King of the French, 221—Portugal—Hungary—Church Convocation, 224—King of Hanover, 249—The Country in Danger, 254.

BOSTON:

E. LITTLE, & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

BOSTON.—REDDING & CO.—JORDAN & CO.—HOTCHKISS & CO.
 NEW YORK.—MOWATT & CO.—SUN OFFICE.—BURGESS & STRINGER.
 PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUDE & CANNING—BERFORD & CO.—ZIEBER & CO.
 BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.
 ALBANY.—W. C. LITTLE—GEORGE JONES. PORTLAND.—GEORGE COLMAN.
 CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.
 NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PERHAPS some of our younger readers may not have known of Beau Brummell. He was sometimes called King of the Dandies, and had almost supreme sway over the ton in England.

As an instance of his impudence, it is related that dining one day with the Prince of Wales, he said to his Royal host—"George, will you touch the bell?" The Prince rang, and when the servant entered, said, "Mr. Brummell's carriage!" This produced a rupture, and Brummell afterwards declared that he had a great mind to bring the old king into fashion, out of revenge.

Riding with a friend, the Prince met them, and without speaking to Brummell, stopped to talk with his companion. Brummell looked at him through his eye-glass, and, as he rode away, asked his companion, so as to be heard by the Prince, "Who is our fat friend?"

The next article is on a more useful subject—the discovery of an immense mine of a new manure, which is attracting much attention in England.

Our young readers will be much interested in "Submarine Researches,"—from which they will learn that the different depths of the sea, like the various heights of mountains, have their appropriate growth of vegetable, and even of animal life.

In France, much attention is turned to Railways; we shall show in our next number, the probable success of the Atmospheric Railway, which will extend the benefits of these roads to countries otherwise inaccessible to them, and greatly diminish the cost and increase the advantages in all countries. The rumor of the intention of England and France to divide St. Domingo between them, we copy from a letter of the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer, (Mr. Walsh.) It is not improbable.

The Polka Dance is as much the rage in England, as the Waltz was on its introduction there.

Flames in Volcanoes, is so attractive a title, that we need not recommend it to our young friends. It is appropriately followed by the Nemesis in China.

Brougham Vindicated, is a favorable specimen of the tart spite, and epigrammatic style, of the Examiner. His lordship had a quarrel with the Examiner, and threatened to have the editor sent to prison for a contempt.

On Meeting Deceased People, is a melancholy article; and the truth of it will be acknowledged by many, as regards others; and by some, as it relates to themselves.

The long article on Earl St. Vincent, need hardly be recommended to our young friends. The Sea and an Admiral are subjects which always attract them.

We shall often turn back to the old writers, of whom we give several specimens in this number.

Some of our readers may look in vain for the continuation of Our Family. It will be two or three weeks before we can receive any more of it.

The necessity of putting the Living Age early to press, in order that it may reach distant subscribers about the day of its date—and in order that it may be well printed, and dried, and pressed—will always make our news a little later than if we hurried it smoking from the press. While we are finishing this number, we hear that the Steamer which left England on 19th May, has been telegraphed. We shall have her news in our next.

---

CHINESE SMOKERS.—358 and 359, are specimens of pipes for tobacco and opium, the smoking of which produces a frightful prostration of the intellect, and may be compared to the pernicious custom in this country of reading Parliamentary Debates—a habit that has diminished greatly with the advance of education. Captain Davis gives a graphic description of an opium-smoker, which would apply equally well to the case of a reader of the reports of the speeches sometimes spoken in the House of Commons. "He lies languid, with an idiotic smile on his countenance, too much under the influence of the drug, (such as his wife's handing him a cup of tea at his breakfast,) to care much for passing events."—Punch's Guide to the Chinese Exhibition.

---

INDIAN OXEN.—Five of these extraordinary beasts, bred by Lord Combermere, have just arrived in London by the Birmingham Railway. It is stated by competent judges that they are the finest both in quality and form that have as yet been seen in this country. They have been consigned to her Majesty's purveyor, Mr. Giblett, of Bond-street.

---

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—Measures are to be taken for the immediate establishment of the agricultural college in Wiltshire, for which purpose a public meeting of the friends and supporters of the proposed plan has been called for Monday next. Earl Bathurst has consented to preside on the occasion.—Standard.

From the Examiner.

The Life of George Brummell, Esq., commonly called Beau Brummell. By CAPTAIN JESSE. Two vols. Saunders and Oiley.

Cui bono? Why on earth was such a subject selected for two large octavo volumes! We suspect that Captain Jesse has greatly overrated the attraction of his hero.

We never could find that Brummell's usefulness went beyond the invention of the starched neckcloth; or that his genius amounted to more than an appalling impudence. It is clear that these two things made him the rage. The impudence was a thing sui generis, and inimitable: a man who took down one of his sayings, to the very letter, would miss the whole effect in repeating it, for want of his slow, deliberate, exquisite way. The starched neckcloth was in some cases achievable; and we believe, though the unsuccessful efforts of one aspirant certainly ended in suicide, that a great many people were thought to have succeeded in it. It was clear from the first that the Prince of Wales never could: his neck forbade the supposition: but unattainable neckcloths may have added in this quarter to Brummell's influence. He dressed admirably in other respects: not at all like a beau. The ars celare artem was brought to perfection in the color and make of his clothes. It was his maxim that a man should never be remarked for what he wore, and he was an instance of that exquisite propriety.

With this knowledge of Brummell, we opened Capt. Jesse's ponderous volumes. We felt how flat these things must look upon paper, and were doomed to no disappointment. Capt. Jesse hardly seems aware of it. He fights up gallantly against all his disadvantages, but it was not in the nature of things that he should master one of them. The life of Brummell should have been written in some fifty pages, by one of his companions, and issued for the use of what is called the fashionable world, and no other: there is no earthly meaning or moral in it for any other class. Rational people do not need to be told, that if a man lives for mere sensual pleasures, he had better die when the means of gratification are over; that if he gambles, he incurs the chance of losing; that if he cannot pay, he must run; that to a fashionable man in this condition, a fashionable friend is a rotten reed; and that the farce must tragically end in beggary, misery, and starvation. We see no point for sympathy, in any part of Brummell's career. There is but a revolting selfishness from beginning to end. We see nothing that could have raised him into a reputable memory, but the fact of having lived three centuries since, and pandered to Henry the Eighth instead of George the Fourth. He would have served as good a master, and instead of the Court disgrace which left him to die in a madhouse, his days might have closed respectably on a scaffold.

His father's career is accurately traced by Capt. Jesse. He was a protégé of the first Lord Liverpool and for fifteen years Lord North's private secretary. Eaton, Oxford, a cornetcy in the tenth huzzars, and twenty-five thousand pounds, were his youngest son's introduction to the world. At eighteen George Brummell was a captain, and at twenty had left the army. His London career, as chief of the dandies, lasted eighteen years. He was but thirty-eight when he fled to Calais in 1816.

Before we follow him there, some anecdotes of his impudence will amuse the reader. With a few of them he may already be familiar.

"Dining at a gentleman's house in Hampshire, where the champagne was very far from being good, he waited for a pause in the conversation, and then condemned it by raising his glass, and saying loud enough to be heard by every one at the table, 'John, give me some more of that cider.'"

"His valet was coming down stairs one day with a quantity of tumbled neckcloths under his arm, and being interrogated on the subject, solemnly replied, 'Oh, they are our failures.'"

"'Brummell, you were not here yesterday,' said one of his club friends; 'where did you dine?'—'Dine! why with a person of the name of R——s. I believe he wishes me to notice him, hence the dinner; but, to give him his due, he desired that I would make up the party myself, so I asked Alvanley, Mills, Pierrepont, and a few others, and I assure you, the affair turned out quite unique; there was every delicacy in, or out of season; the Sillery was perfect, and not a wish remained ungratified; but, my dear fellow, conceive my astonishment when I tell you, that Mr. R——s had the assurance to sit down, and dine with us.'"

"An acquaintance having, in a morning call, bored him dreadfully about some tour he made in the North of England, inquired with great pertinacity of his impatient listener which of the lakes he preferred? when Brummell, quite tired of the man's tedious raptures, turned his head imploringly towards his valet, who was arranging something in the room, and said, 'Robinson.'—'Sir.'—'Which of the lakes do I admire?'—'Windermere, sir,' replied that distinguished individual. 'Ah, yes,—Windermere,' repeated Brummell, 'so it is,—Windermere.' A lady at dinner, observing that he did not take any vegetables, asked him whether such was his general habit, and if he never ate any? He replied, 'Yes, madam, I once eat a pea.'"

"One day a friend, meeting him limping in Bond street, asked him what was the matter? He replied, he had hurt his leg, and the worst of it was, 'it was his favorite leg.' Having been asked by a sympathising friend how he happened to get such a severe cold? His reply was, 'Why, do you know, I left my carriage yesterday evening, on my way to town from the Pavilion, and the infidel of a landlord put me into a room with a damp stranger.'"

"On being asked by one of his acquaintance, during a very unseasonable summer, if he had ever seen such a one? He replied, 'Yes, last winter.' Having fancied himself invited to some one's country seat, and being given to understand, after one night's lodging, that he was in error, he told an unconscious friend in town, who asked him what sort of a place it was? 'That it was an exceedingly good house for stopping one night in.'"

"On the night that he left London, the Beau was seen as usual at the Opera, but he left early, and, without returning to his lodgings, stepped into a chaise which had been procured for him by a noble friend, and met his own carriage a short distance from town. Travelling all night as fast as four post-horses and liberal donations could enable him, the morning of the 17th dawned on him at Dover, and immediately on his arrival there, he hired a small vessel, put his carriage on board, and was landed in a few hours on the other side. By this time, the West End had awoke and missed him, particularly his tradesmen."

This last little trick was copied from Bolingbroke—a much greater fop. Our last specimen of this kind of anecdote is the most exquisite of all. Its date is nearly fourteen years after his banishment, which adds to the humor of the thing :

"It was while promenading one day on the pier, and not long before he left Calais, that an old associate of his, who had just arrived by the packet from England, met him unexpectedly in the street, and cordially shaking hands with him, said, 'My dear Brummell, I am so glad to see you, for we had heard in England that you were dead; the report, I assure you, was in very general circulation when I left.'—'Mere stock-jobbing, my good fellow, mere stock-jobbing,' was the Beau's reply."

Even in his ashes lived his wonted impudence. Nothing could quench it. His mode of life was pretty much the same for twelve or fourteen years at Calais, as it had been in London, (difference of place excepted!) though how he managed it, living on charity as he must have done, is difficult to divine. He denied himself no comfort, but was always whining and complaining: the last, indeed, was an addition to his luxuries. After a good dinner from Dessin's, a bottle of Dorchester ale, a liqueur glass of brandy, and a bottle of Bordeaux, he would write to Lord Sefton that he was lying on straw, and grinning through the bars of a gaol; eating bran bread, my good fellow, eating bran bread." If he could have known how soon he would in sober sadness grin through real bars, and lie on veritable straw, it might have made even him serious.

The Whigs gave him the consulate of Caen in Normandy in 1830. It was worth 400*l.* a-year, but he had to assign an annuity of 320*l.* to his Calais creditors before he could have that place, and to content himself with the fiction of supporting his consulate on 80*l.* a-year. Of course he was soon enormously in debt: cheating and starving his washerwoman first, as he had done at Calais, for STARCH continued to be his prime necessity. If anything could add to the repulsive picture of the man at this time, it would be the doleful Della Cruscan letters he writes to young ladies, here printed by Capt. Jesse as worthy of preservation. He soon loses his consulate and is carried off to prison; and it will depend altogether on temperament whether the reader laughs or cries over his piercing shrieks from between his prison bars, that the pigeon they give him for dinner is a skeleton, that the mutton-chops which support it are not larger than half-a-crown, that the biscuits are like a bad halfpenny, that he has but six potatoes, and that the cherries sent him for dessert are positively unripe.

So the man continues to the last. In paralysis, imprisonment, and the apparent neighborhood of death, his chief anxiety is to get back to his five sous' whist, and his greatest horror to seal a note with a wafer. Charitable supplies from England set him at liberty again, and on certain conditions there is reasonable prospects of charitable support for the rest of his days: but his spirit of self-sacrifice is quite exhausted when he has brought himself down to one complete change of linen daily. He cannot find it in his heart to renounce his primrose gloves, his Eau de Cologne, oil for his wigs, patent blacking for his boots, or an occasional cast of gambling in a lottery. For these luxuries he again runs into debt.

But we have now to note the end. In the winter of 1836 Brummell suddenly appeared in a black cravat. Starch and cambric had made him, and their absence denoted his ruin. His wits had begun to fail. In 1837 he was an idiot. His cleanliness, and fastidious appetite, were replaced by—what Capt. Jesse should hardly have told. The blubber of the Esquimaux, the style of one of Swift's Houhynhims, may stand for these revolting details of the voracity and filth of Brummell. He died in the madhouse of Bon Sauveur in 1840.

BRUMMELL'S LAST PARTIES.

"On certain nights some strange fancy would seize him, that it was necessary he should give a party, and he accordingly invited many of the distinguished persons with whom he had been intimate in former days, though some of them were already numbered with the dead.

"On these gala evenings, he desired his attendant to arrange his apartment, set out a whist-table, and light the bougies, (he burnt only tallow at the time,) and at eight o'clock this man, to whom he had already given his instructions, opened wide the door of his sitting-room, and announced the 'Duchess of Devonshire.' At the sound of her Grace's well-remembered name, the Beau, instantly rising from his chair, would advance towards the door, and greet the cold air from the staircase, as if it had been the beautiful Georgiana herself. If the dust of that fair creature could have stood reanimate in all her loveliness before him, she would not have thought his bow less graceful than it had been thirty-five years before; for, despite poor Brummell's mean habiliments and uncleanly person, the supposed visitor was received with all his former courtly ease of manner, and the earnestness that the pleasure of such an honor might be supposed to excite. 'Ah! my dear Duchess,' faltered the Beau, 'how rejoiced I am to see you; so very amiable of you at this short notice! Pray bury yourself in this arm-chair; do you know it was a gift to me from the Duchess of York, who was a very kind friend of mine; but, poor thing, you know, she is now no more.' Here the eyes of the old man would fill with the tears of idiocy, and, sinking into the fauteuil himself, he would sit for some time looking vacantly at the fire, until Lord Alvanley, Worcester, or any other old friend he chose to name, was announced, when he again rose to receive them, and went through a similar pantomime. At ten his attendant announced the carriages,—and this farce was at an end."

BRUMMELL'S LAST PUBLIC APPEARANCE.

(In a letter from the Vice-Consul Armstrong to an English Friend.)

"I have deferred writing for some time, hoping to be able to inform you that I had succeeded in getting Mr. Brummell into one of the public institutions, but I am sorry to say that I have failed; I have also tried to get him into a private house; but no one will undertake the charge of him in his present state: in fact, it would be totally impossible for me to describe the dreadful situation he is in. For the last two months I have been obliged to pay a person to be with him night and day, and still we cannot keep him clean; he now lies upon a straw mattress, which is changed every day. They will not keep him at the hotel, and what to do I know not: I should think that some of his old friends in England would be able to get him into some hospital, where he could be taken care of for the rest of his days. I beg and entreat of you to get something done for him, for it is quite out of the question that he can remain where he is. The clergyman and physician here can bear testimony to the melancholy state of idiocy he is in."

It would be unjust not to add that Capt. Jesse's book has much amusing detail incidentally connected with the subject. Sketches of the beaus who preceded Brummell, and of the general society in which he flourished, are here and there happily done. There is much merit of this kind in the book

DISCOVERY OF AFRICAN GUANO.

We are indebted to the Glasgow Herald for the following interesting account of the discovery of this valuable manure on the coast of Africa. The narrative presents a striking illustration of the enterprise of the British merchant, and which, in this, as in numberless other instances, will doubtless result in a great national benefit:—

According to the observations of Capt. Farr, of the Ann, of Bristol, who had the honor of bringing last year the first cargo of African guano to Great Britain, the island of Ichaboe—in which the quality is of a superior kind—is situated in  $26^{\circ} 19'$  of south latitude, and  $14^{\circ} 50'$  of east longitude, four days' sail north of the Cape of Good Hope, and 14 degrees south of the Portuguese settlement of Benguela. It is a small rocky islet, about two and a half miles from the mainland of Africa, on which, at a distance of half a dozen miles, is a native settlement, and from the inhabitants giving the name of Ichaboe to the island it has been retained by the same title in our own language. The manner in which the guano treasures on this coast were opened up to the enterprise of British merchants is both curious and interesting, and the following recital of it is, we believe, the correct one. An American trader having observed the interest which the importation of Peruvian guano was creating in Britain, was reminded of the circumstance that he had seen large deposits of a similar substance on the coast of Africa, and he published a short narrative of his observations in an American journal. This account fell under the notice of an English captain, who transmitted it to his relatives in Liverpool, and by them an expedition of, we believe, five ships was fitted out in the close of 1842 for the purpose of being loaded with the African guano for the British market. The instructions, however, which were given to the masters must have been of an imperfect kind, for four of them returned without having succeeded in the object of their search, and the fifth, viz., the Ann, was nearly in the same position, when accident revealed the El Dorado which was destined to exert such a potent influence in fertilizing our soil. Captain Farr happened to be at Cape Town, and one morning stepped into a coffee-room for breakfast, and while partaking of his repast, entered into conversation with the master of an American whaler, to whom he explained the regret he felt at being likely to return to England without being able to fulfil the object of his mission. The American stated that he had been on shore on some islands of the exact description which the other was in quest of; and gave Captain Farr such information as enabled him to find out the island of Ichaboe, and take the first cargo from a deposit which may have been in the course of accumulation from the earliest ages in the world's history. With this cargo he sailed for England, and having put in at a port on the coast of Ireland, in July, 1843, he there found instructions awaiting him, which directed him to proceed to Dumfries and unload; and he accordingly proceeded to Carsethorn on the Solway, where the Ann was discharged, and the guano carried to Liverpool in lighters. Notwithstanding the secrecy with which these proceedings were managed, some hints respecting them reached the ears of the firm of Alexander and John Downie, of this city, who dispatched their manager, Mr. Moncrieff, with the view of obtaining such information as would open up the African guano stores more generally to British industry. A negotiation was accordingly begun at Dumfries, and terminated at Bristol, the result of which was that Captain Farr agreed to proceed again to Ichaboe, and at the same time point out the way to a fleet which was dispatched by Messrs. Downie, with sealed instructions, in the autumn of last year. Already several of these ships have arrived in Scotland, while one of them has discharged a cargo in the West Indies, and the matter being no longer a secret, a number of vessels were, at the date of the last advices, loading at Ichaboe for various ports in Great Britain. Guano is also obtained at Angra Pequena, 40 miles south of Ichaboe, but it is not by any means held in such high favor as the product of the latter. At the time of Captain Farr's first visit the island was covered with penguins, gannets, &c., but principally the former, in numbers which altogether defied calculation. They seemed to have no acquaintance with, nor fear of, man, and, in fact, offered a resistance to his encroachment on a domain which had been peculiarly their own for thousands of years. Since the crews of so many ships, however, were located at the island, the birds have almost entirely deserted their former territory, and retired to fulfil the purposes of their nature to more remote and inaccessible shores. The specimens of the penguin from Ichaboe which we have seen are about two feet in height, and as a great portion of their time is spent in the sea they are furnished with small flaps or paddles, instead of wings, which enable them to progress through the water with great velocity, though they are unable to fly. The female lays and sits upon one egg at a time, and a hole scratched in the deposit subserves all the purposes of a nest. In this way a succession of incubations go on for several months in the year, the young bird making its way to the sea as soon as it is able. It is the opinion of the seamen, that vast numbers of them never reach their destined home in the waters, but are crushed to death in their progress to it, by the dense battalions of birds which have almost to maintain a struggle for bare standing room; and in this way the guano heaps are increased as well by the bodies of the birds as by their droppings. The bodies of seals are also found on the surface of the guano deposits, which leads to the belief that they may have occasionally taken shelter there from a storm or hurricane, and having been overpowered by the potency of the ammoniacal vapor, have been unable to return to the water, and died where they lay. The guano which is brought to this country is found under a loose covering of decayed birds, recent dung, &c., and is so firmly imbedded that it requires to be dug out by the laborious operations of the pickaxe. When thus disengaged it is put into bags, and transferred by a sort of rope-ladder from the island to a boat, which lies at the outer edge of the surf, and from thence it is daily emptied into the hold of the vessel, which is anchored at a short distance. Ten men will lift about fifteen tons per day, but the operation is a very laborious one, and the sun is so powerful that few of the crews escape without having their faces and hands blistered so that the outer skin is peeled off. When Captain Farr left Ichaboe he estimated the guano deposit on that island alone to extend to one thousand feet in length, by five hundred in breadth, with an average depth of thirty-five feet, containing, perhaps, from seven hundred thousand to eight hundred thousand tons. It is evident, therefore, that this supply will soon be exhausted in fertilizing the soil of Great Britain and her dependencies, but it is to be hoped that vast stores of it yet exist which have hitherto never been disturbed by man. On this subject, we quote the following statement from the South African Commercial Advertiser, published at Cape Town in January last:—

"On the rocky headlands, or on the rocky and unmolested islands on the west coast, both within and beyond the boundary of this colony, where the sea fowl from a vast expanse of open ocean come to breed, enormous masses of this manure have recently been discovered; and it seems probable that all the way up the coast into the Gulf of Guinea, and beyond it, similar treasures await the agriculture of the world, by which means the sea will render back to the land much more matter fitted to form organized, that is, vegetable and animal substances, than the rivers carry down into their depths, or the fleets of the nations deposit in their course over its surface."—Bell's Messenger.

From Hood's Magazine.

THE BRIDGE OF SIGNS.

"Drowned! drowned!"—HAMLET.

ONE more Unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care;
Fashion'd so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!

Look at her garments
Clinging like cerements;
Whilst the wave constantly
Drips from her clothing;
Take her up instantly,
Loving, not loathing.—

Touch her not scornfully;
Think of her mournfully,
Gently and humanly;
Not of the stains of her,
All that remains of her
Now is pure womanly.

Make no deep scrutiny
Into her mutiny
Rash and undutiful;
Past all dishonor,
Death has left on her
Only the beautiful.

Still, for all slips of hers,
One of Eve's family—
Wipe those poor lips of hers
Oozing so clammyly.

Loop up her tresses
Escaped from the comb,
Her fair auburn tresses;
Whilst wonderment guesses
Where was her home?

Who was her father?
Who was her mother?
Had she a sister?

Had she a brother?
Or was there a dearer one
Still, and a nearer one
Yet, than all other?

Alas! for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
Oh! it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.

Sisterly, brotherly,
Fatherly, motherly
Feelings had changed:
Love, by harsh evidence,
Thrown from its eminence;
Even God's providence
Seeming estranged.

Where the lamps quiver
So far in the river,
With many a light
From window and casement,
From garret to basement,
She stood, with amazement,
Houseless by night.

The bleak wind of March
Made her tremble and shiver;
But not the dark arch,
Or the black flowing river:
Mad from life's history,
Glad to death's mystery,
Swift to be hurl'd—
Any where, any where
Out of the world!

In she plunged boldly,
No matter how coldly
The rough river ran,—
Over the brink of it,
Picture it—think of it,
Dissolute Man!
Lave in it, drink of it,
Then, if you can!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care;
Fashion'd so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!

Ere her limbs frigidly
Stiffen too rigidly,
Decently,—kindly,—
Smooth, and compose them;
And her eyes, close them,
Staring so blindly!

Dreadfully staring
Through muddy impurity,
As when with the daring
Last look of despairing
Fixed on futurity.

Perishing gloomily,
Spurred by contumely,
Cold inhumanity,
Burning insanity,
Into her rest.—
Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast!

Owning her weakness,
Her evil behavior,
And leaving, with meekness,
Her sins to her Saviour!

On the Light thrown on Geology by Submarine Researches; being the substance of a Communication made to the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Friday Evening, the 23d February, 1844. By EDWARD FORBES, F.L.S., M.W.S., &c. Prof. Bot. King's College, London.

ABOUT the middle of the last century, certain Italian naturalists* sought to explain the arrangement and disposition of organic remains in the strata of their country, by an examination of the distribution of living beings on the bed of the Adriatic Sea. They sought in the bed of the present sea for an explanation of the phenomena presented by the upheaved beds of former seas. The instrument, by means of which they conducted their researches, was the common oyster-dredge. The results they obtained bore importantly on Geology; but since their time, little has been done in the same line of research,—the geologist has been fully occupied above water, and the naturalist has pursued his studies with far too little reference to their bearing on geological questions, and on the history of animals and plants in time. The dredge, when used, has been almost entirely restricted to the search after rare animals, by the more adventurous among zoologists.

Convinced that inquiries of the kind referred to, if conducted with equal reference to all the natural history sciences, and to their mutual connection, must lead to results still more important than those which have been obtained, I have, for several years, conducted submarine researches by means of the dredge. In the present communication, I shall give a brief account of some of the more remarkable facts and conclusions to which they have led, and as briefly point out their bearings on the science of geology.

I. Living beings are not distributed indifferently on the bed of the sea, but certain species live in certain parts, according to the depth, so that the sea-bed presents a series of zones or regions, each peopled by its peculiar inhabitants.—Every person who has walked between high and low water-marks on the British coasts, when the tide was out, must have observed, that the animals and plants which inhabit that space, do not live on all parts of it alike, but that particular kinds reach only to certain distances from its extremities. Thus the species of Auricula are met with only at the very margin of high water mark, along with Littorina cerulea and saxatilis, Velutina otis, Kellia rubra, Balan, &c.; and among the plants, the yellow Chondrus crispus (Carrageen, or Iceland moss of the shops), and Corallina officinalis. These are succeeded by other forms of animals and plants, such as Littorina littorea, Purpura lapillus, Trochi, Actinæ, Porphyra laciniata, (Laver, Sloke,) and Ulva. Towards the margin of low water, Lottia testudinaria, Solen siliqua, and the Dulse, Rhodomenia palmata, with numerous Zoophytes, and Ascidian molluscs, indicate a third belt of life, connected, however, with the two others, by certain species common to all three, such as Patella vulgata, and Mytilus edulis. These sub-divisions of the sea-bed, exposed at ebb-tide, have long attracted attention on the coasts of our own country, and on those of France, where they have been observed by Audouin and Milne Edwards, and of Norway, where that admirable observer Sars has defined them with great accuracy.

* Maralli and Donati, and after them Soldani.

Now this subdivision of the tract between tide-marks into zones of animal life, is a representation in miniature of the entire bed of the sea. The result of my observations, first in the British seas,* and more lately in the Ægean, has been to define a series of zones or regions in depth, and to ascertain specifically the animal and vegetable inhabitants of each. Regarding the tract between tide-marks as one region, which I have termed the Littoral Zone, we find a series of equivalent regions, succeeding it in depth. In the British seas, the littoral zone is succeeded by the region of Laminariæ, filled by forests of broad-leaved Fuci, among which live some of the most brilliantly colored and elegant inhabitants of the ocean. This is the chosen habitat of Lacuna, of Rissoa, and of Nudibranchius mollusca. A belt generally of mud or gravel, in which numerous bivalve mollusca live, intervenes between the laminarian zone, (in which the Flora of the sea appears to have its maximum,) and the region of Corallines, which, ranging from a depth of from 20 to 40 fathoms, abounds in beautiful flexible zoophytes and in numerous species of Mollusca and Crustacea, to be procured only by means of the dredge. The great banks of Monomyarion Mollusca, which occur in many districts of the Northern Seas, are for the most part included in this region, and afford the zoologist his richest treasures. Deeper still is a region as yet but little explored, from which we draw up the more massy corals found on our shores, accompanied by shell-fish of the class Brachiopoda. In the Eastern Mediterranean (where, through the invaluable assistance afforded by Captain Graves, and the Mediterranean Survey, I have been enabled to define the regions in depth, to an extent, and with a precision which, without similar aid, cannot be hoped for in the British seas), between the surface and the depth of 230 fathoms, the lowest point I had an opportunity of examining, there are eight well-defined zones, corresponding in part, and presenting similar characters with those which I have enumerated as presented by the sea-bed in the North. The details of these will be given in the forthcoming volume of the Transactions of the British Association, to which body I had the honor of presenting a report on the subject, at the last meeting.

When we examine the distribution and association of organic remains, in the upheaved beds of tertiary seas, we find the zones of depth as evident as they are in the present ocean. I have proved this to my own satisfaction, by a minute comparison of the newer Pliocene strata of Rhodes, where that formation attains a great thickness, with the present state of the neighboring sea, and carrying on the comparison through the more recent tertiaries with the more ancient, have found indubitable evidences of the same phenomena. The strata of the cretaceous system yield similar evidences, and doubtless, in all time, the element of depth exercised a most important influence in regulating the distribution of animal life in the sea. If so, as our researches extend, we may hope eventually to ascertain the probable depth, or, at any rate, the region of depth, in which a given stratum containing organic remains was deposited. Every geologist will at once admit, that such a result would contribute materially to the history of sedimentary formations, and to the progress of geological science.

* The first notice of these was published in the Edinburgh Academic Annual for 1840.

II. The number of species is much less in the lower zones than in the upper. Vegetables disappear below a certain depth, and the diminution in the number of animal species indicates a zero not far distant.—This conclusion is founded on my Ægean researches. Vegetables become fewer and fewer in the lower zones; and dwindle to a single species,—a multispore, at the depth of 100 fathoms. Although the lower zones have a much greater vertical range than the higher, the number of animal species is infinitely greater in the latter. The lowest region (the 8th) in the Mediterranean, exceeds in extent all the other regions together; yet its fauna is comparatively small, and at the lowest portion explored, the number of species of testacea found was only eight. In the littoral zone, there were above 150 species. We may fairly infer, then, that as there is a zero of vegetable life, so is there one of animal life. In the sea, the vertical range of animals is greater than that of vegetables;—on the land, the reverse is the case. The geological application of this fact, of a zero of life in the ocean, is evident. All deposits formed below that zero, will be void, or almost void, of organic contents. The greater part of the sea is far deeper than the point zero; consequently, the greater part of deposits forming, will be void of organic remains. Hence we have no right to infer that any sedimentary formation, in which we find few or no traces of animal life, was formed either before animals were created, or at a time when the sea was less prolific in life than it now is. It might have been formed in a very deep sea. And that such was the case in regard to some of our older rocks, such as the great slates, is rendered the more probable, seeing that the few fossils we find in them, belong to tribes which, at present, have their maximum in the lowest regions of animal life, such as the Brachiopoda, and Pteropoda, of which, though free swimmers in the ocean, the remains accumulate only in very deep deposits. The uppermost deposits, those in which organic remains would be most abundant, are those most liable to disappear, in consequence of the destroying action of denudation. The great and almost nonfossiliferous strata of Scaglia, which form so large a part of the south of Europe and of Western Asia, were probably, for the most part, formed below the zero of life. The few fossils they contain, chiefly nummulites, correspond to the foraminifera which now abound mostly in the lowest regions of animals. There is no occasion to attribute to metamorphic action the absence of traces of living beings in such rocks.

III. The number of northern forms of animals and plants is not the same in all the zones of depth, but increases either positively, or by representation, as we descend. The association of species in the littoral zone is that most characteristic of the geographical region we are exploring; but the lower zones have their faunas and floras modified by the presence of species which, in more northern seas, are characteristic of the littoral zones. Of course, this remark applies only to the northern hemisphere; though, from analogy, we may expect to find such inversely the case also in the southern. The law, put in the abstract, appears to be, that parallels in depth are equivalent to parallels in latitude, corresponding to a well-known law in the distribution of terrestrial organic beings, viz., that parallels in elevation are equivalent to parallels in latitude: for example, as we ascend mountains in tropical countries, we find the successive belts of vegetation more and more northern or southern (according to the hemisphere) in character, either by identity of species, or by representation of forms by similar forms; so in the sea, as we descend, we find a similar representation of climates in parallels of latitude in depth. The possibility of such a representation has been hypothetically anticipated in regard to marine animals by Sir Henry De La Beche,* and to marine plants by Lamouroux. To me it has been a great pleasure to confirm the felicitous speculations of those distinguished observers. The fact of such a representation has an important geological application. It warns us that all climatal inferences drawn from the number of northern forms in strata containing assemblages of organic remains, are fallacious, unless the element of depth be taken into consideration. But the influence of that element once ascertained, (and I have already shown the possibility of doing so,) our inferences assume a value to which they could not otherwise pretend. In this way, I have no doubt, the per-centage test of Mr. Lyell will become one of the most important aids in geology and natural history generally; and, in fact, the most valuable conclusions to which I arrived by the reduction of my observations in the Ægean, were attained through the employment of Mr. Lyell's method.

IV. All varieties of sea-bottom are not equally capable of sustaining animal and vegetable life.—In all the zones of depth there are occasionally more or less desert tracts, usually of sand or mud. The few animals which frequent such tracts are mostly soft and unpreservable. In some muddy and sandy districts, however, worms are very numerous, and to such places many fishes resort for food. The scarcity of remains of testacea in sandstones, the tracks of worms on ripple-marked sandstones, which had evidently been deposited in a shallow sea, and the fish remains often found in such rocks, are explained, in a great measure, by these facts.

V. Beds of marine animals do not increase to an indefinite extent. Each species is adapted to live on certain sorts of sea-bottom only. It may die out in consequence of its own increase changing the ground.—Thus, a bed of scallops, Pecten opercularis, for example, or of oysters having increased to such an extent that the ground is completely changed, in consequence of the accumulation of the remains of dead scallops or oysters, becomes unfitted for the further sustenance of the tribe. The young cease to be developed there, and the race dies out, and becomes silted up or imbedded in sediment, when, the ground being renewed, it may be succeeded either by a fresh colony of scallops, or by some other species or assemblage of species. This "rotation of crops," as it were, is continually going on in the bed of the sea, and affords a very simple explanation of the alternation of fossiliferous and nonfossiliferous strata; organic remains in rocks being very rarely scattered through their substance, but arranged in layers of various thickness, interstratified with layers containing few or no fossils. Such interstratification may, in certain cases, be caused in another way, to-wit, by the elevation or subsidence of the sea-bottom, and the consequent destruction of the inhabitants of one region of depth, and the substitution of those of another. It is by such effects of oscillation of level, we may account for the repetition, at intervals, in certain formations of strata indicating the same region of depth.

* Ten years ago, in his "Researches in Theoretical Geology."

VI. Animals having the greatest ranges in depth have usually a great geographical, or else a great geological range, or both.—I found that such of the Mediterranean testacea as occur both in the existing sea, and in the neighboring territories, were such as had the power of living in several of the zones in depth, or else had a wide geographical distribution, frequently both. The same holds true of the testacea in the tertiary strata of Great Britain. The cause is obvious: such species as had the widest horizontal and vertical ranges in space, are exactly such as would live longest in time, since they would be much more likely to be independent of catastrophes and destroying influences, than such as had a more limited distribution. In the cretaceous system, also, we find that such species as lived through several epochs of that era, are the few which are common to the cretaceous rocks of Europe, Asia, and America. Count D'Archiac and M. de Verneuil, in their excellent remarks on the fauna of the Palæozoic rocks, appended to Mr. Murchison and Professor Sedgwick's valuable memoir on the Rhenish Provinces, have come to the conclusion that the fossils common to the most distant localities, are such as have the greatest vertical range. My observations on the existing testacea and their fossil analogues, lead to the same inference. It is very interesting thus to find a general truth coming out, as it were, in the same shape, from independent inquiries at the two ends of time.

VII. Mollusca migrate in their larva state, but cease to exist at a certain period of their metamorphosis, if they do not meet with favorable conditions for their development; i. e., if they do not reach the particular zone of depth in which they are adapted to live as perfect animals.

This proposition, which, as far as I am aware, is now put forward for the first time, includes two or three assertions which require explanation and proof, before I can expect the whole to be received. First, that mollusca migrate. In the fourth volume of the Annals of Natural History, (1840,) I gave a zoo-geological account of a shell-bank in the Irish Sea, being a brief summary of the results of seven years' observations at a particular season of the year. In that paper, I made known the appearance, after a time, of certain mollusca on the coasts of the Isle of Man, which had not previously inhabited those shores. They were species of limpet, about which there could be no mistake, and one was a littoral species. At that time, I could not account for their appearance. Many similar facts have since come to my knowledge, and fishermen are familiar with what they call "shifting" of shell-beds, which they erroneously attribute to the moving away and swimming off of a whole body of shell-fish, such as mussels and oysters. Even the Pecten, much less the testacea just named, have very little power of progressing to any distance, when fully developed. The "shifting" or migration is accomplished by the young animals when in a larva state. This brings me to a second point, which needs explanation. All mollusca undergo a metamorphosis either in the egg, or out of the egg, but, for the most part, among the marine species out of the egg. The relations of the metamorphoses of the several tribes are not yet fully made out: but sufficient is now known to warrant the generalization. In one great class of mollusca, the Gastropoda, all appear to commence life under the same form, both of shell and animal, viz., a very simple, spiral, helicoid shell, and an animal furnished with two ciliated wings or lobes, by which it can swim freely through the fluid in which it is contained. *At this stage of the animal's existence, it is in a state corresponding to the permanent state of a Pteropod,** and the form is alike whether it be afterwards a shelled or shell-less species. (This the observations of Dalyell, Sars, Alder and Hancock, Allman, and others prove, and I have seen it myself.) It is in this form that most species migrate, swimming with ease through the sea. Part of the journey may be performed sometimes by the strings of eggs which fill the sea at certain seasons, and are wafted by currents. My friend, Lieut. Spratt, R. N., has lately forwarded me a drawing of a chain of mollusca, taken eighty miles from shore, and which, on being hatched, produced shelled larvæ of the forms which I have described. If they reach the region and ground, of which the perfect animal is a member, then they develop and flourish; but if the period of their development arrives before they have reached their destination, they perish, and their fragile shells sink into the depths of the sea. Millions and millions must thus perish, and every handful of the fine mud brought up from the eighth zone of depth in the Mediterranean, is literally filled with hundreds of these curious exuvæ of the larvæ of mollusca.†

Were it not for the law which permits of the development of these larvæ only in the region of which the adult is a true native, the zones of depth would long ago have been confounded with each other, and the very existence of the zones of depth is the strongest proof of the existence of the law. Our confidence in their fixity, which the knowledge of the fact that mollusca migrate might at first shake, is thus restored, and with it our confidence in the inferences applicable to geology which we draw from submarine researches.

Some of the facts advanced in this communication are new, some of them have been stated before: but all, for which no authority is given, whether new or old, are put forth as the results of personal observation.

---

THE GLACIARIUM.—This establishment, which has been removed to Grafton street East, Tottenham-court-road, was opened on Monday afternoon. The area of artificial ice is extremely convenient for such as may be desirous of engaging in the graceful and manly pastime of skating. It represents a lake imbedded amid Alpine scenery, with snow-covered mountains and precipitous glaciers, the judicious management of the light giving everything a cold and wintry appearance, rendered perfect by the masses of snow under which every species of vegetation seem to bend, which fills every cleft in the rocks, and which has lodged in fantastic wreaths at the bottom of every valley.

* It is not improbable that the form of the larva of the Pteropod, when it shall be known, will be found to be that of an Ascidian polype, even as the larva of the Tunica presents us with the representation of a hydroid polype.

† The nucleus of the shells of the Cephalopoda is a spiral-univalve, similar in form to the undeveloped shells above alluded to, and it is yet to be seen whether all Cephalopoda do not commence their existence under a spiral-shelled Pteropodous form.

ITALY.

It would seem that all appearance of disorder in the Neapolitan States had vanished. Letters received in Paris from Naples, dated the 9th inst., state that the accouchement of the Queen of Naples was imminent, and that the Duke de Montpensier (hourly expected to arrive from Algiers) would be the sponsor of the prince or princess to be born. These despatches are totally silent respecting politics or political movements.

FRANCE.

RAILWAYS.—The attention of the Chamber has been chiefly directed to railway legislation. Two schemes are before the House,—one for a railway from Orleans to Bordeaux, and the other from Paris to Lyons. Various opinions prevail as to the best plan for carrying the schemes into practical operation. One party were of opinion that government should construct the works and lay down the rails, and then lease them to companies, who would supply carriages and work them; another party incline to the English plan, of leaving the whole affair in the hands of private companies; whilst a third are in favor of the mixed plan recommended by government, which, it is argued, combines the advantages of private enterprise with those to be derived from national aid and supervision. The government, it is believed, have a majority in their favor.

On Dit, that the French Ministry are negotiating with the British for a recognition of absolute French sovereignty over the Society Islands, and that they mean to divide the island of San Domingo between them. Looking to the East—to Asia and Africa, and to Oceania—how the argumentum ad hominem might be used in reply to their bold protest against the annexation of Texas to the United States! The Tahiti question has been suspended by the debates in the Chamber of Peers on the Education bill, and those of the Deputies on the Penitentiary System. Seven long sittings have been accorded by the Peers to the struggle between the Clergy and the University, and it is not yet decided. A succession of most elaborate written discourses on universal ecclesiastical history, and every scheme of public instruction, ancient and modern, might already have exhausted the patience of the venerable assembly. Cousin, the philosopher, lectured first, for more than three hours; the champions of the clergy were few in the comparison, but potent in zeal, intrepidity, and matter of both fact and argument. In the Chamber of Deputies AUBURN and SHERRY will have been made the most familiar of sounds; “the whole Chamber shuddered,” says a reporter, “as the orators described the iron gag employed at Sherry Hill; DE TOCQUEVILLE, the Pennsylvanian, could not disprove the assertions.”

TURKEY.

In the Levant, France, England, and the other Christian powers, are interposing effectually to stop the persecutions and cruelties exercised over the Greeks and other Christians in the Turkish provinces. The Sultan seems to act with good faith and sincerity; he has pledged himself to the heads of the European diplomacy that he will exert all the power of his government to punish these cruelties, and to establish a general and equal toleration throughout his dominions. But he is everywhere opposed by the bigoted Turks, and in many cases by the pachas. The commander in chief, Riza Pacha, was recently ordered to march to Adrianople, to protect the Christians in that district and throughout Roumelia. Two days before sending off the last accounts, the Sultan had desired him to proceed to Adrianople, to organize the troops, and direct the necessary measures for the pacification of the mountaineers of Albania, but the Pacha pleaded serious illness, and declined accepting the mission.

A course of action has just occurred in Turkey, strongly marking the growth of European influence, though it may be described in few words. Moved by the sanguinary execution of some persons who had been converted to Islamism from Christianity and had relapsed—an offence for which the Mussulman penalty is death—the representatives of France and England have obtained a formal assurance that such extreme punishment shall not again be inflicted. This concession excited a fanatical feeling, and the Turkish government detected a most extensive conspiracy to massacre Christians, or make some other religious demonstration. The danger was stopped by a bold measure: the Porte suddenly discovered a necessity for recruiting its army and navy; and, under the name of recruits, no fewer than fifteen thousand persons, suspected of conspiring, have been conveyed from Constantinople to an island in the Sea of Marmora; whence they will be distributed among the naval and military forces.—Spectator.

A remarkable act of power has just taken place in Constantinople, in the deportation of a large number of the populace to the islands in the Sea of Marmora. The number is said to be 15,000, though this is probably exaggerated; and the cause is rumored to be the fanatical wrath of the populace at the decree against beheading Christians who, after having embraced Islamism, have returned to Christianity.

Some of our contemporaries express a fear that our ambassador, in demanding this measure of common sense and common mercy, may have gone too far, and provoked the feelings of the people by his premature humanity. That political incendiaries and the remnant of the Janizaries may have taken advantage of this decree to endanger the public peace, is possible; because, where such intentions and such means exist, any pretext will serve the purpose. But the whole seems to have been little more than a conspiracy to unseat the Minister RIZA PACHA. Whether from his stricter discipline, or from the old Turkish passion for seeing the head of a vizier tossed over the walls of the seraglio to them once a year, the Minister seemed a fit object for a Cabinet change; and a conspiracy was organized accordingly. In former days, when the Janizaries were powerful, those turbulent managers of the state would have beaten their drums, marched to the seraglio, strangled the Divan, and brought back the Sultan's head in a sack. But, as MAHMOUD cut up their supremacy a quarter of a century ago, by discharges of grape-shot, they have now no other expedient than to raise the rabble, and curse the Padishah in their coffee-houses. Rebellions of this order are easily put down; and the result of the present émute is exhibited in the seizure of those barbarian bigots, and their transport to the prison-islands, until they can be sent to employ their vigor more usefully on board the fleet. The Minister deserves credit for his promptitude on the occasion, and the Sultan for supporting him.

But we feel no alarm at the consequences attending the performance of the decree in the amplest manner. Fanaticism is no longer an element of national strength, whatever might have been its power when the Arab chivalry had nothing to oppose them but the degenerate Greeks of the eighth century: it has always failed before regular troops. The Turks have not gained a battle in Europe these two hundred years; and MEHEMET ALI, with his Egyptian recruits, raw as they were, hunted them out of Syria, and would have hunted them out of Constantinople, if his career had not been stopped by troops better disciplined than his own. It is plain that the age of fanatical triumphs is gone by; and that, if the Turks are to rely on the cry of "Allah, Allah," and cutting off the heads of relapsed Christians, they will be beaten wherever a shot is fired. We may admit that the renegade, in general, is not a character worth much of our sympathy, or even that his fall to Islamism may have been an utterly corrupt transaction. Still we have no right to doubt the motives of his return to Christianity until we discover their unsoundness. We know that he is right, at least, in the act; that Christianity gives grounds for its adoption sufficient, in the most complete degree, to satisfy the most deliberate inquiry; that no man of the common rate of the human understanding can sink its purity, power, and purposes to the level of other religions; and that, therefore, there is always prima facie evidence of the rectitude of a convert to Christianity. Even this evidence derives additional force from the personal difficulties besetting the change in a country where, until this moment, the penalty was instant death. We cannot doubt that some of those converts may have been perfectly disinterested and perfectly sincere.

But the measure itself, if regarded merely in a political point of view, we must consider as adding to the public strength of Turkey. It breaks down a portion of that partition-wall which, without protecting the Turk, separated him from European sympathy; impressed the idea that he was a cureless savage, actuated by no principle but love of blood and blind bigotry; and, above all, justified the charge that his existence was incompatible with the diffusion of true religion. We know the hazards of rash proselytism, but we cannot doubt the benefits of reason, knowledge, and toleration.

The last news from Turkey is that the Porte has given way, and rendered to the French and English ambassadors a formal pledge to put no more converts from Islamism to Christianity to death. The value of this concession is certainly not great, if it be true that the penalty is to be in future imprisonment for life. We should imagine that the representatives of the European courts would not consent to leave the work so incomplete. The last accounts say that a despatch has been received by the French Government from the Baron de Bourqueney at Constantinople, dated March 24, addressed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, which states that the Reis Effendi, Rifaat Pasha, had handed to the chief interpreters of the French and British Ministers the following official note, dated March 21:—

"His Highness, the Sultan, has irrevocably resolved to maintain amicable relations, and to contract the bonds of perfect sympathy which unite him to the great powers.

"The Sublime Porte engages to prevent by effectual measures any Christian abjuring Islamism in future from suffering death."

ATROCITIES OF THE ALBANIANS.—The Presse publishes the following extract from a letter from a private correspondent at Constantinople, describing the atrocities committed against the Christians in Roumelia at the very gates of the capital:—"I have no time to speak of my private affairs, as my attention is exclusively occupied by the atrocities committed by the Albanians on my unfortunate country. It would be impossible to describe the scenes I have witnessed in the village of Bonasrava, in the district of Uskup, as well as in other districts of that province. I have seen the male inhabitants attached to stakes whilst these robbers gratified their passion on the wives and daughters of those unfortunate people. Other men were suspended by the feet and burned with straw. The villains were not satisfied with committing this unheard-of act of barbarity, but, through a refinement of cruelty, they forced the wives to set fire to the stakes to which their own husbands were attached. This is not all (here follow details of a character such as it is impossible for us to publish.) They have placed young men on spits and roasted them like sheep, saying, 'During the time of Hifzi Pasha you would not give us roast mutton; we are now going to roast yourselves, and you have only to cry, Long live Hifzi Pasha.' I will not fatigue you with a description of the pillage and murders committed every day, as well as the prodigious number of persons whom these ferocious Albanians force to embrace Mohammedism. The prudent Turks approve not this conduct, and pity our misfortunes. In the district of Guilar the inhabitants of an entire village have been compelled to embrace Islamism, not being able longer to resist the vexations and atrocities of the Albanians. It would appear to me that the words of our Saviour mentioned in the holy Gospels are being accomplished. 'Wo to women with child, and to those who suckle, in these days of misfortune, for there will be a great famine on the earth.'" "It appears," adds the Presse, "that on being informed of these atrocities, the Austrian and Russian Ambassadors, MM. de Strumer and de Titoff, who had completely abstained, whilst MM. Canning and de Bourqueney had so much trouble in obtaining satisfaction from the Porte, have taken in hand energetically the cause of the Christians of Roumelia, and demanded exemplary satisfaction against the Albanians."

It is now conjectured that the zeal of British and French interposition at Constantinople in behalf of the relapsed renegades, and of the Christian subjects of the Porte generally, comes from a design to supplant Russia in the favor and reliance of that numerous portion. An English writer at Constantinople, says:

"The result of the measures of the British Ambassador has been to create a very general reaction among the Christians, both Greek and Armenian, in favor of English interests, and to place Russia and Austria in an unfavorable position in the eyes of the Turks and of the Rayiahs. It is generally believed that the former is meditating some energetic remonstrance on the Albanian atrocities, in order to regain the sympathies of the Christians, which, by its policy in the late question, it had forfeited. The eyes of the Christian subjects of the Sultan are now open to the machinations of Russia. Had the English note produced no other effect than this, it would have been sufficient to establish its importance."

From the Britannia.

REV. SYDNEY SMITH AND MR. EVERETT.

THE facetious castigator of Jonathan appears before the public once again on the old subject of his plunder and pleasantry. He told us some time ago that, whenever he saw a Pennsylvanian at dinner, "he longed to divide him;" to give to one man in the company his beaver, to another his coat, to a third his silver watch, and to a fourth his gilt chain, as a sort of repayment for the public robbery which had made up the furnishing of the aforesaid Pennsylvanian.

But we were not aware of the practical joke which the canon meditated on the first opportunity. He has now caught a live Jonathan, and, as the zoological lecturers advise, he has taken him home, for the inspection of his habitats. He has duly fed the animal for forty-eight hours, marked his manner of deglutition, and, (keeping his spoons out of his way,) has studied his acquisitive instincts. We shall soon expect a valuable memoir from his pen on the genus Yankee and species Pennsylvanian. Whether he has "divided" his subject, and sent him watchless, purseless, and sensu culotte, back into the world, we know not; but that he has dissected, anatomized, and preserved a clever facsimile of his morbid configuration for public experience we have not doubt whatever:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

"Sir,—The Locofoco papers in America are, I observe, full of abuse of Mr. Everett, their Minister, for spending a month with me at Christmas, in Somersetshire. That month was neither lunar nor calendar, but consisted of forty-eight hours: a few minutes more or less.

"I never heard a wiser or more judicious defence than he made to me and others of the American insolvency; not denying the injustice of it—speaking of it, on the contrary, with the deepest feeling, but urging with great argumentative eloquence every topic that could be pleaded in extenuation. He made upon us the same impression he appears to make universally in this country; we thought him (a character which the English always receive with affectionate regard,) an amiable American, republican without rudeness, and accomplished without ostentation. 'If I had known that gentleman five years ago, (said one of my guests,) I should have been deep in the American funds; and, as it is, I think at times that I see 19s. or 20s. in the pound in his face.'

"However this may be, I am sure we owe to the Americans a debt of gratitude for sending to us such an excellent specimen of their productions. In diplomacy a far more important object than falsehood is to keep two nations in friendship. In this point, no nation has ever been better served than America has been served by Mr. Edward Everett.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,
"April 17. "SYDNEY SMITH."

THE MILITARY ANNUAL FOR 1844. Colburn, London.—A very useful species of work seems about to become the practice of the London publishers and authors. It is that of assigning to every art and profession, and almost every branch of business and trade, its own calendar, manual, or annual register. Thus we have the Gardener's Annual and Calendar, the Artist's Annual and Calendar, and the Farmer's and Agriculturist's in every shape. As this practice follows the established principle, the division of labor, and thus proceeds upon the undeniable truth that everything will be best done which is done separately and by itself, with the undivided attention of the writer, and with the union of all his efforts directed to a single object, it is obviously adapted to give us the best knowledge upon every subject, and by confining its matter to a single purpose only, to accomplish such design in the fullest and most forcible manner. It therefore affords us satisfaction to see the further extension of these annuals, and in return for the useful industry of the writers we shall willingly select these works for our special notice.

This is an annual for the army,—well printed, well ornamented, and in many of its articles well collected and composed,—containing narratives and memorials of general interest to all military readers, whilst its embellishments, and tasteful mode of printing, render it a suitable ornament for the library or drawing-room. The collection of courts martial, in the year, their proceedings and sentences, is matter of much military interest and utility; they are records of military law, and useful admonitions to young officers against the minor offences of levity and irregularity; they point out how seriously such things are regarded, and how effectually they retard their future promotion and public employment. "Officers will do well to remember," says one of these sentences, substantially, "that not only conformity with the mere text of the articles of war is required of them in her majesty's service, but there is expected of them also that strict observance of gentlemanly manners and feelings, and that exercise of prudence and discretion, which belong to a sound judgment and a clear understanding,—formed by useful observation of the manners of those whose well-merited reputation holds them forth as public examples, and still more by the assiduous cultivation of their own minds in that reading and study which the leisure of a military life so amply affords." We do not say that any single sentence in the courts martial collected in this annual expresses this principle of military duty in the exact terms we have given, but it is the fair result of many of them, and certainly of all of them taken collectively.

Another article of much military interest is the Historical Memoirs of Regiments from their first formation. We can easily imagine, that the present officers of any regiment feel a strong curiosity as to the history and progress of the corps to which they are attached. It also affords opportunities for the exact and particular narrative of acts of duty and laudable gallantry in the particular service of any respective regiment. We can imagine nothing more fertile in adventure and picturesque incidents than the history of some of the regiments which served through the Peninsular war.

But the best and fullest part of the work is the Obituary and Memoirs of the Generals, Colonels, and other officers, who have died during the year. This is peculiarly the office of a military annual and register, and is therefore very properly selected as one of the main distinctions of the present work. We can only conclude by recommending this annual to such of our readers as either belong to the army themselves, or have relatives and friends in this branch of the public service.—Bell's Messenger.

THE POLKA; OR, THE BOHEMIAN GIRL TO HER LOVER.

A NATIONAL BALLAD.

THE following graphic description of the famous "Polka Dance" has recently been given to the world by the celebrated Fredrika Bremer, the Edgeworth and Austin of Sweden, in a work entitled "STRIKE AND PEACE," of which a translation has appeared from the pen of a kindred writer, the accomplished Mary Howitt. This dance, which is equally popular in Bohemia, Hungary, Sweden, Norway, &c., "is," says Miss Bremer, "highly characteristic; it paints the northern inhabitants' highest joy in life; it is the Berserker-gladness in the dance. Supported upon the arm of the woman, the man throws himself high in the air; then catches her in his arms, and swings round with her in wild circles; then they separate, then they unite again, and whirl again round, as it were in superabundance of life and delight. The measure is determined, bold, and full of life. It is a dance-intoxication, in which people for the moment release themselves from every care, every burden and oppression of existence!"

DEAR youth, from the forest and mountain,
Oh, come, 'neath the wild cherry-tree—
My flax thread I've washed in the fountain,
Come, love, dance the Polka with me!
Like the waves of the Elbe madly bounding,
Let not the dark Wodnyk† affright,
The Mandoline long has been sounding,
Like Vilas‡ we'll dance through the night!
DEAR youth, from the forest and mountain,
Oh, come, 'neath the wild cherry-tree—
My flax thread I've washed in the fountain,
Come, love, dance the Polka with me!

With the Garnets you gave to adorn me,
Those gems in our Giant's Glen§ found,
That our Burggrave himself should not scorn me,
By my gold-hearted|| mother I'm crown'd!

* The branches of the wild cherry-tree, which are supposed to possess many magical properties in Bohemia, &c., are used in wedding festivities. It is the favorite tree of Slavonian song and superstition.

† The Wodnyk, or Wodnik—water-demon, frequently the subject of popular stories in Bohemia; his name is used to frighten children away from the water-side—"The Wodnyk will catch you!" is a common exclamation with mothers and nurses.

‡ Vilas—a race of mountain spirits very popular throughout all the German provinces; they have lately been rendered somewhat familiar in England under the name of Willis, in the ballet of "Giselle;" there is an account of them in Keightley's "Fairy Mythology."

§ Giant's Glen, or Riesengrund, a deep valley in the vicinity of the Elbe, and the Beraun, in which precious stones are often found. Bohemia has long been celebrated for the beauty and quantity of its native garnets, which almost rival in brilliancy and value those of the East.

|| Golden, is a particular term of endearment in Slavonian poetry; it occurs frequently in the ballads of Bohemia. In the popular old song "Matko Maticko," a love-sick damsel thus addresses her mother:

Mother, sweet mother mine,
Gold, is that heart of thine, &c.

And in the well-known ballad, "Na Tureckem pomezj"—another love-sick maiden thus addresses her sire—"My golden Father—Muj zlaty panto," which is the common Slavonian mode of addressing a parent. Many other examples might be given were it necessary, but these may suffice.

There's life in my feet and my arms, love!
There's fire in my heart and my soul!
I pant for the Polka's wild charms, love,
Which each sorrow of life can control!
Then come from the forest and mountain,
Oh, come 'neath the wild cherry-tree—
My flax-thread, I've wash'd in the fountain,
Come, love, dance the Polka with me!

Like wine, that glad dance will inspire me,
With transport 't will thrill every vein—
Did I dance through the night, 't would not tire me—
I would dance it at morning again!
What rapture, when heart to heart joining—
In thine eyes, love, as onwards we go,
All its magical circles entwining,
I must gaze, or I giddy should grow!
Then come from the forest and mountain,
Oh, come 'neath the wild cherry-tree—
My flax-thread I've washed in the fountain,
Come, love, dance the Polka with me!
New Monthly Magazine.

THORWALDSEN.

THE death of this remarkable man has stricken away one of the pillars of the European arts, and has produced a general sensation of regret throughout the civilized world. Such are the triumphs of genius. We have in the instance of this eminent person a striking and most exciting example of the height to which an individual, from the most unpromising circumstances of birth, condition, and country, may rise to a distinction of the very highest order in the very first circles of mankind. The rank of monarchs is already ascertained and justly acknowledged; but they are born to it, and they are monarchs only in their own dominions. A man like Thorwaldsen was as well known, and as much honored, in every land where a bust or statue from his studio was to be found, as if he had been the artist monarch of Europe. Yet this man was the son of humble parents, a struggler with poverty in his early years, and an Iclander.

Stimulated by that impetuous and irresistible love for the arts which marks the possession of genius, Thorwaldsen toiled his way to Italy, and there for many a year, poor and unknown, but never forsaking his first impulse, he labored for renown. It is gratifying to our national patronage to mention that his first commission for a statue in marble was from our countryman, the late Mr. Hope.

But the details of the great sculptor's life which have been already given in the journals render it unnecessary here to recur to his history. The point of view in which it strikes us as most important is its evidence of the celebrity which may be attracted to the most obscure individual by the vigorous exertion of talents. The arts are but one department of distinction, though unquestionably a most noble, impressive, and captivating one.

The style of Thorwaldsen was wholly his own. While Canova, perhaps unrivalled for elegance, too often sought its conceptions in the theatre, his rival delighted in nervous simplicity. They held towards each other some general relation to the different excellences of Raphael and Michael Angelo—the contrast of rich amenity with chaste and daring power.

Thorwaldsen's funeral, which took place March 30, at Copenhagen, was honored as perhaps the funeral of a subject was never honored before.

The king, in deep mourning, received the body at the entrance of the church; and the crown prince, as President of the Academy of Fine Arts, at the head of its members followed by the royal princes and the principal officers of state, walked after the hearse. Troops, processions of the different guilds and orders of citizens, and a concourse of thousands formed the train of this fine national ceremony. And all this honor was paid to the memory of a peasant's son, a native of the wildest and most northern region of Europe, whose only mansion was a studio, and whose only implement of fortune and fame was a chisel.

The streets were lined with troops as at a royal funeral; the queen and princesses attended the service in the church; orations were made by the principal artists and others where the body had lain in state; anthems were performed in the room adorned with his works; and, when the ceremony was at an end, the king headed the subscription for a monument on a magnificent scale by the regal subscription of 25,000 dollars. The whole tribute of memory and gratitude does almost as much honor to the monarch and the people as to Thorwaldsen.—Britannia.

SLAVERY IN CUBA.

OUR readers are already partially aware of the terrible cruelties inflicted on the slaves in Cuba engaged in the late attempt to throw off their accursed bondage. The following letter from a Spanish looker-on will be read with interest:—

"HAVANNA, Feb. 28.—In my last letter I informed you of the movements of the negroes, and in what an unsettled state we find ourselves here, where fear and distrust are augmenting every day, because we do not see the supreme government take any measure capable of saving us: on the contrary, we clearly perceive that we are conducted towards a precipice. The whole island is undermined, the conspiracy of the blacks is very extensive, and it is easy to see that they have a settled idea of emancipation, which they will sooner or later accomplish. The punishments of every kind have been horrible, we may say barbarous. Besides those killed in action, the masters of the negroes have been allowed the discretionary power of inflicting any punishment they please, and many have perished under the lash. To my knowledge there are sugar works in which as many as nine of these unfortunate beings have expired during the continuation of this barbarous treatment. I do not seek to exculpate the owners of the slaves who have acted in this manner, for what else can they do? The government leaves the negro conspirators at their mercy. If these are not severely chastised, how can the masters maintain subordination! Can they suffer the other slaves to witness the impunity of their crime? Eleven were sentenced lately by the court-martial to be shot, and afterwards burnt. Horrid scenes! which, however, neither ave nor cause any effect upon the conspiring masses. I will relate a fact which proves this. The negroes of the sugar-mill of Quevedo (an establishment situate near Guines) were to rise on the 11th inst., but the unexpected arrival of several white people who came to sleep there hindered the breaking out. This conspiracy was discovered by accident; and after the slaves had confessed their plan, which was (as everywhere else) to murder the whites, and destroy everything by fire and sword, they were asked where they had concocted the plan; their answer was 'At the Savanilla, while witnessing the execution of their comrades!'

"In the establishment of one of my brothers, whose slaves have seen all the executions, and amongst others that of the celebrated Jose Dolores (a negro, the terror of all that district,) eight of them are compromised in the conspiracy; and we know that in the settlement there still exists a negro king and war standard, but they cannot be detected. What does all this teach us? That measures of terror are insufficient, that the thought and the desire of liberty are superior to all, and that other steps must be adopted for the white man's safety."

GOING OUT A SHOOTING.

Blest age, when lawyers ape the deeds
Of Bayard and the Cid,
And scorn the peaceful "Practices"
Of Impey and of Tidd!

When big wigs leave the courts and change
(Of arms blood-thirsty takers,)
The venue to the Phoenix park,
Or to the "Fifteen Acres."*

When charged with dirt, Pot asks if Crock
To him the slur applies,
And bids him state, "if not, why not,"
Or show "how otherwise."

Then seeking "satisfaction" claims
To take up arms—jus flendum—
By right of martial capias
Ad satisfaciendum.

Whilst each his "friend" sends for a leech,
And arms, and to bespeak 'm,
At parting serves said "friend" with a
Subpana duces tecum.

Or, p'rhaps too fierce, to wait until
Without the fane of Nemesis, Cries, "Let us load at once and have An 'action on the premises.'"

But ah! sometimes one big wig proves
A peaceful man—God bless us!
And 'gainst such "motions," from the court,
Implores a stet processus.

What then does t'other big wig? Pshaw!
One hardly sure need ax it;
He "bolts his bounce,"—in other words
He "enters a retrazil."

MORAL.

Henceforth let all fierce lawyers shun,
(As but their souls† to catch meant,)
The "right of challenge" and be friends,
By "process of attachment."

Punch.

* Query, Alter et idem? All we can say is, if the topography, be not correct; for the sake of the text, it ought to be.—Note by the Commentator.

† "A negro has a soul, an please your honor," said the Corporal. "I hope so, Trim," replied my Uncle Toby. We would hardly be less charitable than my Uncle Toby, even to the class of moral negroes.—Ibid.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.—A meeting was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, for the purpose of recommending the formation of a society to be entitled "The British and Foreign Society for Promoting the Restoration of the Jewish Nation to Palestine." It is proposed to accomplish this object by endeavoring to induce the British government to take the Jews in Palestine under their special protection—to negotiate with the Porte for the independence of that country under the protection of England and the great powers who might concur in the object, and to aid and to call upon all Christendom to aid in the conveyance of poor Jewish families, desirous to return to the land of their fathers, to locate them properly on the land, under the direction of skilful agricultural agents, and to provide them with seed, implements of husbandry, and provisions, until they reap the first. Resolutions, approving of such a society, were adopted.

HOLY THURSDAY IN VIENNA.—The Emperor and Empress performed to-day the ancient religious ceremony of washing the feet of 12 aged men and 12 old women. The ceremony was very impressive (qr. ridiculous,) and attracted a vast number of spectators. The age of the oldest man was 110 years, the youngest 83; and of the women the oldest 106, the youngest 84. They were all habited in decent new clothing, and after the ceremony partook of refreshments.

LONDON SOCIETY FOR TEACHING THE BLIND TO READ.—A meeting for furthering the objects of this institution was held at the Hanover-square Rooms. The Bishop of Winchester presided. The report showed that the labors of the society are not limited to the schools alone. The work of embossing the Holy Scriptures, upon Lucas's plan, has been successfully carried on, and the experience of each successive year serves to attest the efficiency of the system. Several branch schools have been established in different parts of England, and many benevolent persons and missionary agents have conveyed the embossed volumes to distant lands, and thus, in all quarters of the world, mitigated the affliction of the blind by imparting to them the ability to read the word of God. The society wish to procure more commodious premises, the house which it now occupies being too confined to allow the admission of more pupils. Some blind children read from Lucas's system several chapters from Isaiah with extraordinary facility. Hymns were also sung by the children, accompanied on the organ by Miss Bowling, a blind professional lady, who instructs the pupils in singing.

EXTRAORDINARY EXHUMATION ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.—The Britannia, Captain E. Wylie, left Ichaboe, on the west coast of Africa, whither she had been for guano, on the 7th of February, and arrived at this port on Sunday last with a cargo of that article. The captain reports that on the 15th of January a "mummy" was dug out of the guano, and close upon it there was a common oak stave with the inscription "Columbus Delano, 1791," cut apparently with an ordinary scribe for marking wood. It was found only four feet below the surface, and no idea could be formed of the depth at which it had originally been buried; so that supposing it to have been merely covered under the then level, the accumulation of the guano over the long intermediate period of 53 years, could not have much exceeded 21 to 3 feet. It is remarkable that the body was in a state of perfect preservation, and equally so was the canvas in which it was enclosed, being perfectly fresh and strong. The fact will furnish materials for conjecture to chemists and druggists.

GUANO IN GARDENS.—A friend says:—Perhaps it is not generally known, that a slight sprinkling of guano is of essential service to leek and onion beds, when fairly braided or above ground. The experiment was tried last year, and proved eminently successful. In the same garden, during several preceding seasons, the worms and other insects had acquired a mastery that went far to destroy the entire crop; but after, and in consequence of the new application, the gustiest of pot herbs, at lifting time and long after, were found sound and good; in fact, not a few of them are so still. The powdering, however, should be skilfully light, otherwise the effects may prove hurtful rather than beneficial. Of the accuracy of the latter fact we have ourselves seen instances in the case of flowers, a large portion of which were utterly destroyed from the over-use of guano, an article which, in some respects, resembles salt and soot—both excellent antidotes to vermin, but which, if used with too lavish a hand, may render the cure worse than the disease. The practice here recommended has long been acted on in Peru and its dependencies, not only in gardens but the open fields, in the case of a great variety of vegetables. When the plant, according to its nature, has reached a certain stage, a slight ring is drawn in the soil around, guano applied for the purposes of absorption, and the puncturings covered in. There it remains for two, three, or more days, after which the ground is watered; and if we may credit the testimony of travellers, the effects are altogether surprising.—Dumfries Courier.

STEAM ASCENT OF THE FIRST CATARACT OF THE NILE.—This great feat, an epoch in science and its African power, seems to have been effected principally through the energy and presence of mind of Achmet Menikli Pacha, the new governor of Soudan, who was ascending the river to the seat of his rule. In six days from Cairo the boat reached the group of granite rocks near Assouan, which form the cataract. The first gate was easily passed; but in the second, owing to the violence of the current, it hung for 10 minutes, vibrating but almost stationary, and in danger every moment of being dashed on the rocks only four paces distant. It was a fearful struggle; but at last, by carrying out rope in a small boat, the pacha himself and three sailors obtained a purchase on an island, and succeeded in bringing the laboring vessel through; 300 Nubians witnessed, and some of them with poles assisted, in this triumph. The third gate (as these narrow passes are called) was surmounted, and the anchor was dropped off the village of the famous island of Philoe. The exploit was attempted in 1838 by Mahomed Ali, but defeated at the second gate; and now the passage is shown to be practicable it will often be repeated, and produce important effects in this part of the world.

PENNSYLVANIAN LAW.—It is a curious fact, and not generally known, that by the laws of Pennsylvania a man may be sold into servitude who refuses to maintain his wife and children; and it is stated that recently a man was sold in Venango county, by order of the court, for an indefinite period, who had refused to maintain his wife and family, they receiving the wages of his labor for their support.

COLONEL STODDART AND CAPTAIN CONOLLY.

CAPTAIN Grover has just received letters from Dr. Wolff, dated Tehran, February 12. The Doctor had been received with great distinction by the King of Persia, who recollected having met him at Meshed twelve years ago, when he was only Prince Royal. The Doctor rode on horseback in full canonicals, accompanied by Colonel Sheil in his uniform, going to and returning from the court.

He then visited the ambassador, recently arrived from Bokhara, who "denied, in toto, the fact of the execution of our friends." The ambassador and attachés rose when he entered the room—treated him with the greatest civility and respect; and the ambassador expressed a strong desire of accompanying him to Bokhara.

The Doctor was to leave Tehran on the 14th February, accompanied by an escort ordered by the king, and Rajab, who had been servant to both Stoddart and Conolly; he had been bastinadoed at Bokhara, by the Umeer's orders, on account of his faithful attachment to his masters, and had exposed his life by going to Cabool.

The Doctor had also seen the ambassador of the King of Khiva, an enemy of the King of Bokhara, and he could give no information whatever concerning the death of the captives. "Therefore," says the Doctor, "whilst I beg you not to be too sanguine of my success, I also beg you not to despair of it, for, as all the Persians I have hitherto seen tell me, 'Malloom nest, nothing is certain about it.' You must not expect from me an exact and detailed journal, for I shall neither carry ink nor paper with me, and I shall write to you in Persian from Bokhara, and send the letters through the medium of the Umeer, in case Stoddart and Conolly should be alive; should they not be alive, I shall not write at all until I have left the frontier of Bokhara."

Colonel Sheil's exertions have been unremitting.

A BABY WANTED.

In the Times of the 22d ult., was the following touching advertisement:—

TO THE NOBILITY AND GENTRY.—As Wet-Nurse.—A lady, who has two children, intending to give her baby, a month old, to her mother who lives at a distance, and wishes to adopt it, would be happy to take a CHILD to WET-NURSE. Any parents or guardians placing their child with her may rely on its receiving the greatest possible kindness and care; a nursemaid is kept, and the child would have the benefit of going to the sea in the season; the lady is young, and has plenty of milk. (Here follows the address.)

Beautiful is liberality—more beautiful are the instincts of maternal tenderness! Here is a woman (a real "lady,") in the handsomest way "gives her baby, a month old, to her mother;" relatives interchange presents of sucking-pigs and geese with equal cordiality. The mother wishes "to adopt" her own grandchild; to turn it as it were, into her own baby, sinking the grandmother in the mamma herself. Whereupon the bereaved mother ("with plenty of milk," doubtless that of human kindness included) looks towards the nobility and gentry for consolation, and will take a "child to wet-nurse," (if with a title, doubtless the better,) treating it with the "greatest possible kindness and care," the suckling defrauded of its rightful breast having been adopted by grandmamma! We really trust that some newly-made mother of the nobility or gentry will respond to "C. E. B." (for such are her initials.) Should she, however, be disappointed in obtaining so sweet and endearing a recommendation to the notice of any of the nobility or gentry,—we have not the slightest doubt that "C. E. B." can be accommodated with a baby to suckle on a proper application at any of the Unions.—Punch.

DEATH OF A CHARACTER.—Died on Monday last, at the advanced age of 79 years, Mr. J. Pitts, of Great St. Andrew-street. The deceased for nearly half a century catered for the popular taste, by printing ballads, horrid murders, wild and wonderful tales, dying speeches, &c. In early life the deceased followed the business of a baker, to which trade he served his time, subsequently he was employed by a printer, in extensive business, in Aldermanbury, who at that period printed the songs for the street vocalists. At his master's death, Mr. Pitts started in the same business, and for many years monopolized the whole of the street publishing, without having a competitor, until the trial of Queen Caroline, when the late Mr. J. Catnach set up in the same business. By publishing that trial these rival printers realized several thousand pounds each. About this time the deceased lost his sight, after which his sense of feeling became so acute that he could immediately detect counterfeit bank notes or coins, and make his way to any part of the house, and supply the wants of customers without assistance. So averse was he to the credit system that on the receipt of goods he invariably paid the amount in cash, never drawing a check for any creditor.

"WHY DO THE FLOWERS BLOOM?"

BY J. E. CARPENTER.

- "Why do the flow'rets bloom, mother,
Why do the sweet flowers bloom,
And brightest those we rear'd, mother,
Around my brother's tomb?"
- "To fill the world with gladness,
My child, were flow'rets given,—
To crown the Earth with beauty,
And show the road to Heaven!"
- "Then why do the flow'rets fade, mother,
Why do the sweet flowers fade,
When winter's dreary clouds, mother,
Earth's brighter scenes pervade?"
- "My child those flow'rs that wither,
Have seeds that still remain,
That the sunshine and the summer
Restore to life again!"
- "And shall not those who die, mother,
Come back to live once more,
E'en as the rain and sun, mother,
Those beauteous flow'rs restore?"
- "Yes—yes, my child, such powers
To human flow'rs are given,
Here earth's frail flow'rs may blossom,
But we may rise—in Heaven."

New Monthly Magazine.

From the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal.

FLAMES IN VOLCANOES.

On the Production of Flames in Volcanoes, and the consequences that may be drawn therefrom. By M. LEOPOLD PILLA.

THE question, whether volcanic phenomena are accompanied with flames, is, in my opinion, of so much importance in the science of the earth, that the attention of natural philosophers cannot be too strongly drawn to it; doubts are still left in the mind respecting it, which ought to be removed. The greater number of men of science who have devoted themselves to the study of volcanoes, deny that there is any manifestation of this phenomenon in volcanic eruptions; and they in general think that what the vulgar, and even many writers, have called flames, is nothing else than the reflection of the light produced by the burning substances on the walls of the craters, and on the column of smoke which issues from them. I may be permitted to quote, in reference to this, the following passages from most respectable authors.

"An unanswerable proof of the insufficiency of this hypothesis (the disengagement of hydrogen gas in the eruptions of Stromboli) is the following. When the bubbles of the boiling lava burst by the escape of the enclosed gas, who does not see that if this gas consisted of hydrogen, it ought, at that moment, to become inflamed on the surface of the lava! Now, it is very certain that in no eruption do we ever see the slightest flame on the lava." *

"The different metallic combustibles and metalloids may decompose water, in proportion to the degree of affinity they possess with the oxygen of the latter, and give rise to the series of acids and oxides which appear in volcanoes. We ought, however, to observe, that the hydrogen, on leaving its state of combination, never reaches the apertures which vomit fire, and which are in communication with the atmospheric air, because we have never seen flames, either on the crater while in action, nor on the surface of the running lavas." †

"One of the consequences of Davy's hypothesis, and perhaps the most important, would be the disengagement by the craters of volcanoes of an enormous quantity of hydrogen, either free, or combined with other principles, if it really be the water which, by its oxygen, induces volcanic fires. It does not appear, however, that the disengagement of hydrogen is very frequent in volcanoes. Although, during my abode at Naples, in 1805, with my friends Messrs. Alexander de Humboldt and Leopold de Buch, I had an opportunity of witnessing at Vesuvius frequent explosions, which threw out broken lava to a height of more than 200 yards, I never perceived any inflammation of hydrogen." ‡

"The brilliant light reflected by the clouds of aqueous vapor and ashes suspended over the cone, produces this appearance, which is so often described under the erroneous denomination of flames, in the accounts of volcanic eruptions by inexperienced observers, who have no acquaintance with science." §

Sir Henry de la Beche, when describing the phenomena of an eruption of Vesuvius, expresses himself thus: "The solid substances thrown up by the volcano, appeared like a numerous discharge of red balls, while the light of the burning mass in the interior of the crater, reflected sometimes in a very vivid manner by the column of vapors above, produced, to the view of an observer, placed at a certain distance, the appearance of flames, which there are strong reasons for believing to be illusory. It is at least very certain, that almost all the cases of this nature which have been cited, have no other cause than a reflection of light, which varies in intensity with the activity of the volcano." ||

"The vapors illuminated by the incandescent substances which fill the craters, or cover their walls, have often been taken for flames. But this illusion has been combated by a great number of observers, who have affirmed that true flames never issue from the crater of a volcano." ¶

I myself, also, drawn away by so many authorities, when I commenced to observe the phenomena of Vesuvius, said, "We ought to take care in such cases not to mistake the luminous radiation produced by the stones and incandescent scoriae for flames, an error into which many people have fallen;" ** and, in fact, when I wrote this sentence, I had never observed flames from Vesuvius.

I forbear to quote in this place passages from more ancient authors. It is true that many of them, in describing volcanic phenomena, sometimes mention flames; but it is evident that they paid no particular attention to this phenomenon, and did not distinguish it from the luminous reflection produced by the burning substances.

We perceive, therefore, that geologists, up to the present time, have been of opinion that volcanic eruptions have never been accompanied with flames. This opinion, however, is altogether erroneous. At least, I think that I am entitled to make this affirmation positively in reference to Vesuvius.

Let us commence by stating the facts which may support this general proposition. Of all the phenomena which I have had occasion to observe in regard to Vesuvius for twelve years, I consider those which I am about to notice, and an acquaintance with which I owe to a fortunate accident, as the most important.

On the night of the 2d June, 1833, I was within the crater of Vesuvius, in order to observe the phenomena of an eruption, which was approaching its close. In the centre of the crater there was one of those cones of scoriae which are formed and disappear with such marvellous rapidity; it was the largest cone I had ever observed, so much so, that it might have been called the little Monte Nuovo. There was a large funnel-shaped aperture on its summit, through which the explosions took place. At the moment of which I speak, these had become less frequent, and succeeded each other at intervals of from three to four minutes. This circumstance made me desirous to mount upon the cone, in order to observe the great phenomenon of explosions, which I never before had it in my power to do near at hand, and immediately over the opening. I had frequently, indeed, observed eruptions from the summit of la Punta del Palo: but the distance from the proper opening, or what may be called the air-hole of the volcano, the walls of scoriae with which it is usually surrounded during eruptions, the smoke, the ejection of stones, and other circumstances, had always * Spallanzani, Viaggi alle Due-Sicilie, t. iii. cap. 21.

† Covelli, Storia dei fenomeni del Vesuvio, § xc.

‡ Gay-Lussac, Reflexions sur les Volcans (Ann. de Chim. et de Phys. t. xxii.)

§ Poulet Scrope, Considerations on Volcanoes, cap. 2, § 1.

|| Manuel de Geologie (art. Volcans en activité.)

¶ Brongniart, Des Volcans et des terrains volcaniques (Art. du Dict. d'Hist. Nat.)

** Spet. del Vesuv. fasc. I, § xxvii.

prevented me seeing distinctly what was going on in the volcanic orifice. At the moment of explosion I ascended to the edge of the cone, along with my courageous guide, who shared in my curiosity to observe the appearances. The interior of the opening was almost entirely free from smoke; a small quantity only issued from different points in the walls. This fortunate circumstance enabled me to see very distinctly all the parts of the crater, and everything that was going on there. The bottom of the funnel was open; it lay immediately under my eyes, at a depth of about eighty metres; its circumference was nearly twenty yards; the whole of its burning interior was visible. The view of the phenomena which accompanied the explosions was inexpressibly magnificent. They consisted of the following:

A loud subterranean noise, and a violent shock, announced the explosion; immediately after, and almost at the same time, the mouth opened and made a discharge, with a noise resembling that of a discharge of cannon. A column of black and fuliginous smoke issued with great violence, and there was thrown up, with the rapidity of lightning, an enormous torrent of inflamed gaseous substances and burning stones, which fell back again like hail, for the most part into the gulf, but partly without it. I was overpowered with the grandeur of the spectacle, but I did not fail to observe, in particular, the column of flames which accompanied the explosion. It was the first time that it had fallen to my lot to witness such a phenomenon. The flame rose to the height of four or five yards, and then disappeared among the volumes of smoke, so that a person whose eye was on a level with the edge of the gulf could not have seen it. I mention this, because the volcanic explosions are viewed from a distance, and from places where the crater in action is not visible, it never happens that the flames are visible; whence it is that the existence of this phenomenon in volcanic actions has been denied. The flame which I observed was of a very decided violet-red color. It was very obvious that the gas which produced it became inflamed by contact with the air, because it burned only on the circumference of the column, and in the interior was obscure, presenting, on a large scale, what may be seen in a lamp on a small one. After the explosion and fall of stones had terminated, another very remarkable phenomenon was perceived. Insulated flames, disposed in a very picturesque manner, remained in the bottom of the gulf, moved around the mouth, and flickered very slowly about the walls of the funnel; an appearance which might be compared, in some measure, si licet maxima comparare minimis, to the flame of alcohol burning in a crucible. The beautiful violet color of the flame was then easily distinguished; a faint smell of hydrogen gas accompanied these phenomena. I continued for a quarter of an hour gazing on this enchanting spectacle, and during that time I saw five explosions always accompanied by the same appearances; I would have remained longer in the same spot, had not the last of these explosions, which was much more violent than any of the preceding, compelled us hastily to retire.

I have had no opportunity, since the above noticed occasion, of observing the great opening of a volcano in a state of explosion; but I have noticed the existence of flames in circumstances nearly similar.

In the month of June, the following year, Vesu-vius was in a state of eruption; on the evening of the 7th I paid a visit to the crater. The interior cone was throwing up stones with such violence that it was impossible to approach it. A current of lava was spouting out through a fissure at its base. Quite near to me, there was an elevation of a longitudinal form, which bore eight small cones, or rather eight large tubes of lava, open at the summit, and throwing out gas and steam with a whistling noise that was quite deafening, and which might be compared to that caused by opening the valves of a high-pressure steam-engine. Favored by the darkness, we saw that their actions were accompanied with beautiful conical flames, which issued from the tubes with a violence which might be in some measure compared to a flame increased in intensity by a blow-pipe. The length of these flames was from three to five inches, and their diameter at the base about an inch and a half; they burnt with a beautiful greenish color, like alcohol holding boracic acid in solution: such a color would very likely be produced by the chloride of copper accompanying the gaseous substances. The smoke which escaped from the openings in the cones had an intolerable smell of muriatic acid; sulphureted hydrogen gas was not perceptible. This was the second time that I observed flames in the crater of Vesuvius, and I saw them in company with my esteemed friend M. Ravergie of Paris, who was my companion in this expedition.

I saw very beautiful flames from Vesuvius, for the third time, during the great eruption in August, 1834. An opening was formed in the volcano at its eastern base, and a great current of lava was thrown out, which spread over the fertile lands of Ottajano. In the place where the lava issued, two elevations were formed, which supported twelve small cones, kinds of hornitos, all of which were in great activity, and produced noisy explosions. One of these cones, which appeared the most active, and which I could approach near, notwithstanding the smoke it spread on all sides, was emitting by its opening, besides quantities of stones, a bright flame of a reddish-white color, which came forth with great violence, and rose to the height of three yards. The jet was continuous, like the flame from a high furnace heated by bellows. The smoke was charged with muriatic acid, and, in a few moments, it enveloped Professor Tosone of Milan and myself in such a manner that we were nearly suffocated.

I never had the good fortune to observe flames in Vesuvius in so distinct a manner as on these three occasions. I have never seen them on the surface of currents of lava far from their source. But my friend, M. Maravigna, assures me, that he observed them on a current from Etna, during the eruption of 1819.

According to all that I have said, my belief is, that volcanic explosions are constantly accompanied with flames. So convinced am I of this truth, in regard to Vesuvius, that I would engage to point them out during any eruption, provided the circumstances were at all favorable.

I again repeat, that if the existence of this phenomenon has been denied, it is owing to the great difficulty of observing explosions very near at hand; and when they are observed far from the aperture in action, as is usually the case, the flames are either concealed by the walls of scoræ which surround them, or, if they rise, they disappear among the smoke and jets of stones.

The phenomenon of which I speak is not an accidental one in the great actions of volcanoes. It is only necessary to see it once to be convinced that it is intimately connected with the cause of these actions. It may be said that flames are the most remarkable circumstance in volcanic explosions, as the latter are the most essential phenomena of eruptions; we may perceive in them the most direct external manifestation of the origin of the internal commotion. It is for this reason that I consider my observations on the flames of Vesuvius as tending to assist in explaining the cause of volcanic phenomena.

Reviewing what has been stated, I think the following conclusions may be drawn from it:—

1. Flames never appear in Vesuvius but when the volcanic action is energetic, and is accompanied with a development of gaseous substances in a state of great tension; they do not appear when the actions are feeble.

2. Their appearance always accompanies explosions from the principal mouth; only they cannot be observed but in favorable circumstances.

3. They likewise show themselves in the small cones in action, which are formed in the interior of the crater, or at the foot of the volcano.

4. Finally, they are not visible except in the openings which are directly in communication with the volcanic fire, and never on the moving lavas which are at a distance from their source.

After this exposition, it is natural to enquire, what is the gas which produces these flames in Vesuvius!*

From Hood's Magazine.

THE BIRTH-DAY PROPHECY.

It was a prince's natal day,
And Windsor's ancient halls were gay;
For many a noble knight and dame
With fair and joyous greetings came;
And many a bard with harp, and strain
Most welcome to the courtly train,
Poured forth his sweetest numbers there,
In praise of royal Edward's heir.

They sang in proud and lofty lays
The glory of his future days,
The love bestowed, the conquest won,
And all that mightiest kings have done;
And lengthened life, and peaceful age,
Each loyal harp could well presage:
And every listening courtier there
Confirmed the prophecy with prayer.

Oh! well might bard and courtier deem
Such prophecy no idle dream,
For he was fair in form and face,
The flower of all his royal race,
And in his air and eye there shone
A spirit worthy of a throne.
His father's pride, his country's hope,
What destiny with his could cope?

There came, amid that festive scene,
A bard of foreign gait and mien,
With lyre of rude and massive mould,
Like those by Druids woke of old;
But when the harps were hushed at last,
And song and greeting all were past,

Its strings the stranger minstrel woke,
And thus in song prophetic spoke:—

"Prince of the Isles, thy birth hath been
The theme of many a lyre,
And well might such a brow as thine
Less feeble strains inspire;
Thy country's song around thee swells,
And high its hopes may be,
But oh! my stranger harp foretells
A happier fate for thee:
For more than all that life can bring,
And more than mortal breath
Can ever promise to thy spring,
Is thine—an early death!

"Thy glance is proud, thy face is fair,
Thy flowing locks are bright;
But time will never blanch that hair,
Nor dim that dark eye's light.
Thy step, that moves so stately now,
Will ne'er grow faint with years;
Nor earth's deep strains of music flow
Less sweetly to thine ears.
Thou ne'er shalt see thy laurels fade
Before a greener wreath,
For life's best boon beneath their shade
Is thine—an early death!

"It may be that the darkest cloud
Flits o'er the brightest day,
And leaves the form of youth unbowed
When e'en the soul grows grey;
And oft, while brows their smoothness wear,
The spirit's youth departs;
But every furrow wanting there
Is deepened in our hearts.
And thou may'st linger in the dust,
With all thy love beneath,
But hope to find that holy trust
Restored by early death!

"Then go in fearless valor forth,
Thy destined faith pursue,
With many a deed of knightly worth,
And knightly glory too:
As a long promised heritage
Thy land awaits thy fame,
And far through many a future age
Her bards shall sing thy name:
But time can never waste away
The gems of hope and faith
That shall enshrine thy memory—
Thou sealed for early death!"

As wind that in the forest moans,
So sunk the harp's decaying tones;
But, ere their latest murmurs died,
That stranger bard was seen to glide
In silence from the castle gate,
Like one who fled approaching fate;
Nor ever more his path was found,
Though sought beyond broad Europe's bound;
But British annals testify
How time fulfilled his prophecy.

Tradition states, that a banquet given by Edward the Third, at Windsor, to celebrate the tenth birthday of his son, the Black Prince, was attended by a minstrel of strange appearance, who, in a song, predicted the future fame and early death of the boy; but he left the castle immediately, and was never seen after.

FRANCES BROWN.

On Tuesday the atmosphere was so clear across the Channel that persons in Deal could (without the aid of glasses) see the vessels leaving the harbor of Calais.

* From Comptes Rendus, 1843, No. 17, p. 839.

From the Examiner.

THE NEMESIS WAR STEAMER IN CHINA.

Narrative of the Voyages and Services of the Nemesis, from 1840 to 1843; and of the combined Naval and Military Operations in China. From Notes of Commander W. H. HALL, R. N. With personal Observations by W. D. Bernard, Esq., A. M. Oxon. Two vols. Colburn.

THIS book is in effect a complete history of the operations and results of the Chinese war. It is written with greater care than any similar work we have seen. Sketches of men engaged in the actions described, are at best but materials of history. Mr. Bernard has had the advantage of professional assistance, and of a non-professional habit of observation. He has been a visitor, without being an actor, at the theatre of war. And he has used these advantages with really excellent effect. He has written a book of undeniable temper, of evidently good authority, and in a good English style.

We cannot say at the same time that it throws new light on any part of our warlike dealings with the false and flowery people. But it clears off a quantity of misrepresentation, and gives an altogether calmer and steadier view of their origin, progress, and results. Apart from this, too, its account of the Nemesis seems to us singularly interesting. This Iron interloper on the Wooden Walls of Old England, is the central figure of Mr. Bernard's history, and plays a most successful part.

The Nemesis was the first iron steamer that ever doubled the Cape. There were great and reasonable doubts of the success of the experiment; but the anticipated difficult navigation of the numerous shallow rivers of the Chinese coast, justified its trial. Mr. Bernard's account of her passage out, from the notes of Commander Hall, is curious and striking. From the not unlooked-for dangers of the stormy southern seas, she seems to have had the narrowest conceivable escape. A tremendous storm, six days after her departure from the Cape, not only carried away a large portion of one of her paddle-wheels, but left, literally, an "immense crack" in the iron of both her sides. In reality, she had begun to separate amid-ships, from one side to the other. The various temporary expedients adopted for safety, the steadiness of her commander, and the calm courage of every one on board, form an admirable picture. But it is clear that without a quiet sea, and the happier accident of a near anchorage, she must have gone down.

Mr. Bernard, after mentioning the repairs she underwent at Delagoa Bay, and by which "she was made a vast deal stronger than she ever was before," adds the very satisfactory assurance that in other iron vessels more recently constructed by the same builder, (Mr. Laird of Birkenhead,) full provision has been made against the recurrence of any similar accident. In the case of the Phlegathon, for example, he takes upon him to assert, that "not only could there be no apprehension of the accident, but an almost impossibility of its recurrence." The reader will judge for himself after reading Mr. Bernard's details; which, both as to the causes of the damage and the improvement it suggested, are ample. It is certainly understood that after three years' hard service, including a bad passage round the Cape, the last-named steamer has been reported to have called for no alteration or strengthening.

The voyage from Delagoa Bay to China includes some notices of the debased native tribes on the African coast. We have spoken of the Prince Wills and King Vooses as the great temptations to the horrible slave-trade, and are strengthened in this view by these incidents of Mr. Bernard's narrative. We pass the early operations on the Chinese coast, in which a distinguished part was borne by the Nemesis, to give the odd picture of her passage up the Macao roads. This is the peculiarly dexterous work in which the great value of the Nemesis was foreseen, and through which, as in broader "devil-ship" duties, her commander and crew seem to have conducted her with consummate skill.

"The channel was so narrow that it was impossible to turn the vessel round, scarcely even by forcing her bows hard aground over the banks. She was anchored head and stern, and guard-boats were placed round her all night, for fear of any attempt at surprise. On the following morning, the 14th, the Nemesis again pursued her course up what appeared to be the principal branch, but which became so shallow that it was doubtful how far she would be able to proceed; she had seldom more than six feet water, and in many places only five, so that she was frequently forced through the mud itself. There was not room to turn her fairly round, and the only mode in which she could be managed was by sometimes driving her bows as far as possible into the river's bank, sometimes her stern; while at other times it was hard to say whether she was proceeding over a flooded paddy-field, or in the channel of a water-course. This gave occasion to the facetious remark, in which sailors sometimes delight, that this 'would be a new way of going overland to England.' After proceeding only three or four miles, a village came in sight, with a fort adjoining, and rather above it. This was afterwards found to be named Kong-How. Nearly opposite the fort the river was again found to be staked across, much more strongly than it was at Houchong; and it was in a similar manner commanded by the guns of the fort. The Nemesis, as soon as she came within good range, opened her fire warmly upon the fort, which the Chinese returned. The boats pushed off as usual; but the moment the marines and a party of seamen began to land, the Chinese abandoned the fort in confusion. * * * * * The principal obstacle now remaining to be got rid of was one more troublesome than all the forts together, or any impediment yet met with. The line of piles which had been driven in across the river was not less than twenty feet wide, or rather it was a double line, filled up between the two with large sunken junks laden with stones. Great labor and perseverance were required to get up sufficient of these piles to clear a passage broad enough for the steamer to pass. This was only accomplished after four hours' hard work, in which, oddly enough, the Chinese peasantry bore an active part, voluntarily coming forward to assist, and even venturing to come on board the steamer itself. This was undoubtedly one of the good results of not having inflicted any injury upon the country people or inhabitants of the villages through which the little expedition had passed."

There can be no doubt that, once at the scene of action, in all the services it was put to, the Nemesis experiment was found to answer every expectation formed. Among these services, her value in carrying columns of troops up the coast to their several points of attack, was conspicuous. And the long, low steamer, with a flotilla of some eighty boats at her stern, each with its glittering freight of soldiers, slowly advancing through the intricate turns of one of these Chinese rivers, was doubtless a sight more marvellous than picturesque to the apathetic celestial crowds on either bank of the stream.

Mr. Bernard was at the new colony of Hong Kong. His view of its political and commercial value is high; but he says little to justify the hope of its being ever effectually cleared of those dangers that have already made it the grave of so many Englishmen.

"The roads of Hong Kong and the Bay of Victoria form an excellent anchorage, having deep water very near the shore, and only one small shoal having sixteen feet water upon it. There are, however, two disadvantages under which it labors: it is exposed to the full fury of the typhoons whenever they occur; and the high mountains of Hong Kong intercept the genial breezes of the south-west monsoon during the hot season, when a movement in the atmosphere is most necessary, not only to moderate the sultry summer heat of a tropical climate, but to dissipate the unhealthy vapors which are generated after the heavy rains which occur, particularly during the night, at that season.

"In other respects, the lake-like appearance of the harbor is beautiful; it forms a sort of basin, lying between the mountains of Hong Kong and the mountains of the mainland opposite. For this reason, however, the rains which fall are sometimes excessively heavy; the dark threatening clouds seem banded across from one side to the other, pouring down their waters in torrents upon the basin between them. The mountain sides of Hong Kong, steep though they are, occasionally appear almost covered with a sheet of moving water, so torrent-like do the streams pour down their declivities. To this succeeds the burning tropical sun of July, with a sort of death-like stillness in the atmosphere, which, little influenced as it is on that side of the island by the south-west monsoon, cannot fail, if it last long without any change, to produce fever and sickness. * * * *

"It is hoped that much may yet be done to remedy the reputed unhealthiness of the island, by proper draining, and by the formation of numerous channels for leading off the torrents of water which, during a portion of the hot season, pour down from the mountain sides, and lodge in hollows and crevices when the flood-gates of heaven are opened upon the devoted little island. Something may also be effected by getting rid, as much as possible, of the rank, unwholesome vegetation which, under the influence of an almost vertical sun, springs up in every crevice where the water lodges."

Of the unexpected assistance given by the Chinese themselves to our prompt formation of the settlement—for within a year we had raised streets, bazaars, warehouses, quays, wharves, jetties, markets, roads, barracks, bridges, churches, and chapels—Mr. Bernard has some curious instances.

"The Chinese inhabitants seemed to fall readily into our ways and habits; their laborers and mechanics worked well and willingly for moderate pay, and came over in crowds from the opposite coast to seek work; tradesmen crowded in to occupy the little shops in the bazaars; two European hotels and billiard-rooms were completed; and, in short, every necessary and most luxuries could be obtained with facility at Hong Kong, within the first year of its permanent settlement. * * * *

"Foreign merchants had also commenced building, and it was a curious sight to see the hundreds of Chinese laborers working upon the construction of our houses and roads, and flocking from all quarters to furnish us with supplies, and seeking their living by serving us in every way, at the very time when we were at war with their government, and carrying on hostile operations against their countrymen to the northward. At the same time, also, Chinese tailors and shoemakers were busy in their little shops making clothes for us, and Chinese stewards superintended our establishments, while Chinese servants (in their native costume, tails and all) were cheerfully waiting upon us at table; and all this within little more than one year after the first land-sale at Hong Kong, and while we were still at war."

But the odd consideration of it all is, that it would seem to be an absence of all heart, sympathy, or cordiality among themselves, much more than any disposition of these qualities towards us, which has hitherto secured us the coöperation and fellowship of the Chinese. Mr. Bernard in other passages of his history appears to have a half-suspicion of this. He has a good remark on their strange quasi-civilization, provoked by the somewhat startling discovery which our English soldiers made one day, of the model of a machine for pounding women to death.

There are some illustrations in Mr. Bernard's work which are of great use to his text. And there is one inimitable page of Chinese caricatures of the English soldiery. We commend them to the attention of Punch. The subjects are—Tartar and English soldiers fighting, and an English foraging party. And the corpulent agility with which our warlike countrymen avoid the Tartars, is only equalled by the deliberate caution of their pursuit of a noble Chinese cock.

---

Researches on Light. By Robert Hunt: Secretary to the Royal Cornwall Polytechnic Society. Longman and Co.

MANY treatises have been published on Photography, but chiefly with a view to practical instruction in the details of the art. The present is the first work we have seen, expressly devoted to a consideration of the scientific facts that have so rapidly accumulated in the new discovery. It is an examination of the various phenomena connected with the chemical and molecular changes produced by the influence of the solar rays, and includes, as a matter of course, a sketch of all the photographic processes, and recent additions to the inventions of Fox Talbot and Daguerre.

Mr. Hunt is a competent inquirer, and has had the sanction and assistance of Sir John Herschel in the conduct of his inquiries. His style is over-ambitious here and there, but it detracts little from the interest or the value of his book. He makes out his case very fairly, of the distinction of the classes of phenomena detected in the solar rays. Light, heat, and photographic power, (for which last Mr. Hunt invents the word energia,) which some have been disposed to consider identical, he keeps carefully as under. And this seems the safer course, whatever the advance of experimental philosophy may ultimately determine, as to all being but the modified influences of one pervading principle.

At what very early and trifling stage of the science of photography itself we may yet be, it would hardly be safe to guess. We observe that the Roman astronomers have procured Daguerrotype impressions of the nebula of the Sword of Orion!—Examiner. Digitized by Google

From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE PARTIE FINE.

BY LANCELOT WAGSTAFF, ESQ.

COLONEL GOLLOP's dinner in Harley-street (the colonel is an East-India director, and his Mulligatawney the best out of Bengal) was just put off, much to my disappointment, for I had no other engagement; Mrs. Wagstaff was out of town with her mother at Bognor; and my clothes had been brought down to the club to dress—all to no purpose.

I was disconsolately looking over the bill of fare, and debating between Irish stew, and the thirteenth cut at a leg of lamb, (of which seven barristers had partaken, each with his half pint of Marsala,) when Jiggins, the waiter, brought me in a card, saying that the gentleman was in the hall, and wished to see me.

The card was Fitzsimons's;—a worthy fellow, as I dare say my reader knows. I went out to speak to him. "Perhaps," thought I, "he is going to ask me to dine."

There was something particularly splendid in Fitz's appearance, as I saw at a glance. He had on a new blue-and-white silk neckcloth, so new that it had never been hemmed; his great gold jack-chain, as I call it, was displayed across his breast, showing off itself and a lace-ruffle a great deal too ostentatiously, as I thought. He had lemon-colored gloves; French polished boots, with deuced high heels; his hair curled (it is red, but oils to a mahogany color;) his hat extremely on one side; and his moustache lacquered up with, I do believe, the very same varnish which he puts to his boots. I hate those varnished boots, except for moderns, and Fitz is three-and-forty if he is a day.

However, there he stood, whipping his lacquered boots with a gold-headed stick, whistling, twirling his moustache, pulling up his shirt-collar, and giving himself confoundedly dandified airs in a word, before the hall-porter and the club messenger-boy in brass buttons.

"Wagstaff, my boy," says he, holding out a kid glove, in a most condescending manner, "I have something to propose to you."

"What is it, and what's your hour?" said I, quite playfully.

"You've guessed it at once," answered he. "A dinner is what I mean—Mrs. Wagstaff is out of town, and—"

Here he whispered me.

Well? why not!—After all there may be some very good fun. If my mother-in-law heard of it she would be sure to make a row. But she is safe at Bognor (may she stay there forever!) It is much better that I should have some agreeable society than dine alone at the club, after the seven barristers on the leg of lamb. Of course it was not to be an expensive dinner—of course not, Fitzsimons said—no more it was to him—hang him—as you shall hear.

It was agreed that the dinner-hour should be seven: the place, Durognon's in the Haymarket; and as I rather pique myself on ordering a French dinner, that matter was to be consigned to me. I walked down to Durognon's, looked at the room, and ordered the dinner for four persons—the man asked how much champagne should be put in ice? which I considered rather a leading question, and giving a vague sort of reply to this, (for I determined that Fitzsimons should treat us to as much as he liked,)

I walked away to while away the hour before dinner.

After all, I thought, I may as well dress: the things are ready at the club, and a man is right to give himself every personal advantage, especially when he is going to dine with—with ladies. There—she secret is out. Fitz has invited me to make a fourth in a petit diner given to Madame Nelval of the French theatre, and her friend Mademoiselle Delval. I had seen Madame Nelval from a side-box a few evenings before—and, parbleu, homo sum; I meant no harm; Gollop's dinner was off; Mrs. Wagstaff was out of town; and I confess I was very glad to have an opportunity of meeting this fascinating actress, and keeping up my French. So I dressed, and at seven o'clock walked back to Durognon's: whither it was agreed that Fitz was to bring the ladies in his Brougham;—the deuce knows how he gets the money to pay for it by the way, or to indulge in a hundred other expenses far beyond any moderate man's means.

As the St. James's clock struck seven, a gentleman—past the period of extreme youth it is true, but exhibiting a remarkably elegant person still in a very becoming costume, might have been seen walking by London House, and turning down Charles-street to the Haymarket. This individual, I need not say, was myself. I had done my white tie to a nicety, and could not help saying, as I gazed for a moment in the great glass in the club drawing-room—"Corbleu, Wagstaff, you are still as distingué a looking fellow as any in London." How women can admire that odious Fitzsimons on account of his dyed mustaches, I for one never could understand.

The dinner-table at Durognon's made a neat and hospitable appearance; the plated candlesticks were not more coppery than such goods usually are at taverns; the works of art on the wall were of tolerable merit; the window-curtains, partially drawn, yet allowed the occupant of the room to have a glimpse of the cab-stand opposite, and I seated myself close to the casement, as they say in the novels, awaiting Captain Fitzsimons's arrival with the two ladies.

I waited for some time—the cabs on the stand disappeared from the rank, plunged rattling into the mighty vortex of London, and were replaced by other cabs. The sun, which had set somewhere behind Piccadilly, was now replaced by the lustrous moon, the gas lamps, and the red and blue orbs that flared in the windows of the chemist opposite. Time passed on, but no Fitzsimons's Brougham made its appearance. I read the evening paper, half an hour was gone and no company come. At last, as the opera carriages actually began to thunder down the street, "a hand was on my shoulder," as the member for Pontefract sings. I turned round suddenly from my reverie—that hand, that yellow-kid-glove-covered hand was Fitzsimons's.

"Come along, my boy," says he, "we will go fetch the ladies—they live in Bury-street, only three minutes walk."

I go to Bury-street! I be seen walking through St. James's-square, giving an arm to any other lady in Europe but my Arabella, my wife, Mrs. Wagstaff! Suppose her uncle, the dean, is going to dine at the bishop's, and should see me!—me, walking with a French lady, in three quarters of a bonnet! I should like to know what an opinion he would have of me, and where his money in the funds would go to?

"No," says I, "my dear Fitzsimons, a joke is a joke, and I am not more straight-laced than another; but the idea that Mr. Lancelot Wagstaff should be seen walking in St. James's-square with a young French actress, is a little too absurd. It would be all over the city to-morrow, and Arabella would tear my eyes out."

"You shan't walk with a French actress," said Fitz. "You shall give your arm to as respectable a woman as any in Baker-street—I pledge you my honor of this—Madame la Baronne de Saint Ménéhould, the widow of a General of the Empire—connected with the first people in France. Do you mean to say that she is not equal to any of your sugar-baking family!" I passed over Fitz's sneer regarding my family; and as it was a baroness, of course agreed to walk with Fitzsimons in search of the ladies.

"I thought you said Madame Delval this morning," said I.

"Oh, the baroness is coming too," answered Fitzsimons, and ordered a fifth cover to be laid. We walked to Bury-street, and presently after a great deal of chattering and clapping of doors and drawers, three ladies made their appearance in the drawing-room, and having gone through the ceremony of an introduction in an entire state of darkness, the order of march was given. I offered my arm to the Baroness de Saint Ménéhould, Fitz leading the way with the other two ladies.

We walked down Jermyn-street; my heart thumped with some uneasiness as we crossed by the gambling-house in Waterloo-place, lest any one should see me. There is a strong gas lamp there, and I looked for the first time at my portly companion. She was fifty-five if a day—five years older than that Fitzsimons. This eased me, but somehow it didn't please me. I can walk with a woman of five-and-fifty any day—there's my mother-in-law, my aunts, and the deuce knows how many more I could mention. But I was consoled by the baroness presently saying, that she should, from my accent, have mistaken me for a Frenchman—a great compliment to a man who has been in Paris but once, and learned the language from a Scotch usher, never mind how many years ago, at Mr. Lord's academy, Tooting, Surrey.

But I adore Paul de Kock's novels, and have studied them so rapturously, that no wonder I should have made a proficiency in the language. Indeed, Arabella has often expressed herself quite jealous as I lay on the sofa of an evening, laughing my waistcoat-strings off, over his delightful pages. (The dear creature is not herself very familiar with the language, and sings Fluve deu Tage, Partong pour Syrie, &c., with the most confirmed Clapham accent.) I say she has often confessed herself to be jealous of the effect produced on my mind by this dear, delightful, wicked, odious, fascinating writer, whose pictures of French society are so admirably ludicrous. It was through Paul de Kock that I longed to know something about Parisian life, and those charming sémillantes, frétillantes, pétillantes grisettes, whose manners he describes. "It's Paul de Kock in London by Jove," said I to myself, when Fitz proposed the little dinner to me; "I shall see all their ways and their fun"—And that was the reason why, as Mrs. Wagstaff was out of town, I accepted the invitation so cordially.

Well; we arrived at Durognon's at a quarter past eight, we five, and were ushered at length into the dining-room, where the ladies flung off their cloaks and bonnets, and I had an opportunity of seeing their faces completely.

Madame Nelval's was as charming a face as I ever looked upon; her hair parted meekly over the forehead, which was rather low; the eyes and eyebrows beautiful; the nose such as Grecian sculptor scarce ever chipped out of Parian stone; the mouth small, and, when innocently smiling, displaying the loveliest pearly teeth, and calling out two charming attendant dimples on each fresh cheek; the ear a perfect little gem of an ear. (I adore ears—unadorned ears without any hideous ornaments dangling from them—pagodas, chandeliers, bunches of grapes, and similar monstrosities, such as ladies will hang from them—entr'autres my own wife, Mrs. W., who has got a pair of earrings her uncle, the dean, gave her, that really are as big as boot-jacks almost.) She was habited in a neat, closely-fitting silk dress of Parisian tartan silk, which showed off to advantage a figure that was perfect, and a waist that was ridiculously small. A more charming, candid, distinguished head it was impossible to see.

Mademoiselle Delval was a modest, clever, pleasing person, neatly attired in a striped something, I don't know the proper phrase; and Madame la Baronne was in a dress which I should decidedly call gingham.

When we sat down to the Potage Printanière, and I helped the baroness naturally first, addressing her respectfully by her title, the other two ladies began to laugh, and that brute, Fitzsimons, roared as if he was insane. "La Baronne de Saint Ménéhould!" cried out little Madame Nelval, "o par exemple! c'est maman, mon cher monsieur!" On which (though I was deucedly nettled, I must confess,) I said, that to be the mother of Madame Nelval, was the proudest title any lady could have, and so sneaked out of my mortification, with this, I flatter myself, not inelegant compliment. The ladies, one and all, declared that I spoke French like a Parisian, and so I ordered in the champagne; and very good Durognon's Sillery is too.

Both the young ladies declared they detested it, but Madame Nelval, the elder, honestly owned that she liked it; and indeed I could not but remark that, in our favor doubtless, the two younger dames forgot their prejudices, and that their glasses were no sooner filled than they were empty.

Ah, how charming it was to see the shuddering, timid, nervous way in which the lovely Nelval, junior, (let me call her at once by her Christian name of Virginie,) turned away her little shrinking head as the waiter opened the bottles, and they went off with their natural exhilarating pop and fiz. At the opening of the first bottle, she flew into a corner; at the opening of the second, she ran to her mother's arms, (hinnuleo similis quærenti pavidam montibus avis matrem, as we used to say at Tooting,) sweet sensibility! charming, timorous grace! but she took the liquor very kindly when it was opened, saying, as she turned up her fine eyes to Heaven, "Il n'y a rien qui m'agace les nerfs comme cela!" Agacer les nerfs! What a delicate expression! The good old lady told her to be calm, and made light of her terror.

But though I had piqued myself on ordering the dinner, the little coquette soon set me down. She asked for the most wonderful things—for instance, she would have a salad of dandelion—the waiter was packed off to Convent Garden to seek for it.

When the fish came, she turned to the waiter and said, "Comment? vous n'avez point de moules?" with the most natural air in the world, and as if muscles were always served at Parisian dinners, which, I suppose, is the case. And then at dessert, what must she remark but the absence of asparagus, which, I must confess, I had not ordered.

"What," she said, turning round to my companion, "are there no asparagus, monsieur!—No asparagus! ah, monsieur! c'est ma vie, mon bonheur que les asperges! J'en suis folle—des asperges. Je les adore—les asperges! Je ne mange que cela—il me les faut, Monsieur Fitzsimons. Vite, garçon! des asperges—des asperges à l'huile, entendez vous!"

We were both very much alarmed by this manifest excitement of Virginie's nerves; and the asparagus was sent for. O woman! you are some of you like the animals of the field in so far as this, that you do not know your power. Those who do can work wonders over us. No man can resist them. We two were as timid, wretched and trembling, until the asparagus came, as any mortal could be. It seemed as if we had committed a crime in not ordering the asparagus that Virginie adored. If she had proposed a pint of melted pearls, I think Fitz was the man to send off to Storr and Mortimer's, and have the materials bought. They (I don't mean the pearls, but the vegetables) came in about half an hour, and she ate them cold, as she said, with oil and vinegar; but the half hour's pause was a very painful one, and we vainly endeavored to fill the odious vacuum with champagne. All the while, Fitzsimons, though he drank and kept nervously helping his neighbors right and left, was quite silent and frightened. I know which will be the better horse (as the phrase is) if he's ever married. I was of course collected, and kept putting in my jokes as usual, but I cannot help saying that I wished myself out of the premises, dreading to think what else Madame Virginie might ask for, and saying inwardly, "What would my poor Arabella say if she knew her scoundrel of a Lancelot was in such company?"

Well—it may have been the champagne, or it may have been the asparagus—though I never, I confess, remarked such a quality in the vegetable—it may, I say, have been the asparagus which created—what do you think?—a reconciliation between Virginie and Héloïse—the Madame Delval before mentioned. This is a delicate matter, but it appeared the ladies had had a difference in the morning about a ribbon, a fichu, or some such matter doubtless, and they had not spoken all dinner time.

But after a bottle of sherry, four of Sillery, (which we all took fairly, no flinching, no heel-taps, glass and glass about,) after coffee and curaçoa, and after the asparagus, a reconciliation took place, Héloïse looked at Virginie, Virginie looked at Héloïse, the latter rose from her chair, tottered towards her friend, and they were in each other's arms in a minute. Old Madame Nelval looked quite pleased at the scene, and said, smiling, to us, "Elle a si bon cœur, ma fille!" Oh those mothers! they are all the same. Not that she was wrong in this instance. The two young ladies embraced with the warmest cordiality, the quarrel about the ribbon was forgotten, the two young hearts were united once more; and though that selfish brute, Fitzsimons, who has no more heart than a bed-post, twiddled his eternal moustache, and yawned over the scene, I confess I was touched by this little outbreak of feeling, and this glimpse into the history of the hearts of the young persons, and drank a glass of curaçoa to old Madame Nelval with a great deal of pleasure.

But oh! fancy our terror, when all of a sudden, Héloïse, weeping on her friend's neck, began to laugh and to cry, and burst out shrieking into a fit of hysterics! When women begin hysterics, a tremor seizes me—I become mad myself—I have had my wife and mother-in-law both in hysterics on the same rug, and I know what it is—the very sound of the whoo-no-no drives me wild. I have heard it imitated in theatres, and have rushed out in a frenzy. "Water! water!" gasped Virginie; (we had somehow not had any all dinner-time.) I tumbled out of the room, upsetting three waiters who were huddled at the door, (and be hanged to them.) "Water!" roared I, rushing down stairs, upsetting boots, and alarmed chamber-maids came panting in with a jug.

"What will they think of us!" thought I, trembling with emotion—"they will think we have murdered the poor young lady, and yet on my honor and conscience I—Oh why did I come—what would Arabella say if she knew?" I thought of the police coming in, of paragraphs in the paper beginning, "Two ruffians of gentlemanly exterior were brought before Mr. Jardine," &c.: it was too horrible—if I had had my hat I would have taken a cab off the stand, and driven down to my wife at Bognor that minute; but I had n't—so I went up to fetch it.

Héloïse was lying on the sofa now, a little calmer; Madame Delval and the chamber-maid were being kind to her: as for that brute, Fitzsimons, he was standing in one of the windows, his legs asunder, his two fists thrust into the tail pockets of his brass buttoned coat, whistling, "Suoni la Tromba!" the picture of heartless, shameless indifference.

As soon as the maid was gone, and I was come in, Madame Virginie must of course begin hysterics too—they always do, these women. She turned towards me with an appealing look—(she had been particularly attentive to me at dinner, much more than to Fitzsimons, whom she bouded the whole time)—she gave me an appealing look—and stuck up too.

I couldn't bear it. I flung myself down on a chair, and beginning to bang my forehead, gasped out, "Oh Heavens! a cab, a cab!"

"We'll have a coach. Go back with them," said Fitz, coming swaggering up.

"Go back with them!" said I; "I'll never see them again as long as I live." No more I would go back with them. The carriage was called; (the hysterics ceased the very moment Fitz flung open the window and the cab-stand opposite could hear,)—the ladies went out. In vain good old Madame Nelval looked as if she expected my arm. In vain Virginie cast her appealing look. I returned it them with the most stony indifference, and falling back upon my chair, thought of my poor Arabella.

The coach drove off. I felt easier as the rattle of the departing wheels died away in the night, and I got up to go. "How glad I am it's over," thought I, on the stair; "if ever I go to a partie fine again may I

"I beg your pardoning, sir," said the waiter, touching my elbow just as I was at the hotel door.

"What is it?" says I, sized by Google

"The bill, sir," says he, with a grin.

"The bill, sir!" I exclaimed; "why it's Captain Fitzsimons's dinner!"

"I beg your parding, sir, you ordered it," answered the man.

"But, good heavens! you know Captain Fitzsimons?"

"We do, sir, precious well too. The capting owes master two underd pound," answered the wretched official, and thrust the document into my hand.

No. 24. To Anatole Durogon.

|   | £. s. d. |
|---|-----------------|
| 5 Dinners, . . . . .                      | 1 15 0          |
| Sherry, . . . . .                         | 0 6 0           |
| Sillery champagne, (4 bottles,) . . . . . | 2 0 0           |
| Asparagus, . . . . .                      | 0 5 0           |
| Collee and liqueurs, . . . . .            | 0 7 6           |
| Wax-lights and apartment, . . . . .       | 0 5 0           |
|   | <hr/> 4 18 0    |

And I must say that the bill, considered as a bill, was moderate, but I had better have dined off that Irish stew at the club.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE GLADNESS OF MAY.

'Tis May again, 'tis May again, the time of happy hours,
When Nature wears her fairest robe of young and dewy flowers,

When gentle morn wakes from the east as rosy as the sky,
And brooks are laughing in the meads, and birds are singing by.

Visions sweet as summer's eve, or autumn's glowing day,
Are rushing on the mind of youth as lovely as they're gay,
Hopes prized more than coral lip, or maiden's blushing vow,
Are coming back to cheer old age, and deck its snowy brow.

Kingcups bathed in golden light, their tender breasts unfold,
And verdant plains burst on the sight, like beds of waving gold,
Violets from the mossy banks in purple clusters rise,
And daisies one by one begin to show their starry eyes.

Leaves nursed in the neontide's warmth, and kissed by the dew,
Are woven into forest crowns that mock the emerald's hue,
And twining garlands round about the wasting walls of yore,
As doth the heart to memory, when life's bright days are o'er.

Blossoms fair as orient pearls adorn the orchard trees,
And odors from their honied lips add fragrance to the breeze,
Beauty's soft and radiant glow is mantling all the grain,
And from the earth a promise comes of fruit and corn again.

Birds rich in plumage, and in voice, from every wood and grove,
In joyous concert carol forth the melody of love,
Zephyrs wild as music's tone upon their pinions bring,
Sweet echoes to the listening ear, and incense of the spring.

Insects bright as Tyrian dyes wake from their torpid sleep,
As countless as the ocean sands that wash the rocky steep,

Lambs in little playful groups are scattered o'er the lea,
And squirrels from the beechen boughs dance on from tree to tree.

Clouds calmly hung in silver light like folds of fleecy snow,
Are shadowed in the silent streams that by the valleys flow,
Now cradled by the swelling waves, now on the shore at play,
Now fitting round the lofty hills as blithesome as a fay.

'Tis May again, 'tis May again, the time of happy hours,
When nature wears her fairest robe of young and dewy flowers,
When gentle morn wakes from the east as rosy as the sky,
And brooks are laughing in the meads, and birds are singing by.

THE OJIBBEWAY INDIANS.—In consequence of the British Swimming Society having promised to award a first class silver medal to the best swimmer of these celebrated Indians, the swimming baths in High Holborn, kept by Mr. Hedgman, were crowded with visitors. Flying Gull and Tobacco were selected as competitors, the rest of the party being seated to witness the trial of skill. At a signal, the Indians jumped into the bath, and, on a pistol being discharged, struck out and swam to the other end, a distance of 130 feet, in less than half a minute. The Flying Gull was the victor by seven feet. They swam back again to the starting-place, where Flying Gull was a second time the victor. Their style of swimming is totally un-European. They lash the water violently with their arms, like the sails of a windmill, and beat downwards with their feet, blowing with force, and forming grotesque antics. They then dived from one end of the bath to the other with the rapidity of an arrow, and almost as straight a tension of limb. They afterwards entered the lists with Mr. Kenworthy, one of the best swimmers in England, and who beat them with the greatest ease.

THE QUINQUENNIAL EXHIBITION AT PARIS.—The merchants and manufacturers of Paris are almost entirely occupied with the grand exhibition to be opened on the 1st of May. The palace erected for this great national display occupies a rectangular area, measuring 646 feet by 318 feet, and comprising, with the two wings, a superficies of about 22,000 square yards. The different divisions are thus allotted:—The great central hall to machinery; the south gallery to the tissues of every description; the north gallery to bronzes, goldsmiths' work, mathematical instruments, furniture, carpets, paper-hangings, and other articles of luxury; the east gallery to glass, porcelain, and pottery; the west gallery to musical instruments and miscellaneous articles. The king, it is expected, will visit the halls and galleries the day preceding the opening.

PAPER MAKING.—The Gloucester Journal says that "a most important patent has been taken out for the manufacture of paper on a new principle, and from an entirely new material. If carried out to the full extent of the wishes and expectations of the patentee, (one of the first engineers in the kingdom,) there is little doubt that it will shortly supersede the use of 'rag,' as the paper made from the new material will be quite equal to the finest Indian paper, and not so costly."

From Hood's Magazine.

THE WORKHOUSE CLOCK.

AN ALLEGORY.—BY THE EDITOR.

THERE'S a murmur in the air,
And noise in every street—
The murmur of many tongues,
The noise of numerous feet—
While round the workhouse door
The laboring classes flock,
For why? The Overseer of the Poor
Is setting the workhouse clock.

Who does not hear the tramp
Of thousands speeding along,
Of either sex and various stamp,
Sickly, crippled, or strong,
Walking, limping, creeping
From court, and alley, and lane,
But all in one direction sweeping,
Like rivers that seek the main?
Who does not see them sally
From mill, and garret, and room,
In lane, and court, and alley,
From homes in poverty's lowest valley
Furnished with shuttle and loom—
Poor slaves of Civilization's galley—
And in the road and footways rally,
As if for the day of doom?
Some, of hardly human form,
Stunted, crooked, and crippled by toil;
Dingy with smoke and dust and oil,
And smirched besides with vicious soil,
Clustering, mustering, all in a swarm.
Father, mother, and careful child,
Looking as if it had never smiled—
The sempstress, lean, and weary, and wan,
With only the ghosts of garments on—
The weaver, her sallow neighbor,
The grim and sooty artisan;
Every soul—child, woman, or man,
Who lives—or dies—by labor.

Stirred by an overwhelming zeal,
And social impulse, a terrible throng!
Leaving shuttle, and needle, and wheel,
Furnace, and grindstone, spindle, and reel,
Thread, and yarn, and iron, and steel—
Yea, rest and the yet untasted meal—
Gushing, rushing, crushing along,
A very torrent of man!
Urged by the sighs of sorrow and wrong,
Grown at last to a hurricane strong,
Stop its course who can!
Stop who can its onward course
And irresistible moral force;
O! vain and idle dream!
For surely as men are all akin,
Whether of fair or sable skin,
According to Nature's scheme,
That human movement contains within
A blood-power stronger than steam.

Onward, onward, with hasty feet,
They swarm—and westward still—
Masses born to drink and eat,
But starving amidst Whitechapel's meat,
And famishing down Cornhill!
Through the poultry—but still unfed—
Christian Charity, hang your head!
Hungry—passing the street of Bread;
Thirsty—the street of Milk;
Ragged—beside the Ludgate Mart,
So gorgeous through mechanic art,
With cotton, and wool, and silk!

At last, before that door
That bears so many a knock

Ere ever it opens to sick or poor,
Like sheep they huddle and flock—
And would that all the good and wise
Could see the million of hollow eyes,
With a gleam derived from hope and the skies,
Upturned to the workhouse clock!

Oh! that the parish powers,
Who regulate labor's hours,
The daily amount of human trial,
Weariness, pain, and self-denial,
Would turn from the artificial dial
That striketh ten or eleven,
And go, for once, by that older one
That stands in the light of nature's sun,
And takes its time from Heaven!

THE DISGUSTED WIFE TO HER HUSBAND.

You promised to leave off your smoking,
The day I consented to wed.
How little I thought you were joking:
How fondly believed what you said!
Then, alas! how completely you sold me,
With blandishments artful and vain;
When you emptied your snuff-box, and told me
You never would fill it again!

Those fumes, so oppressive, from puffing,
Say, what is the solace that flows?
And whence the enjoyment of stuffing
A parcel of dust in your nose?
By the habits you thus are pursuing
There can be no pleasure conferr'd;
How irrational, then, is so doing!
Now is it not very absurd?

Cigars come to three-pence each, nearly,
And sixpence an ounce is your snuff;
Consider how much, then, you yearly
Must waste on that horrible stuff.
Why, the sums in tobacco you spend, love,
The wealth in your snuff-box you sink,
Would procure me of dresses no end, love,
And keep me in gloves; only think!

What's worse, for your person I tremble,
'Tis going as fast as it can;
Oh! how should you like to resemble
A smoky and snuffy old man?
Then resign, at the call of Affection,
The habits I cannot endure;
Or you'll spoil both your nose and complexion,
And ruin your teeth, I am sure.—Psack.

From Hood's Magazine.

TO THE FIRST WARBLER.

Oh! how I love to listen to thy song,
Sweet bird! that, earliest of the choral throng,
Pourest thy notes of gratitude and glee
Ere blooms a flow'ret forth or buds a tree;
Ere yet is hushed the wintry howling wind,
Or twig of green thy little feet can find.
So trustfully thy heart its love-song pours
For hope alone of warmer, sunnier hours,
That I cry shame upon my thankless tears;
Shame on the heart that calls up phantom fears,
Mindless of all, but of its present grief,
Nor finding in Hope's whisperings, relief.
Ah! cease not then thy warbling ecstasy,
Nor startle if thou meet my kindling eye;
For I would have thee ever in my way,
That I might emulate thy cheerful lay!

From Hood's Magazine.

THE POWER OF FRIENDSHIP.

It was nearly four o'clock; and I had not yet prepared myself to give my lecture. The heat was oppressive, the air heavy, the sky tempestuous; and I felt a sensation of restlessness and nervous irritability quite unusual to me. During the last week I had not enjoyed one hour's tranquillity: several persons dangerously ill and requiring my attention had called for me. One in particular (the only support of a large family) gave me great anxiety, and excited in my mind extreme sympathy. In this state I got into the carriage to go to the University. At that moment an unsealed note was put into my hand. I opened it immediately, and found it to announce the death of poor H—, for whom I was so much interested; and this news affected me deeply.

The stroke was the more severe as I had not foreseen the event, and, consequently, had not the consolation of having been able to prepare the family of my patient for so great a misfortune. Hitherto the chair of declamation had always been to me rather a pleasure than a labor; the abstract theories of the science had amused my mind: but this evening I felt a degree of uneasiness on my spirits for which I could not account. The events of the day had so deeply affected me that I felt an almost insurmountable inclination to repose. When I reached the entry of the hall, I cast a look around at the unusually full audience, and as I passed through the crowd I heard the name of a celebrated doctor, spoken of as being amongst my hearers. At another time these were circumstances that would have given me pleasure, but now they increased my confusion, which was indeed complete when I discovered that I had left my notes in the carriage, which I had dismissed at the door, intending to walk home. It was too late to send for them; and I was now in great perplexity. I opened my portfolio, and hastily ran through a number of remarks that I had thrown in there without arranging them; happily, I fell upon some novel observations upon insanity, and I then determined to make that the subject of my off-hand lecture.

I have but a confused idea of what then followed: but I remember the applause which saluted my entrance, and which became still louder when my confusion was observed. As soon as there was silence I summoned all my courage, and began. The first words cost me infinite pains: I hesitated and stopped continually; but by degrees I recovered myself, and the great attention paid to me gave me confidence. I soon found the cloud that overspread my senses clearing off; my ideas became less confused; the words came readily, and comparisons and expressions crowded upon me. I had only to choose them. As I went on my observations became more striking, and my demonstrations more clear and comprehensive. I was astonished at the fluency with which I expressed myself. I found great facility in treating several difficult subjects, which at another time I should hardly have dared attempt. They seemed to me clear and simple, and I got through them as trifles. Still greater became my surprise to find that my memory, which had hitherto been slow and imperfect, was suddenly become miraculously faithful, and brought back the most trifling circumstances of my long career. I cited an author, and with so much exactitude, that one might have imagined that I held the book in my hand; facts and anecdotes came to elucidate my theories and demonstrations; the cases of insanity that I had witnessed in my youth, and which I thought were effaced from my memory, rushed back upon it as if they had recently happened. I became every moment more at ease, the promptness with which one idea followed another exciting every faculty; and words came to give them expression. At that moment a great terror took possession of my mind. It seemed to me that some unknown dangers, which it was not in my power to avoid, hung over me.

The supernatural power that had hitherto supported me began to sink: my thoughts became confused; strange faces and fantastic images flitted before my eyes. The objects of which I had been speaking came to life, and I seemed like a magician who, by a word, rendered visible the living and the dead. I stopped! The most perfect silence reigned in the hall, and every eye was turned towards me. All at once a horrible thought seized me, a convulsive laugh broke from me, and I exclaimed, "I also am mad!" All the assembly rose instantaneously like one body. Every voice raised a cry of surprise and terror; and of what afterwards happened I knew nothing.

When I recovered my senses I was in bed. I looked around—I knew every object in the room. The sun shone upon the window-curtains, which were half closed: I was sensible that it was evening; I saw nobody in the room; and when I endeavored to comprehend who I was, and why there, a faintness came over me; I shut my eyes, and tried to sleep, when some one entering the room awakened me: it was my friend Doctor G—, who approached the bed, and attentively examined me for the space of a few moments. Whilst he thus looked at me I perceived that he changed color, his hand trembled whilst feeling my pulse, and in a low and melancholy whisper he said, "My God, how he is changed!" I then heard a voice at the door say, "May I come in?" The doctor did not answer, and my wife came gently into the room. She looked pale and sorrowful; her eyes were wet, and, as she bent anxiously over me, burning tears fell upon my face. She took my hands in both hers, bent her lips close to my ear, and said, "William, do you know me?" A long silence followed this question. I tried to answer, but was incapable of pronouncing one word. I wished to show by some sign that I was sensible of her presence. I fixed my eyes upon her; but I heard her say, amidst deep sobs and tears, "Alas! he does not know me!" And thus I perceived that my efforts had been in vain. The doctor now took my wife by the hand to lead her from the room. "Not yet, not yet," she said, withdrawing her hand, and I relapsed into delirium. When again I became sensible, I felt as if I had awakened from a long and deep sleep. I still suffered, but less severely; extreme weakness had succeeded to fever; my eyes were painful, and a mist was over them: at first I was not sensible that any one was in the room, but gradually objects became more distinct, and I saw the doctor seated by my bed. He said, "Are you better, William?" Hitherto my ineffectual attempts to make myself understood had not given me pain; but now the impossibility of doing so was a martyrdom. I soon became aware that my strength of mind was leaving me, and that death approached. The efforts that I made to rouse myself from this sort of death-like slumber must have been very violent, for a cold sweat came all over me: I heard a rushing as if my ears were full of water, and my limbs were convulsed. I seized the doctor's hand, which I pressed with all my strength. I rose in my bed and looked wildly at him. This did not last long; I soon fell again into weakness: I dropped the hand which I had grasped, my eyes closed, and I fell back on my bed. All that I remember at that moment were the words of poor Doctor G——, who, thinking me dead, exclaimed, "At last his sufferings are over!"

Many hours passed before I recovered my senses. The first sensation of which I became sensible was the coldness of the air, which felt like ice upon my face; it seemed as if an enormous weight was on it; my arms were stretched against my body, and though I was lying in a most inconvenient position, yet it was impossible to change it; I tried to speak, but had not the power. Some time afterwards I heard the steps of many people walking in the room, something heavy was set down, and a hoarse voice pronounced these words: "William H——, aged thirty-eight: I thought him older!" These words recalled to my mind all the circumstances of my illness; I understood that I had ceased to live, and that preparations were making for my interment. Was I then dead? The body was indeed cold and inanimate; but thought was not extinct. How could it be that all traces of life had disappeared exteriorly, and that sentiment still existed in the chilly frame that was now going to be conveyed to the grave? What a horrible idea! My God! is this a dream? No; all was real: I recalled to my mind the last words of the doctor: he knew too well the signs of death to allow himself to be deceived by false appearances. No hope! None! I felt myself being placed in the coffin. What language can describe all the horror of that moment!

I knew not how long I remained in this situation. The silence that reigned in the room was again broken, and I was sensible that many of my friends came to look at me for the last time.

My mind was awake to all the horrors of my situation: in a moment my heart became sensible of acute suffering. But what! thought I to myself; is everything within me dead? Is the soul, as well as the body, inanimate? My thought nevertheless was a proof to the contrary. What is then become of my will to speak, to see, to live? Everything within me sleeps, and is as inactive as if I never had existed! Are the nerves disobedient to the commands of the brain? Why do those swift messengers refuse to obey the soul? I recalled to mind the almost miraculous instances of the power of the mind directed to one purpose and urged by a strong impulse. I knew the history of the Indian who, after the death of his wife, had offered his breast to her infant, and had nourished it with milk. Was not this miracle the effect of a strong will? I myself had seen life and motion restored to a palsied limb by a mighty effort of the mind, which had awakened the dormant nerves. I knew a man whose heart beat slowly or quick as he pleased. Yes, thought I, in a transport of joy, the will to live remains. It is only when this faculty has yielded that Death can become master of us. I felt a hope of reviving, as I may express it, by the vigor of my will; but alas! I cannot even now think of it without fear!

The moments were speeding fast away, and by the noises around me I comprehended that preparations were making to close my coffin. What is to be done? If the will has really the power attributed to it, how shall I direct it? During all my illness I often strongly desired to speak and move, but could not do so. I now made another effort. As the wrestler puts forth the utmost strength of every muscle to raise up his antagonist, so I employed all that my will could command, and endeavored to impart to my nerves the impulse of that energetic volition, my last hope! It was in vain. In vain did I try to raise one breath within my breast—to utter one sigh. And, oh! what increase of horror! I heard the nails applied to my coffin! Despair was in the sound!

At that very instant E——, my oldest, my dearest friend, came into my room. He had performed a long journey to see me once more, to bid an eternal farewell to the companion of his childhood. They made way for him. He rushed forward and laid his hand, his faithful, fond hand on my bosom. Oh, the warmth of that friend's hand! It touched the inmost fibres of my heart, and it sprang to meet him. That emotion acted upon my whole system; the blood was agitated; it began to flow; my nerves trembled, and a convulsive sigh burst from my disenchained lungs; every fibre moved with a sudden bound, like the cordage of a vessel struggling against a mighty sea. I breathed again! But so sudden and so unexpected was the change in my frame, that an idea came to my mind that it could not be real—that I was again deprived of reason. Happily this doubt soon ceased. A cry of terror, and these words, "He lives!" uttered distinctly enough for me to hear, put all beyond doubt. The noise and bustle became general, and some voice exclaimed, "E—— has fainted: raise him up, carry him hence that he may not when he opens his eyes first behold his friend." Orders, exclamations, cries of joy and surprise, increased every instant: all that I now recall is, that I was lifted out of my coffin, and, before a good fire, was completely brought to life, and found myself surrounded by friends. After some weeks I was restored to health; I had seen death as near as possible, and my lips had touched the bitter portion which one day I must yet drink to the last drop.

WAKLEY'S LAST.

[Mr. Wakley, speaking in the House of Commons of Wordsworth's poetry—said he could write as good by the mile. Punch attributes this to him.]

The verdant sunbeam gaily sweeps
O'er Peckham's mosques and minarets;
The moss-grey sapling fondly weeps
Over the daisied lake, whose jets
Perfume the hours and deck the air,
And make fair Nature still more fair.

Uprising, see the fitful lark
Unfold his pinion to the stream,
The pensive watch-dog's mellow bark
O'ershades yon cottage like a dream,—
The playful duck and warbling bee
Hop gaily on from tree to tree.

How calmly could my spirit rest
Beneath yon primrose-bell, so blue,
And watch those airy oxen, drest
In every tint of purling hue,
As on they hurl the gladsome plough,
While fairy Zephyrs deck each bough!

BROUGHAM VINDICATED.

CERTAINLY there is honor among thieves. Lord Brougham has been accused of bringing in the Bill creating a permanent President of the Court of Privy Council to make an office for himself.

Lord Lyndhurst has heard him awkwardly endeavor to disprove the charge.

Lord Lyndhurst gave the bill a very equivocal and cold support, and acted his part as if he should not be sorry for its defeat.

The common remark was, It is evident that the Chancellor does not like Brougham's job. He cannot openly oppose it, but he would be well pleased to get rid of it.

All this Lord Brougham bore as the Spartan boy bore the gnawing of the stolen fox at his breast.

He never named him, never. He never was tempted or provoked to let the truth escape him that it was not for himself, but for Lord Lyndhurst that he was doing the job.

And here a question arises whether this forbearance is ascribable to the honor proverbially assigned to certain characters exclusively in dealings with each other, or whether it is attributable simply and solely to this circumstance, that the thing suppressed was a truth, and therefore that the Lord Brougham did not know how to tell it.

It is very easy to say to children, tell the truth and shame the devil; but it is much more difficult to shame Lord Lyndhurst than the devil, and telling the truth is not so feasible a thing to a grown gentleman whose education has in that respect been neglected. Children are taught to tell the truth; and to call on Major Longbow to tell the truth without any practice in that way, is much the same thing as inviting him to play a solo on the violin without having learnt a note.

When Magog the Beadle, lying dead drunk on the stage, is begged to get up, he answers, "It is all very easy to say get up, but how do you do it?"

And so with telling the truth, it is all very easy to say tell the truth, but how do you do it if you have never learnt?

If you want to hide a truth, you will bury it most safely in the breast of a Munchausen.

There are men who will betray everything in the world but the truth.

A man full of truth runs over, when a truth is put in his mind, just as a full pitcher overflows when more water is added: but a man void of truth has a capacity for holding fast any drop of it that by chance may find its way into his breast.

The common expression, that a man has "no truth in him," is very incorrect. The man may have truth in him, but it never comes out of him. It is one of the good things that cannot escape from him.

We have not a doubt that if an instrument like the stomach pump could be applied to Lord Brougham's mind, the truth would be pumped out of it that the Privy Council job is fitted for Lord Lyndhurst, who wants retirement, and who wants with it a larger income than the law allows him in the retiring pension, and a place for it such as the footman desired, "with little or nothing to do."

The face that Lord Lyndhurst has put on this job is the same face that he has worn through life—the visage that Mephistopheles showed to his Brougham, Faust.

Who in the world would have suspected that the job was not Lord Brougham's job, but Lord Lyndhurst's job, done by his convenient friend, at his convenient friend's own public cost?

The one was to take all the disgrace, and the other all the profit. Lord Brougham was to eat all the dirt, Lord Lyndhurst pouch the pelf. The Chancellor was the monkey turning the chesnut in the embers with the cat's paw, and all the world charging poor disinterested puss with the robbery!

What is there in ancient devotion to compare with this. Damon and Pythias sink into insignificance. Castor and Pollux wore their soul turn and turn about; went halves in a life interest; but Brougham and Lyndhurst transcend this immeasurably, for the one is such a glutton for shame that he takes his partner's share of it, and gives him all the profits.

A famous gourmand laid it down as a maxim, that a man should never carve. If you carve, he said, you are obliged to help your neighbor to the best bits; whereas if you throw the business on him, he must give you the delicacies.

Lord Lyndhurst has very discreetly handed the carving knife to Lord Brougham, who, in jobbing, always fulfils the christian duty of doing as he would be done by.—Examiner.

PENNY POSTAGE.

SIR ROBERT PEEL has, very much to his credit, contributed 10*l*. to the subscription for Mr. Rowland Hill.

The public have a debt to pay to this ungratefully requited gentleman. There is not a member of society, from the highest to the lowest, who has not to thank Mr. Hill for what he has saved or gained by the penny postage. The difficulty is to follow out the advantages in their various ramifications. Mr. Cowell, in his able tract on the Currency, points out one of the un contemplated effects of the penny postage, and makes a just reflection on it:—

"Previous to 1840 it cost several shillings to send a few five-pound notes to London from the country. Since the reduction of postage you can send four or five for a penny. In consequence of this bankers in the country are now in the daily habit of sending to London the notes of competing bankers, in cases where they previously retained them a week or ten days for interchange, at certain periods, in London.

"I paid attentive consideration at the time to the effects, on the circulation of the alteration, in the postage, constantly watching them, and became convinced that Mr. Hill's plan enabled the country to dispense with considerably more than 1,000,000*l*. circulation, and to export either that amount of gold, or some proportion of it, obtaining in exchange commodities that we should not otherwise have had. Mr. Hill did not probably anticipate such a splendid consequence from his admirable plan. It is a proof of the importance of sound principles in such matters; they produce good effects that are not expected, as well as the advantages at which they directly aim."—Examiner.

THE KING OF THE FRENCH.—We understand that there no longer exist any doubts respecting the visit of the King of the French to this country. The precise period of his Majesty's arrival has not yet been definitively decided, but there is, we believe, every reason to suppose that he will land at Portsmouth.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

DECEASED PEOPLE WHOM WE MEET DAILY.

BY LAMAN BLANCHARD, ESQ.

AN Irish gentleman of our acquaintance, when his new suit of mourning came home, began to moralize on the uncertainty of life. "Mortality," said he, "is more fleeting than the fashion of a coat. Who can say that his spirit may not cast off its garment of flesh, even before the gloss has departed from his new waistcoat? Alas! I ordered this mourning for my friend, and may yet be destined to wear it for myself!"

We often laugh in the wrong place, and create the bulls we fancy we discover. It was easy to see, by the aid of a minute's reflection, that this was no blunder at all, except in sound. On the surface it is merely a ludicrous absurdity; beneath that, lies a world of grave meaning, and lessons of the profoundest and most melancholy truth. The provocation to laugh is checked by a philosophic sigh.

It is not, to be sure, the custom in civilized countries for men to go into mourning for their own loss; they only put on the suit of sorrow and solemnity when royalty, consanguinity, or friendship that leaves a legacy, expires; but if it were the fashion for honest people in this world, to do by themselves as they do by others, what thousands who are now flashing in coats of many-colors would suddenly appear before us clad in deep mourning! How would the delicacy of peach-blossom and the flush of crimson subside into dreary sable, satins and velvets change to sad crape, and the harlequinade of life become as a funeral procession. A nigrification almost universal would ensue, like swarms of fire-flies darkening into black-beetles.

Admit but the principle of adopting the same ceremonies in our own case which we observe towards our next of kin, and where is the conscientious man who might not be called upon to put on black as a slight tribute of respect to his departed self! Yea, hundreds who now dazzle the eye of the wandering multitude by the gaudiness of their equipages, would be compelled to change their green and crimson liveries for a crow-color; and we should see the footman, shorn of his finery, swinging behind the carriage in deep mourning for his deceased master grinning inside.

Not a day passes (who will deny this?) that any man of common experience may not converse with a dozen defunct people. In a great city like London it is impossible to stir out on a fine day when the town is full, without seeing numbers of departed persons of one's acquaintance sauntering up and down in the sunshine;—without stopping here and there at the corners of streets to chat with the lamented dead, or nodding carelessly to them on the other side of the way. The people who have gone to their long homes years ago are very much abroad in this gay metropolis. We dined the other day in a party of fourteen merry-makers, well acquainted with each other; but to our certain knowledge nine of them were no more, and had been so for various periods of time, dating from the different circumstances of their career.

It is very easy to object that all these deceased persons appear to be as much as ever in existence; and, indeed, furnish evidence of their being actually alive by dining, walking, laughing, cheating, and the like. In all these respects, and forty others, they are living to the full as much as though they had never departed this life at all. Nevertheless they are all dead, and will so continue, until vitality is discovered in door-nails.

The phrase which has long been current wherever the English language is spoken, "dead and buried," was not circulated without a necessity for it. "Poor Bob is dead and buried," is an assertion wonderfully differing from "Poor Bob is dead." There is a warranty conveyed in the additional words which is much wanting in numbers of instances, and without it the fact may be moonshine. The burial is a clench. The popular existence of the phrase is a proof that the demise is not usually held to be a settled thing until it is associated with interment.

This very day were we discussing the three per cents with a city man, when on a sudden, memory turned back into old days, to trace the form and lineaments of an early chum. He was once the merriest little winged bird-like soul that ever sang songs half way between earth and heaven. Such assuredly was Little Piper. It was necessary to get up into the sky before you could catch him, but when caught he was your own. So was all he had. He never knew the meaning of the word grasping, except when he had hold of a friend's hand, or jumped into a river (as he once did) to drag out a drowning lad three times his own weight and size.

When he became a man, he was the boy as before. He called nothing his own but his faults, and never forgot anybody but himself, a person whom Little Piper rarely bestowed a thought upon. As he had emptied his pockets at school in making presents, and giving sixpences (in spite of lectures against such immoral practices) to begging mothers with hungry children crying and clinging about them; so now on a larger scale he pursued the same plan, and was seldom without a happy face, save when he witnessed misery he could not relieve. Lucky was it for him that he could not give away the eyes out of his head; for as loan or gift they would certainly have gone to some blind wanderer, and he would have contented himself with a pair of spectacles.

And was it Little Piper with whom we this morning discoursed concerning the three per cents! Let no discreet heart think it. This was Thomas Piper, Esq., of Upper-breeches-pocket-buildings, city. The Piper beloved of us, remembered, venerated, mourned—though not per coat and hat-band—died in 1830 on the stock-exchange. He went there innocently enough one morning, and was never seen alive afterwards. And here is another Piper calling himself the same!

As well pretend that the rising rocket and the descending stick are the same; or that the Dick Withers of last year is the Dick Withers of this year.

Last year's Dick was the most social, generous, and enjoying of bachelors; surrounded by troops of gay friends, and as delighted to give them welcome as they were to seek it. He looked care in the face and laughed. When a pack of scowling, prowling, rascally thoughts wandered into his mind and would have settled there, he packed them all off, like an ill-conditioned troop of gipsy plunderers from his pleasant fields and hedges. Nothing that was not honest and good-tempered had its abode with him. He was the first to enter into a frolic, and the last to get tired of it. He found out the right end of life—he lived and was jolly. A joke in those days never came amiss to him; but a few months ago he tried his hand at a practical one, and married. Alas! he died on his wedding day.

There is, however, a Dick Withers lurking somewhere or other in the holes and corners of domesticity, with a soul too narrow to be tenanted by more than a single sentiment—with a sterile heart that has but food for one passion at a time. He could only persuade himself that he was in love, by utterly abjuring friendship. He at once substituted uxoriousness for universal philanthropy, and cared in fact for the one human being merely because she had become part of himself.

All his friends he dropped quietly; as well the sharers of his secret thoughts, as the partners in his social enjoyments. All his doors he securely bolted; and hospitality peeped through the key-hole to see who was coming, and to cry "not at home" to the visitor. No spree, no cigar, no whist; he forgot or abandoned all his old ideas of dances, concerts, and theatres; he changed his side in politics, or had no politics at all; and turning love's temple into a mausoleum, deliberately buried himself alive.

Sheer insanity might attempt to discover some lurking resemblance between the two Dicks, and believe them to be one; but reason rejects the proposition with scorn. True, the first Dick Withers did take a wife—he was always so full of his fun;) he just lived to wear his wedding-suit; but his name should have appeared on the same day, and in the same paper, among the Deaths and the Marriages.

That all the signs and evidences of life capable of meeting together in one human specimen of vitality, afford no proof that death has not been there before them, is perfectly well known to every one who happens to be acquainted with our friend Rattleby. That his eyes are the fiercest in their frolicsome and extravagant glee of any in company, and his laugh always the loudest, however noisy and numerous the party, is an everywhere admitted fact; but is all that wonderful and overwhelming display of life any evidence that Rattleby is still living! Are those boisterous spirits, that constant and rapid flow of humor, by which he makes all around him "certain they shall die of laughter," ten times in the hour, a testimony that Rattleby himself is not yet dead! Is the elasticity of the lungs an argument against the dead-weight of the heart, and are spasms health! If the real Rattleby be not deceased, death is a poetic fable. He still may go on to shout, caper, and toss off bumpers; but live as fast as he may he can never be alive again. As Dick Withers must be said to have finally quitted this life when he entered the state of matrimony, so may another man be as fatally cut off by being left out of a wedding. This was the lot of the royster now in view. Poor Rattleby, who appears to have such quantities of existence to spare, died—beyond mistake, poor fellow!—on the day Kate Fisher was married.

His fate, varied by circumstances, is the fate of thousands surrounding him. When we say that they are not themselves, their story is but half told; they are not so much as the semblance of themselves. It is impossible to regard them even as their own ghosts, so opposite in character, habit, and disposition, was the original now in the tomb to the living substance bearing the name of the deceased.

Hear this lecturer upon humanity, whose charity and tenderness of heart is an affair of precept only, a subject to descant upon for personal objects. He died soon after he had taken his seat in parliament, where he is still to be seen "as large as life."

Look at this hoary gambler; you cannot call his spasmodic mode of living an existence; the truth is, that he was brought down from an honorable station years ago, by the misconduct of a beloved son, and perished in his prime.

Here is a mother, childless now, but not seeming in outward show otherwise than living. She makes rational replies whenever she is addressed, smiles calmly when kindness shown to her appears to ask a smile, and bends her brow over a book of which she is not reading a single word. Hers is not a life. She died when the last of her children, a fair daughter in her sweet and early youth, was laid within the family grave.

Go to the next public assembly, no matter for what object it may be called together; or, what will serve the purpose as well, look from your window upon the passers-by. The unfortunate deceased are as two to one, and if they were to take it into their heads (skulls rather) to revolt, might at one fell swoop drive the living minority into their graves.

Here comes an author, with an intense consciousness of his own existence—assured, with an emphasis beyond the force of myriads of affidavits, not only that he is living now, but that posterity, until time itself shall be no more, will be a witness of his glorious longevity. The delusion, if ludicrous, is sad too; the immortal has been dead ever since the night on which his tragedy was damned.

Yet the prima donna who sweeps past him, shooting onward like a star, and seeming to breathe empyreal air, is surely living in every atom of the bright dust whereof she is formed. So indeed it would appear, for to the eye she is life all over, the personification of whatever can be comprehended in the idea of existence. But what a bad judge of visible facts the eye is, and how necessary is it sometimes to see with the heart. Viewed through that medium, sympathy proclaims her to have been some time deceased. When her darling sister, cleverer, younger, and handsomer than herself came out with such brilliant success at the other house, the vital spark fled. All talk of life, after that, had about as much meaning in it as the song she excels in. She still gives, it must be admitted, the most startling tokens of an active and indestructible animation; but these are only the mock-heroic contortions of the eel, after it has been neatly skinned, and cut carefully into inches.

There is another popular phrase which clearly implies that death is not at all incompatible with a protracted stay within the precincts of existence. Poor So-and-so, say the commentators on mortality "is dead and gone," intimating that to die is not necessarily to go, and that the defunct are not always the departed—"dead and gone" describes the double event, whenever that takes place—the exception and not the rule. The currency of the phrase strengthens our argument that dying and going are not synonymous terms, and that we may long continue to have crowds of the deceased for our intimate acquaintances.

It is interesting to remark how varied are the periods of demise among the classes referred to, and how opposite are the causes which have rendered the obituary of the living so extensive. One who professes to be sixty-five, and vows that he has lived all those years, died at the age of forty, in consequence of his success in a duel with a near relative. Another, who conceives himself to have attained to middle age was in reality cut off in the very flower of his youth, by a shilling delicately introduced in his father's will. A third, a maiden, antiquated and thinner than all her tribe, by virtue of taking nothing but tea and cribbage, breathed her last—in spite of her hushed sigh, or her small sarcasm, that may seem to say she still survives—a long time ago, on the day when the gallant adventurer, who had twice danced with her after she was six-and-twenty, sailed for India without making the fondly expected offer.

For a pair of positive existences, as far as first appearances go, we need look no further than to this old sweeper at the crossing, and the occupant of the carriage rolling over it. Whosoever should conceive them to be actually living would decide wholly in the dark, and pronounce upon a case without a fact to judge it by. Sudden death overtook the unhappy cross-sweeper at the age of thirty, when he lost every sixpence of his large fortune; and the loller in the carriage expired in as sudden a manner at a later age, when he came quite unexpectedly into a fine estate. One lost a tin-mine, and the other found a canal; both perished prematurely.

Prosperity and adversity, satiated appetite, defeated ambition, brilliant success, wounded honor, blighted affection, filial ingratitude—the hundred incidents, dark or bright, which make up in their confused and yet consistent combination, the history of every human life—each of these, occurring at a critical moment, may bring the real finis long before the story appears to have arrived at its conclusion. The cold, formal, appointed ending, is simply an affair for the apothecary and the gravedigger.

The sentiment which first suggested the wearing of mourning was beautiful and holy; but custom stripes it of this sanctity; its poetry has become a common-place; and in the adoption of the ceremony the heart silently heaving with sorrow and honor for the dead, has no concern. Still, if the fashion is to be continued, it may at least be turned to a higher use, and be made to serve sincerer ends. The suit of mourning is in few cases put on soon enough! If we would invest the custom with grace and dignity, elevating it with moral sentiment, we should sometimes wear the black dress while the mourned is yet amongst us. Letters to old friends must then be written, often perhaps on black-bordered paper, indicating our regret for their loss; and the crape upon the hat we touch to a former companion, as we pass him by, might be worn, poor moral skeleton! for himself.

It is painful, after an absence of a few years, to return to a family circle in which we had stored up a thousand friendly and affectionate memories—where we expected to find the bright deep well-springs of sympathy, bright, deep, and clear as of old—and see nothing there but dry sand; Time's glass pouring out its contents over and over again, only to increase the heap and make a desert of the garden, every hour adding a little handful to the disappointing, the desolate, the hideous waste.

What a mockery of the heart, as we stand in the midst and look mournfully around, to attempt to persuade ourselves that we are amongst the living—merely because they all regularly breathe and wear no shroud! Count the faces there; in number, but in number only, they are the same; look into them for the old recognition, and the death's head is grinning. We feel that we have just shaken hands with the late Mr. Jones, who has forgotten to get himself buried. The act of friendship—in this case the ceremonial—has sent a chill to the soul. The momentary contact with that cold nature was freezing; at the bare touch of his hand, we feel horrid rheumatism running up the right arm.

It is the same as we proceed round the circle. The friends and companions of our youth are no more. The eldest son perished of a scarlet coat on obtaining a cornetcy, and the eldest daughter died a sadder death when she joined the saints. The remainder became defunct in succession, each in his own favorite way. When we take our leave, it is bidding adieu to the dead. The ordinary courtesies there would be anomalous and absurd to the last degree; for they must come in the form of inquiries concerning the departed—"How is your late lamented father!" or, "I hope your deceased sisters will go to the opera on Tuesday."

PORTUGAL.

THE disturbed condition of this unlucky land continues; and yet the actual disturbance seems to sleep. Every man in Portugal is persuaded that some catastrophe is at hand, and feels the ground shaking under his feet; but the symptoms of the convulsion, like those of the earthquake, have reached but little further than to excite alarm. The most singular part of the whole is, that, though the revolt which threatened a few weeks ago to overrun the nation has sunk into absurdity, still it exists; a nucleus of rebellion is suffered to live, and a general and noble in the Portuguese service is permitted to hold from week to week a royal fortress unassailed. It is now said that siege artillery have been sent to attack Almeida. This operation alone has taken up more than a month; while the fortress, which is said to be naked of guns and of all defence, ought to have been taken by a run of a regiment of grenadiers within the first twenty-four hours. However, if the rebellion shall die away of itself it is so much the better. The bayonet is a rough expedient, and the poor soldiers who have joined the revolt have probably no more conception of the right or wrong of the case than if they were so many chessmen.—Britannia.

HUNGARY.

PRINCE MAURICE, who is in Hungary, had been hunting in the vicinity of his residence. A neighboring nobleman happened to meet one of the Prince's huntsmen on his ground, and immediately shot him. The Prince, being informed of the circumstance, hastened, accompanied by a servant, to the nobleman, and remonstrated with him. "A Hungarian nobleman," he replied, "is master of life and death, on his own estate, and you shall immediately have another proof of it." Saying this, the Hungarian shot the Prince's innocent servant. The Prince, excited by this barbarous act, drew out a loaded pistol and shot the nobleman, who died on the spot. The German Prince is still confined in a Hungarian fortress.—Chronicle.

CHURCH CONVOCATION.—An attempt is shortly to be made in the House of Commons to gain the sanction of that assembly to the practical renewal of the Convocation of the Clergy of the Church of England, with a view to the obtaining of its advice and assistance in legislating upon ecclesiastical matters.

From the Edinburgh Review.

1. Memoirs of Admiral the Right Honorable the Earl of St. Vincent. By JEDEDIAH STEPHENS TUCKER, Esq. Two volumes, 8vo. London: 1844.
2. The Life and Correspondence, Naval and Military, of John Earl of St. Vincent. By EDWARD PELHAM BRENTON, Captain in Her Majesty's Navy. Two volumes, 8vo. London: 1838.

THE name of St. Vincent will justly be enrolled in the first rank of the many eminent characters, that have spread a lustre over the annals of the British Empire during the course of the last three hundred years. As a great Naval Commander, viewed under all the aspects of his professional career, even from his first entrance into the service until he arrived at the highest step, there is something remarkable in his whole conduct peculiarly his own. It was this conduct that made him Commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean, and twice Commander-in-chief of the Channel fleet; being ordered, on the second occasion, to carry the Union flag at the main, having previously held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, and been advanced to the prominent situation of Admiral of the Fleet; and by this conduct was the successful battle fought with the enemy's fleet, nearly double the force of his own, for which he received from his sovereign the high dignity of an Earldom of the United Kingdom; and, towards the close of his distinguished career, was honored by George IV. with a Field-marshal's baton, in testimony of his eminent services.

Under the guidance, and by the example, of such a man, were the most distinguished officers of the time educated and promoted—Collingwood, Saumarez, Troubridge, Hallowell, and Nelson, with many others. "He was the master and instructor," says Dr. Parr, "of Nelson, whom he formed and made a greater man than himself, and then did not envy him." The Doctor was not far wrong. Lord St. Vincent knew not what envy was: when he found himself so unwell as to be obliged to give up the Mediterranean command, Lord Nelson, on his own behalf and that of his gallant comrades above mentioned, thus writes to him:—"For the sake of the country, do not quit us at this moment. * * * We look up to you, as we have always found you, as to our father, under whose fostering care we have been led to fame." And, two days after, he again writes—"We all love you. Come, then, to your sincere friends; let us get you well; it will be such a happiness to us all—amongst the foremost, to your attached, faithful, and affectionate NELSON."

When we find a boy of thirteen, self-taught, self-dependent, and self-denying, tearing himself away from his family with a scanty pittance, unequal even to the provision of common necessities, and of so marked a character and mind as to have advanced himself to the highest professional ranks and honors; the narrative of the progressive steps of such a life cannot fail to afford a useful, entertaining, and highly instructive example, more particularly to every young midshipman who embarks in the naval service of his country. We shall therefore endeavor, as far as our space will admit, to trace the progress of this illustrious seaman through the whole period of his service.

The two authors named at the head of this article have drawn a portion of their materials from the same source—the old Earl's letter-books; and pretty well have they ransacked their contents—having, between them, extracted and printed not fewer than a thousand letters written by him and his correspondents; of which about six hundred are stuffed into Mr. Tucker's volumes, (three hundred would have been ample for every purpose,) and the other four hundred are huddled pell-mell into Mr. Brenton's, without the least order, and many of them having no relation to the life of Lord St. Vincent.

Mr. Tucker's father was Lord St. Vincent's private and confidential Secretary, afterwards a Commissioner of the Navy, and lastly the second Secretary of the Admiralty, under the naval administrations of Lord Howick (Earl Grey) and Mr. Thomas Grenville. This author had the additional advantage of whatever authentic materials, and we believe they were not few nor unimportant, were left to him by his father, with others from the Earl's family.

Nor was Captain Brenton without pretensions to become the biographer of Lord St. Vincent. His brother, Sir Jaleel Brenton, had served with his lordship, and by his excellent and gallant conduct had gained his friendship; and when the noble Earl, after the death of his lady, made an excursion on the Continent, he took with him, as his companions, the captain and his sister, Miss Brenton, the latter of whom continued to manage his household affairs.

Our notices will be chiefly drawn from the "Memoirs" of the civilian; out of which we shall gather such materials as will best convey a true portrait of the character, conduct, and feelings of this great man. To depict him in his early youth we must, however, have recourse to Captain Brenton's work, where we have a curious piece of autobiography, dictated by the noble lord himself to the captain. One day, this author tells us, he took the opportunity of reminding the old Earl of his promise to relate to him part of his early history. "His lordship, with his characteristic kindness and frankness, immediately replied—'Come, then, take your pen and sit down, and I will talk while you write.' He then dictated to me what follows:—

"I was born at Meaford, in Staffordshire, on the 9th January 1734, old style. My father was counsellor and solicitor to the Admiralty, and treasurer" (Mr. Tucker says auditor) "of Greenwich Hospital. At a very early age I was sent to a grammar-school at Burton-upon-Trent, where I remained long enough to be considered a very capital Latin and Greek scholar for my years; and I was often selected by the master to show what proficiency his boys had attained. At the same time, I frankly own to you that I know very little about the matter now. At the age of twelve years I was removed to a school at Greenwich, kept by a Mr. Swinton, and where I was to have remained until fitted for college, being destined for the law. This favorite plan of my father's was, however, frustrated by his own coachman, whose name I have now forgotten. I only remember that I gained his confidence, always sitting by his side on the coach-box when we drove out. He often asked what profession I intended to choose. I told him I was to be a lawyer. 'Oh, don't be a lawyer, Master Jackey,' said the old man; 'all lawyers are rogues!'

"About this time Strachan (father of the late Admiral Sir Richard Strachan) came to the same school, and we became great friends. He told me such stories of the happiness of a sea life, into which he had lately been initiated, that he easily persuaded me to quit the school and go with him. We set out accordingly, and concealed ourselves on board of a ship at Woolwich. My father was at that time absent on the Northern Circuit. My mother and sisters were in a state of distraction at learning our absence from school, fearing that some disaster had happened to us. But after keeping them three days in the utmost anxiety, and suffering ourselves much privation and misery, we thought it best to return home. I went in at night, and made myself known to my sisters, who remonstrated with me rather warmly on the impropriety of my conduct, and assured me that Mr. Swinton would chastise me severely for it; to which I replied that he certainly would not, for that I did not intend to go to school any more, and that I was resolved to be a sailor.

"The next day my mother spoke to me on the subject; and I still repeated that I would be a sailor. This threw her into much perplexity; and, in the absence of her husband, she made known her grief, in a flood of tears, to Lady Archibald Hamilton, mother of the late Sir William Hamilton, and wife of the governor of Greenwich Hospital. Her ladyship said she did not see the matter in the same light as my mother did; that she thought the sea a very honorable and a very good profession, and said she would undertake to procure me a situation in some ship of war.

"In the mean time my mother sent for her brother, Mr. John Parker, who, on being made acquainted with my determination, expostulated with me, but to no purpose. I was resolved I would not be a lawyer, and that I would be a sailor. Shortly afterwards, Lady A. Hamilton introduced me to Lady Burlington, and she to Commodore Townshend, who was at that time going out in the Gloucester, as commander-in-chief, to Jamaica. She requested that he would take me on his quarter-deck, to which the commodore readily consented; and I was forthwith to be prepared for a sea life.

"My equipment was rather what would now be called grotesque. My coat was made for me to grow up to; it reached down to my heels, and was fully large in the sleeves. I had a dirk and a gold-laced hat; and in this costume my uncle caused me to be introduced to my patroness, Lady Burlington. Here I acquitted myself but badly. I lagged behind my uncle, and held by the skirt of his coat. Her ladyship, however, insisted on my coming forward, shook hands with me, and told me I had chosen a very honorable profession. She then gave Mr. Parker a note to Commodore Townshend, desiring that we should call on him early the next morning. This we did; and, after waiting some time, the commodore made his appearance in his nightcap and slippers, and in a very rough and uncouth voice asked me, how soon I would be ready to join my ship? I replied, 'Directly.' 'Then you may go to-morrow morning,' said he, 'and I will give you a letter to the first lieutenant.'

Captain Brenton here interrupts the narrative by informing us, that the manner and circumstances of Young Jervis's introduction to the first lieutenant are too gross to be described; that, in point of immorality and vice, it equalled or outdid anything described in Roderick Random.

"This was in the year 1748. As soon as the ship was ready for sea, we proceeded to Jamaica; and, as I was always fond of an active life, I volunteered to go into small vessels, and saw a good deal of what was going on.

"My father had a very large family, with limited means. He gave me twenty pounds at starting, and that was all he ever gave me. After I had been a considerable time at the station, I drew for twenty more, but the bill came back protested. I was mortified at this rebuke, and made a promise, which I have ever kept, that I would never draw another bill without a certainty of its being paid. I immediately changed my mode of living, quitted my mess, lived alone, and took up the ship's allowance, which I found quite sufficient; washed and mended my own clothes; made a pair of trowsers out of the ticking of my bed; and having by these means saved as much money as would redeem my honor, I took up my bill; and from that time to this [and he said this with great energy] I have taken care to keep within my means."—(Brenton, Vol. i., pp. 19, 20.)

Mr. Tucker's statement does not materially differ from this, but it wants the freshness of the original. However limited the means may have been of Mr. Swynfen Jervis with his double offices, or whatever his intention in subjecting his son to pecuniary distress and mortified feelings, it took with the latter the right turn;—kindled in his breast a lofty spirit of independence, which never afterwards was quenched: it first taught him to rely upon himself, and how securely, though not without a sacrifice, he might do so; it originated in him that confidence in his own resources, which, in the constantly occurring transactions of his eventful life, was one of his chief superiorities over the run of mankind.

It was, however, a dangerous, and to many a youth would have proved a fatal, experiment, though it succeeded with young Jervis. But it succeeded, not so much from the wisdom of the parent, as from the natural and determined character of the boy. It was that innate and inherent character, more than the difficulties he had to encounter on his first entrance into the service, that made him what he afterwards became; for we are by no means sure that a young man, entering the service under wholly different circumstances—to whom his friends allow some £50 or £60 a-year for his mess, in order to enable him to live like a gentleman among his colleagues—would not turn out as distinguished an officer as one doomed to share the poverty of Jervis, to sell his own bedding, and to sleep on the bare deck.

At an early period after his joining the Gloucester and arriving on the West Indian station, finding he had no means of partaking in the mess of his colleagues in that ship on account of the expenses, he prevailed on the captain to transfer him into one of the small cruisers, where he could adapt his scanty means to his absolute necessities; and, being utterly unable to indulge in expenses on shore, he was always ready to volunteer for such small craft as were proceeding to sea. The dishonored bill being the greatest weight upon his mind, he resolved to submit to the endurance of pinching privation, in order to relieve himself from the burden. In one of these cruisers it happened that, in the cable tier, was an old quartermaster named Drysdale, who had been mate of a merchant vessel; this old seaman afforded the midshipman the only assistance he ever received, towards the perfect acquirement, which he afterwards attained, of navigation.

Thus did this youth contrive to rub on, for six years, till the autumn of 1754, when he had nearly served his time as midshipman, and then returned in the Sphinx to England; was transferred to the William and Mary yacht, and there completed the few months required to make him eligible for a lieutenant's commission. This he received in the early part of January, 1755, and joined the Prince, of ninety guns, intended for the flag of Lord Anson. She was commanded by Captain Saunders, "the pattern of steady bravery combined with the most unaffected modesty." In February he was transferred, as the junior lieutenant, to the Royal George, and the following month to the Nottingham, one of the fleet under Admiral Boscawen.

When Sir Edward Hawke was sent out to the Mediterranean to repair the misfortunes connected with Admiral Byng's command, Captain Saunders was promoted to the flag, and appointed second in command; and it speaks volumes in favor of Jervis, that his short acquaintance had impressed that excellent officer with so good an opinion, that, unsolicited, he was selected as one of his followers. He placed him in the Dorchester, whence he was soon afterwards removed to the Prince, in which the Admiral's flag was then flying; and when, in 1757 it was shifted to the Culloden, he took Mr. Jervis with him as his second lieutenant.

The illness of Strachan, who commanded a small sloop, the Experiment, placed Lieutenant Jervis, for the first time, in the command of a ship; and, being sent out on a cruise, he fell in with and engaged the French privateer Xebeque, much superior in force and sailing. In a running fight, which lasted above two hours, the Experiment had a midshipman killed and several of the crew wounded; the sloop was much damaged in her hull and rigging, and her main-mast shot through. The Xebeque made off; but her speed was so superior that the pursuit was soon decided to be hopeless.

The expedition against Canada being decided on, and the renowned Wolfe appointed to the command of the military forces, Admiral, now Sir Charles Saunders, who was recalled from the Mediterranean from the express purpose of taking the command of the fleet to be employed on this expedition, again hoisted his flag in the Prince, and selected Mr. Jervis to be his first lieutenant. The military Commander-in-chief, and his aide-de-camp, Captain (afterwards Colonel) Barré, were among Sir Charles Saunders's guests. Wolfe and Jervis had been at school together, "when the generous acquaintance of youthful hours" had been formed, now in a maturer age to be renewed;* and such was the confidence the soldier here placed in the sailor, that, "when, on the eve of battle, that gallant young hero sought for a friend to whom he might unbosom the fondest secret of his heart, Jervis was the chosen depository."

By the time the forces had arrived at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, Sir Charles had appointed Jervis to command the Porcupine sloop, with which, by his alertness on all occasions, he was judged to be of material service to the army. The Porcupine was ordered to lead, and the General embarked in the leading ship. When under the guns of Quebec, it fell a dead calm. The stream of the river set the Porcupine rapidly towards the flats, and within the reach of the guns of Fort Louis, from whence she was cannonaded. But, by the judicious exertions of Jervis and his crew, she was towed off, and the fleet conducted to a landing-place; and here Commander Jervis's participation ceased.

The exploits and the result of this expedition are matters of history, in which the name of Wolfe is emblazoned in imperishable characters.

"In England," says Lord Orford, "the people despaired, they triumphed, they wept, for Wolfe had fallen in the hour of victory; joy, grief, curiosity, astonishment, were painted on every countenance; the more they inquired, the higher their admiration rose; not an incident but was heroic and affecting." "Still, however," says Mr. Tucker, "does one incident remain, which, it is believed, is not generally known, and which, as Commander Jervis participated in it, should be related. On the night previous to the battle, after all the orders for the assault were given, Wolfe requested a private interview with his friend; at which, saying he had the strongest presentiment that he should be killed in the fight of the morrow, but he was sure he should die on the field of glory, Wolfe unbuttoned his waistcoat, and taking from his bosom the miniature of a young lady with whose heart his own 'blended,' he delivered it to Commander Jervis, entreating that, if the foreboding came to pass, he would himself return it to her on his arrival in England. Wolfe's presages were too completely fulfilled, and Commander Jervis had the most painful duty of delivering the pledge to Miss Lowther."

* Is not this doubtful? Wolfe was born in 1726, Jervis in 1734, making a difference of eight years in their ages.

In 1769 he was appointed to the Alarm frigate, and sent to the Mediterranean. When at Genoa, (not at Tunis, as Captain Brenton says,) two African slaves, sauntering in their galley near the mole, jumped into the Alarm's boat, enfolded themselves in the British colors, and shouted out, "We are free!" The Genoese officer, hearing this, caused them to be taken forcibly from their place of refuge, one of the slaves carrying away with him the piece of the flag torn off. This being reported to Captain Jervis, he at once decided it was an insult to the British flag; and "accordingly," he says, "I demanded of both the Doge and Senate that both the slaves should be brought on board the Alarm, with the part of the torn color which the slave carried off with him, the officer of the guard punished, and an apology made on the quarter-deck of the Alarm, under the king's colors, for the outrage offered to the British nation;" and he carried every point of his demand. Mr. Tucker, rather unnecessarily, here introduces Jervis's opinions in after life as decidedly averse from the abolition of negro slavery; and we notice this the rather because we think Captain Brenton has been led into a mistake. He says that Sir George Naylor waited on Lord St. Vincent for some historical anecdotes to grace the history of his peerage; that his lordship expressed his dissent, being utterly averse from such nonsense and vanity; but that, after a short silence, he said, "Yes, there is one anecdote which I will give you, and one at which I am more proud than of any other event of my life;"—and he tells the story of the two slaves. This is not exactly what we should expect from one, who was not only indifferent, but invariably hostile, to slave emancipation; and we think, moreover, that some little "vanity" was displayed (but could any one blame it?) in the emblazonment of his arms with an historical anecdote that no one can mistake;—his supporters bearing the Thunderer's eagle and the winged horse of Helicon, in direct allusion to the capture of the Pegase by the Foudroyant.

After a severe storm, and the shipwreck of the Alarm at Marseilles, it required the most extraordinary exertions, together with the valuable assistance of M. Pleville de Peltier, the port officer, to make her again seaworthy; after which Jervis, by his representations to the Admiralty, had the gratification of presenting to M. de Peltier a valuable piece of plate. A few months after the accident, he writes to his sister—"The Alarm is the completest thing I ever saw on the water;"—having previously described her as "a miserable sunken wreck."

He also wrote to his father on this occasion; but nothing appears in reply either then or thereafter. "I have the happiness to inform my dearest father that my prospects brighten, and I hope to be at sea in a month. I have had a severe lesson of submission to the Divine will, gained some experience, and, I have the vanity to think, lost no reputation, although other loss I have sustained enough; but that is not to be named."

His Royal Highness Prince William Henry, Duke of Gloucester, being in a weak state of health, it was the king's pleasure that a winter's sojourn in Italy should take place, and that a frigate should convey him from port to port; and the Alarm was ordered on that service. On this occasion Jervis proved, in one respect, that as the boy had been, so was the man. Alive to the advantages of visiting the several courts of Italy under such favorable auspices, and in the society in which he was compelled, as it were, to move, he thus informs his friends how he supported himself: "Throughout such an expensive employ, by great economy, my own pocket supported myself, and maintained my independence, though it was hard work; but I could not afford to purchase anything in this land of tempting curiosities and arts." The Duke quitted in May, with a heart overflowing with thankfulness for the unalloyed pleasure he had received from his trip with Jervis.

The Alarm, after this, went home, was paid off, and Jervis, with his friend Captain Barrington, the former having first for some time studied the French language, set off on a tour of inspection of the European naval arsenals, chiefly those of France. They then proceeded to St. Petersburg by the Baltic; and Jervis gives a concise and spirited account of the Empress Catharine, and the noted characters who were then found in the Russian capital. Stockholm, Carlsrona, Copenhagen, and the harbors of Norway, were also visited; as were Hamburg, Lubeck, and the ports of Holland, together with the northern ports of France; and in the autumn of the second year of their travels, they returned to Plymouth.

Soon after his arrival, Jervis was appointed to the Foudroyant, the finest two-deck ship in the British navy. She was annexed to the Channel fleet under Admiral Keppel, and was stationed immediately astern of the Commander-in-chief's ship, the Victory. In our review of the Life of Keppel, by the Hon. and Rev. Augustus Keppel, we adverted to the straightforward evidence of Captain Jervis on the court-martial called for by Palliser against Keppel. Mr. Tucker has reprinted, at full length, the evidence of Jervis, which occupied two days, and which consists of ninety-one questions and cross-questions, with the answers. All of these were clear, concise, decided, and consistent; and that evidence alone left not a doubt as to the conduct of Keppel.

In 1779 the Foudroyant was still attached to the Channel fleet, then under the command of Sir Charles Hardy, who made so dignified a retreat before the immensely superior Spanish and French fleets, that Lord Howe and his Board of Admiralty expressed their high "approbation" of the Admiral's wise and prudent conduct.

It would appear, however, that Jervis considered it in a different light. Writing to his sister he says—"I am in the most humbled state of mind I ever experienced, from the retreat we have made before the combined fleets all yesterday and this morning." Fortune, however, ere long cheered him up. In 1782, his friend Admiral Barrington was sent to sea with twelve sail of the line, and one of them was the Foudroyant. The Brest fleet came out; the signal was made for a general chase, and the Foudroyant, being the best sailer, soon walked by the fleet, and, towards the evening, saw the French, six ships of war, and eighteen sail of convoy. About ten, P. M., Jervis, observing they were separating, and selecting the largest for pursuit, ordered Bowen, a favorite midshipman, to the fore-castle, to keep sight of her by his night-glass. In the mean time everything was made ready for action; and to the repeated questions to young Bowen, if he saw the chase? the replies being always in the affirmative, Jervis was so delighted with the boy's attention, that at last he called out, "That's right, Bowen; do you only keep sight of her, and rely upon it I will never lose sight of you."—A promise most faithfully kept.* Young Bowen, now seeing a close action at hand, took his station, as aide-de-camp, by the side of his captain on the quarter-deck. The Foudroyant, running at the rate of eleven miles an hour, was speedily within hail of the adversary, when the officer on the fore-castle called out—"She has put her helm up to rake us, sir." When Jervis was on the point of putting the Foudroyant's helm a-starboard, in order to give her a broadside from her starboard guns, young Bowen was so forcibly struck with the advantage that might be taken by a contrary proceeding, that he could not help exclaiming—"Then, if we put our helm to port we shall rake her." Jervis, instantly feeling the force of the observation, in his turn exclaimed, "You are right, Bowen—helm a-port!" Passing close under the enemy's stern, the Foudroyant poured in, and continued for some time, a raking fire. The enemy being thrown into confusion, her sails in the greatest disorder, Jervis determined on boarding, and laid the Foudroyant on the enemy's larboard side. Headed by young Bowen, the boarders were soon in possession of the enemy's deck, struck her colors with cheers, and thus in about three quarters of an hour the action ceased.

The prize was the Pegase of seventy-four guns, commanded by Le Chevalier Cillart, who by the fortune of war became a prisoner to an old acquaintance, to whom, of course, Jervis was delighted to pay the most marked attention; giving positive injunctions that every article of furniture, clothing, books, and papers, belonging to the captain and the officers, should be carefully collected and brought on board the Foudroyant. Captain Brenton tells a very different story, which he says he had from Sir John Jervis himself. The French captain showed him a letter he had written to the minister of marine, giving an account of his capture, and he asked Jervis his opinion of it. "I read it," said the latter, "and returned it to him, saying I had but one objection, namely, that not one word of it was true—'Mais comment pas vrai!' No, sir, not one word of it is true; but you can send it if you please. He did send it, sir, and, when he was tried for the loss of his ship, the letter was produced; he was dismissed the service, and his sword broken over his head." Sir John Jervis, we venture to say, never would use so insulting and brutal a phrase to any one, much less to a friend in misfortune, his prisoner and his guest. The loss of life, and the damage to the masts and yards, were great in the Pegase; in the Foudroyant not a man was killed, and only five wounded—of whom Jervis was one, being struck between the eyes, both of which were blackened. Admiral Barrington, in a private letter to Mr. Rose, after due praise of Jervis, says—"He, poor fellow, has got an honorable mark above his eye, which I conceive will be of no bad consequence, rather the reverse; for as a man of middle age, it may make his fortune. The fair honor the brave, and, as we suppose, delight in kissing the honorable mark." In submitting to the king what reward should be conferred on Jervis, his majesty at once said to Lord Keppel—"Let him be made Knight Commander of the Bath;" but no baronetcy, as Mr. Tucker has stated.

In 1782, the Foudroyant was attached to the fleet under Lord Howe for the relief of Gibraltar, where Sir John Jervis got great credit for the able manner in which he conducted safely into port the fleet of victuallers and powder ships, in the face of the Spanish fleet, and amid the acclamations of the garrison. On the passage out to Gibraltar, Lord Howe one day assembled the flag-officers and captains, to know their opinions with regard to the prudence, or otherwise, of an inferior fleet engaging a superior one by night. Jervis was the only captain who decided against it, assigning various reasons for giving preference to a battle by day; in which he was supported by Admiral Barrington, who observed, "that he could not contemplate that any ship would be found wanting in the day of battle; yet, should there unfortunately be a shy cock among them, daylight would expose him."*

* At the close of the year, at the relief of Gibraltar, he appointed Bowen acting lieutenant of the Foudroyant, and he was confirmed to the Prince in 1790. In 1792, following his patron to the West Indies, he obtained the rank of commander, then of post-captain into the Terpsichore, in which ship he so often and brilliantly distinguished himself; and while captain of her at Tenerife, he there gallantly fell.

On her return from Gibraltar, at the close of 1782, the Foudroyant was paid off, after being eight years in commission; a more perfect man-of-war, or a more beautiful model, the British navy had then never seen—superior alike for her sailing and fighting qualities. Yet when in the French service, this fine ship, of eighty-four guns and eight hundred men, was captured by the Monmouth, a small sixty-four, after an action of four hours, in which Captain Gardner was first wounded in the arm, then shot dead by a ball striking his forehead; but the action was nobly continued by the first lieutenant, Carket. The enemy had one hundred men killed and ninety wounded; the Monmouth, twenty-eight killed and seventy-nine wounded. Splendid as the Foudroyant was, we believe that no model or lines of her beautiful figure have been preserved; but one of her name was built at Plymouth, in 1798, by Sir John Henslowe.

On a conjoint expedition projected by the government against the Spanish West Indies, Sir John Jervis accepted a command, on the principle that he never solicited or refused any particular service, and his broad pendant was hoisted in the Salisbury; but on the armed neutrality being settled, the project was abandoned, and Sir John struck his broad pendant, and remained on shore about six or seven years. A person, however, of such an active mind was not likely to continue idle; and, on the general election of 1784, he was returned for N. Yarmouth. In politics he was a decided Whig; but, as Mr. Tucker says, he should be called "a Whig Royalist; for although upon all other constitutional questions the strong inclination of his opinion was toward the liberal side, yet, of the necessary and lawful prerogatives of the crown, and of its consequence and grandeur, he was at all times the eager defender." His name is to be found in all the great struggles of the Whigs for liberty, and at all their meetings in favor of religious toleration and of Parliamentary reform.

In 1787, Sir John Jervis was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral; and in 1790, when the Nootka Sound quarrel occurred, he hoisted his flag in the Prince, of ninety-eight guns, under Lord Howe, and was placed in command of a division of the fleet. Spain having applied to the National Assembly of France for assistance, the latter, as usual, ever ready to show her hatred of England, assembled a fleet at Brest; but licentiousness and insubordination having usurped the place of discipline, the inevitable consequence, mutiny, followed; officers were appointed and removed at the pleasure of the crews; and nothing was, or could be, attempted by such a disorganized fleet. A convention was made by England with Spain, hostilities were avoided, the fleet paid off, and each flag-officer was indulged with the remuneration of a midshipman for promotion. The quarter-deck of the Prince was full of young gentlemen of the first families in the kingdom. Many were the candidates, and overpowering the interest made, for the highly-connected aspirants; but when the day came for nomination, surprise and disappointment arrived with it. The unsolicited recommendation of Sir John Jervis, was in favor of a friendless, retiring, but well-behaved son of an old and poor, but well-conducted, lieutenant. In answer to the youth's overflowings of gratitude and astonishment at his good fortune, Sir John said—"Sir, I named you for the lieutenant I was allowed to promote, because you had merited the good opinion of your superiors, and that you were the son of an old officer and worthy man in no great affluence. A steady perseverance in that conduct which has now caused you to be thus distinguished, is the most likely means to carry you forward in your profession; for I trust that other officers of my rank will observe the maxim that I do—to prefer the son of a brother officer, when deserving, before any other."

That Sir John's correspondence was well suited to its subject, the following, forming a striking contrast with the preceding, will furnish an example:—"I enclose ——'s letter as a testimony of his effrontery; no consideration will ever induce me to countenance any officer who slights the good opinion of his captain, or presumes to attempt to pay me a compliment at the expense of him."

In 1793, the government decided on a joint expedition against the French West India Islands, when Sir John Jervis was selected to command the naval part, and Sir Charles Grey the troops. A combined expedition is not always a cordial or a successful one; but in the present instance a good feeling and harmony prevailed, not only between the respective commanders, but on every occasion between the soldiers and sailors—each vying with the others which should outdo their fellow-warriors in the same cause. In no instance was there the slightest misunderstanding between the commanders-in-chief; it is on record that neither of them had occasion even to write a single letter on service to the other, during the whole campaign. The result was, that although the French were well prepared, and fought desperately, every island fell in succession into our hands; so that, in a campaign of scarcely more than three months, when all the main objects of the expedition had been accomplished, Sir John Jervis was enabled to inform the Admiralty, "that all the French Islands in those seas were reduced."

* Sir John Barrow gives this anecdote in his life of Howe, as he tells us, on living authority.

There was, however, a single instance, and but one, of foolish feeling, originating probably in weakness of intellect, but explained into a misunderstanding, on the part of a general officer. The following order was given out by General Prescott:—"Whereas Vice-Admiral Sir John Jervis, has given orders frequently on shore here, and particularly in a note dated Boyne, June 11th, which must have arisen either from great ignorance, or great presumption and arrogance—if from ignorance, poor man, he is to be pitied; but if from great presumption and arrogance, to be checked. It is therefore Lieutenant-General Prescott's orders, that in future no attention is to be given to such notes or orders, and his signature to be as little regarded as those of John Nokes and Peter Styles." The cause of this peevish and foolish order was owing to the Admiral having seen a few soldiers in a state of intoxication, and requested the officer on guard to hand them over to his boat, to be sent on board, which the officer reported he had been commanded to do. We can well imagine the fierce look from the all-piercing eye which Sir John cast on first sight of this impudent order; and with what ineffable scorn he treated "the ignorance, the presumption, and the arrogance" of the silly writer. It appears, however, that the General soon recovered his senses, as he says in the Gazette—"I cannot help acknowledging the great obligations I lie under to Sir John Jervis, for the many and essential services which he rendered me and my garrison while he continued in the command, and which were always offered with the utmost alacrity, and performed with equal diligence."

To recount the operations of the besieging forces is beyond the scope of this article; but we cannot withhold a few words on the eminently gallant conduct of Commander Faulknor, of the Zebra, before Fort Bourbon. The Zebra, with bamboo scaling ladders triced up to the shrouds, was ordered to lead in; made sail straight to the fort; laid his little sloop as close under the guns as the water allowed, to within fifteen feet of the wall; and Faulknor headed his boarders over the parapet into the fort. On the covered way a whole regiment waited their approach; a tremendous discharge of musketry thinned the ranks of the seamen; but the enemy was charged so fiercely that nothing could withstand it, and the whole regiment laid down their arms. Faulknor forced his way through the iron gates, gained the summit of the citadel, and struck the French and hoisted the English colors, amidst shouts of triumph from the armed boats, from the squadron, and from the army on the outside. "No language of mine," says the Commander-in-chief, "can express the merit of Captain Faulknor upon the occasion; but as every officer and man in the army and squadron bears testimony to it, this incomparable achievement cannot fail of being recorded in history."

On a signal being made for the Commander of the Zebra, Sir John ordered the Boyne's hands to be turned up, and placing himself at the head of his officers, he thus greeted the hero—"Captain Faulknor, by your daring courage this day, a French frigate has fallen into our hands. I have ordered her to be taken into our service, and here is your commission to command her, in which I have named her, after yourself, sir, the Undaunted."

But this brave officer did not long survive this honorable testimony of his gallant conduct. In the following year, when he commanded the Blanche, he fought a desperate battle with the French frigate La Pique, of thirty-eight guns, in which he fell, while he himself was in the very act of lashing the bowsprit of the enemy to the capstan of his own ship! which it was said he hinted beforehand his intention of doing. The action continued for five hours, when La Pique called out she had struck. The boats of the Blanche being all stove in, Sir David Milne, the present Commander-in-chief at Plymouth, then her second lieutenant, with a few men, swam on board and took possession of the prize. She had about seventy-six men killed and one hundred and ten wounded. The Blanche lost her captain, and had two killed and twenty-one wounded. Such is, and ever has been, the triumphant result of English courage, coolness, and superior seamanship.

But, alas! for the mutability of human affairs, and the wonderful changes effected by human invention! A boiler of water, converted into steam, impels a ship through the sea with a greater and more constant velocity than the winds can do; and the ship so impelled requires but few or no seamen. She is navigated by engineers, gunners, blacksmiths, and coal-stokers, who usurp the place of seamen. What then is to become of our brave sailors! and what is to become of our superiority of seamanship, of the glorious result of which we have just given so splendid an instance! It may be said, we too can steam equally with others; true—but the naval superiority of England, which has been asserted and maintained for the last three hundred years, admits not of equality. Let us but imagine, what may well happen, one of our three-deckers becalmed, and a steamer with those long guns which throw heavy shot or shells to the distance of three miles, taking up or shifting her position as best suits her, while the other thrice-powerful ship is compelled to remain immovable, and must submit to be "pestered by a popinjay," and stung, as it were, by a smoking mosquito, which, like that animal, can neither be hit, nor caught, nor crushed. The only resource we have, and it is the imperative duty of the authorities to apply it, is to supply every ship of the line and frigate, with as many of these long guns as each can conveniently be armed with.

Though Sir John Jervis was by nature, and from circumstances, frequently blunt in his manner, and not over-polished in his language, yet he would, with the greatest good-humor and tact, convey a censure or reproof with the desired effect. For instance, Commodore Thompson being frequently careless in his dress, was one day in his boat, clad in a purser's duck frock and a common straw hat, and passing near the stern of the flagship, was recognized by the admiral, who hailed the boat—"In the barge there! go and assist in towing that transport." The commodore received the gentle rebuke as his chief intended it: standing up in his boat, and taking off his hat, he answered the hail in a proper style, "Ay, ay, sir!" and proceeded to execute the order.

It was generally supposed that Sir John Jervis had brought home enormous wealth from the West Indies, but he declared in print that it was a very great mistake; for he says, "my expenses in entertaining the whole staff of the army on the passage out, and in going from island to island, exceeded my gains." Then the Boyne, while his flag was still flying, caught fire at Spithead, was entirely consumed, and everything in her belonging to him destroyed.

The admiral was not long permitted to remain on shore. Near the close of the same year (1795) he was sent for by Lord Spencer, and informed by him that his name had been submitted to and approved by the king, to command the Mediterranean fleet; which he at once accepted and prepared forthwith to set out. On his arrival at Corsica he hoisted his flag in the Victory. His fleet consisted of 2 ships of 100 guns; 5 of 98; 2 of 80; 14 of 74; 2 of 64; 24 frigates; 20 sloops, and other smaller vessels. Under his command were three vice-admirals and one rear-admiral; and here, for the first time, Sir John Jervis made the acquaintance of Hallowell, Troubridge, Collingwood, Hood, Nelson, and Cockburn—names very prominently brought forward under his auspices, and destined to hold the most distinguished rank and to attain the highest honors in the British navy. One only of these memorable seamen survives—Admiral Sir George Cockburn; and long may he survive for the benefit of his country!

The blockade of Toulon was immediately decided on. A detached squadron from the blockading fleet was placed under the orders of Captain (then made Commodore) Nelson of the Agamemnon, for the purpose of cruising along the coast to support the allies; and seven sail of the line were left before Cadiz, under the command of Rear-Admiral Mann.

Expecting the in-shore squadron, in which were Troubridge, Hood, and Hallowell, who were constantly engaged with the batteries, no occasion offered for the fleet to come into action with the enemy; but it required all the attention and the vigorous exertions of the commander-in-chief, to obtain supplies of provisions and water, and other necessaries for so large a fleet, after the scandalous defection of Corsica—to economize the reduced state of the stores—to keep up discipline, as well in the officers as in the men, by the exercise of the great guns—by desiring the captains to be on deck when a signal was made to tack or wear by night—and by a due regard to all the evolutions of the fleet. A general memorandum says—"The Commander-in-chief has too exalted an opinion of the respective captains of the squadron to doubt their being upon deck when the signal is made to tack or wear in the night."

The progress of the French army in Italy made it probable that their fleet would attempt to enter the Mediterranean; and in this view the Commander-in-chief sent an order to Admiral Mann forthwith to join him—a similar order, it afterwards appeared, having gone to him from the Admiralty. The receipt of the former he acknowledged; but, instead of obeying his orders, he thought fit to proceed to Spithead. The Admiralty told him they felt the greatest regret at his proceedings, and that orders would be forthwith sent to him to "strike his flag and come on shore;" yet the same Board of Admiralty appointed him one of its members not long after!

In October, 1796, Sir John Jervis received information from Sir Gilbert Elliot, the Viceroy of Corsica, that the government was wretched from him, and that the island must be evacuated. The Admiral writes with great indignation to Lord Spencer. "The Viceroy," he says, "had many thousand men in pay, as free companies; these, with almost the whole of the Members of Parliament in the interest of the British Government, and other pensioners, were the first to show enmity to us. In short, I do not believe the page of history can produce an instance of such rascally baseness and ingratitude; for the whole island has been enriched by the generosity of our government."

The Spanish fleet had left Cadiz and entered the Mediterranean, and the Admiral says, "had Admiral Mann sailed from Gibraltar when he received my orders, and obeyed them, I have every reason to believe they would have been cut to pieces."

On the 2d of December he arrived at Gibraltar, and was gratified by receiving an account of his young friend Bowen, now Captain of the Terpsichore, having captured the Spanish frigate Mahoneza. "Bowen," said he, "is of my school." On the 15th of this month we find him cruising off Cape St. Vincent. Three days afterwards he received orders to "proceed immediately to the Tagus." Here within a week his squadron was refitted, replenished, and ready for sea, and he went out with it forthwith, writing to the Admiralty, "Inactivity in the Tagus will make cowards of us all." By the loss of the Bombay Castle, and the grounding of the St. George, the Admiral's fleet was reduced to eight sail of the line.

Fortunately, however, on the 6th of February, he was reinforced with six sail of the line under Sir William Parker, and next day the Culloden rejoined him, by whom he learned that the Spanish fleet had passed Cadiz. On the 13th, Commodore Nelson, with his broad pendant in the Minerve, joined him, and shifted his pendant into the Captain. The morning of the 14th February was foggy, but very soon the Culloden's signal guns announced the enemy. A little after nine, six ships of the line were ordered to chase. The Commander-in-chief walked the quarter-deck, while the hostile numbers were duly reported to him as they appeared, by signal. "There are eight sail of the line, Sir John."—"Very well, sir."—"There are twenty sail of the line, Sir John."—"Very well, sir."—"There are twenty-five sail of the line."—"Very well, sir."—"There are twenty-seven sail, Sir John," and this was accompanied by some remark on the great disparity of the forces.—"Enough, sir, no more of that: the die is cast; and if there were fifty sail I will go through them." This determined answer so delighted Captain Hallowell, who was walking beside him, that, in the ecstasy of the moment, he could not resist patting the old Admiral's back, exclaiming, "That's right, Sir John, that's right; by G—d, we shall give them a d—d good licking!"—and so they certainly did.

The glorious battle of St. Vincent is matter of history. Every one knows that it was won by fifteen to twenty-seven; and that four large ships were taken by that portion of the fleet which attacked the Spanish division separated from the main body. The Captain, the Blenheim, the Excellent, and the Irresistible, under the respective commands of Commodore Nelson, Captains Frederick, Troubridge, Collingwood, and Martin, were the ships that dashed into the midst of them. The Orion, Sir James Saumarez, the Prince George, Vice-Admiral Parker, and the Colossus, Murray, were also in the thickest of the fight. The rest of the fleet were partially engaged in preventing the larger portion of the Spaniards from joining and assisting the division from which the captures were made. Captain Calder, the flag captain, was sent off with the account of the action; but talking over the events of the day, Calder hinted, whether the spontaneous manœuvre that carried Commodore Nelson and Collingwood into the brunt of the battle, was not an unauthorized departure, by the Commodore, from the prescribed mode of attack. "It certainly was so," replied the magnanimous Commander; "and if ever you commit such a breach of your orders, I will forgive you also."

Captain Cockburn, (now Sir George,) of the Minerve, towed out the damaged Captain, and carried Nelson in his boat to the flag-ship, when the Admiral received him on the quarter-deck, took him into his arms, and kissed him. Much nonsense was talked about Nelson's name not being mentioned in the public despatch. The treatment Lord Howe received, but three years before, for selecting names contrary to his own wish and intention, but by command, was alone sufficient for Sir John to avoid a similar dilemma; but he had three Vice-Admirals, Thompson, Parker, and Waldegrave, one of whom, Parker, in the Prince George, behaved most gallantly. Was he to leave them out, and Nelson to stand alone? In his letter, however, to Lord Spencer, of the same date, he makes honorable mention of all who had the opportunity of distinguishing themselves. He thus begins his letter:—"The correct conduct of every officer and man in the squadron on the 14th instant, made it improper to distinguish one more than another in my public letter; because I am confident that, had those who were least in the action been in the situation of the fortunate few, their behavior would not have been less meritorious."

Votes of thanks were given by the two Houses of Parliament, and by a message from the Crown to the House of Commons, a pension of £3000 a-year was settled on the Admiral; a Peerage was also granted, intended at first as that of a Viscount, but afterwards changed to an Earldom. The title he wished to be Orford, as originally belonging to the navy, having been conferred on Admiral Russell after the battle of La Hogue; but the King fixed on that of St. Vincent. The Vice-Admirals, Thompson and Parker, were created Baronets; and Nelson, Knight-Commander of the Bath. The fleet with the prizes proceeded to the Tagus to refit, where, by the end of the month, they were ready and reinforced to twenty-one sail of the line; when, receiving a signal from a frigate off the bar—"The enemy at sea!"—such was the promptitude exhibited, that by daybreak some of the ships reported themselves ready for sea; and at the close of the day the whole squadron, thirteen sail of the line, sailed in pursuit of the enemy.

Enough has been written and said on the subject of the mutiny in the fleet at the Nore and Spithead; but after so glorious a victory off Cape St. Vincent, it could have been little expected that a mutinous spirit would make its appearance in the triumphant fleet before Cadiz. A Portuguese priest, the confessor of the Catholics in the fleet, and in the pay and confidence of Sir Isaac Coffin, showed to that Admiral a letter he had received from two seamen of the Ville de Paris, acquainting him of their intention to assassinate the Commander-in-chief, as soon as the expected resistance should have broken out. In the Ville de Paris too, the villain Bott, the Corresponding Society's delegate on the Cadiz station, confessed, in dying, that the intention was to hang Lord St. Vincent, and transfer the command of the fleet to one Davidson, another delegate, and of course a rebel.

The first practical outbreak of the mutiny was on the Kingfisher's deck, where Captain Maitland, by a thrust of his sword, slew one of the rebels and wounded some others: he was tried at his own request, and acquitted. And here we cannot forbear noticing a most reprehensible passage in Captain Brenton's work, the improbability of which, acquainted as he was with Lord St. Vincent's character, ought alone to have prevented the insertion of it. He says, "Lord St. Vincent did not certainly participate in the feeling which dictated the admonition, (there was none;)* for I am credibly informed, that he invited the members of the court-martial to dinner, and after the cloth was removed gave as a toast, 'Maitland's radical cure.'" Invited the members to insult them! He should have known that Lord St. Vincent was incapable of uttering so brutal a sentiment; nor is it likely he ever invited the members of the court-martial, in a body, to dine.

But it was on the arrival of Sir Roger Curtis's squadron, and in it, that the crisis of disaffection raged. Applications for courts-martial on mutineers came from three of his ships, the Marlborough, the Lion, and the Centaur. We shall select only the first, as sufficient to show the Admiral's determination to crush the evil. Lord St. Vincent had been apprized that the Marlborough was among the most disorganized at Spithead; and she was therefore ordered, on her approach, to take her berth in the centre, at a small distance from the rest of the fleet. A mutiny had broken out in her at Bearhaven, and again on her passage out, which was suppressed by the officers, but chiefly by the first lieutenant; the ostensible object of the mutiny was the protection of the life of a seaman, who had forfeited it by a capital crime. A court-martial was now ordered on the mutineers, and one being sentenced to die, the Commander-in-chief ordered the execution to take place the following morning, "by the crew of the Marlborough alone; no part of the boat's crews from the other ships, as had been usual on similar occasions, to assist in the punishment." The Captain of the Marlborough, Ellison, waited on the Commander-in-chief, reminded him that the crew would not suffer capital punishment of a condemned criminal, and expressed his conviction that they would never permit the man to be hung on board that ship. The Captain had been received on the quarter-deck of the Ville de Paris, before the officers and ship's company—all listening in breathless suspense; and Lord St. Vincent, having himself listened attentively until he had ceased to speak, after a short pause thus addressed him:—"What! do you mean to tell me, Captain Ellison, that you cannot command his Majesty's ship the Marlborough? If that is the case, sir, I will immediately send on board an officer who can." The Captain requested that, at all events, the boat's crews from the rest of the fleet might, as usual, attend at this, to haul the man up; for he did not expect the Marlborough's would do it. Lord St. Vincent sternly replied—"Captain Ellison, you are an old officer, sir; have served long; suffered severely in the service, and have lost an arm in action; and I should be very sorry that any advantage should be taken of your advanced years. That man shall be hanged at eight o'clock to-morrow morning, and by his own ship's company; for not a hand from any other ship in the fleet shall touch the rope. You will now return on board, sir; and, lest you should not prove able to command your ship, an officer will be at hand who can."

Captain Ellison retired, and was followed by an order to cause the ship's guns to be housed and secured, and that at daybreak her ports should be lowered. All launches of the fleet were then ordered to rendezvous under the Prince at seven o'clock the following morning, armed with carronades and twelve rounds of ammunition, each commanded by a lieutenant—the whole under the orders of Captain Campbell, of the Blenheim. On presenting his orders, Lord St. Vincent told him, "he was to attend the execution, and if any symptoms of mutiny appeared in the Marlborough, any attempt to open her ports, or any resistance to the hanging of the prisoner, he was to proceed close, touching the ship, and to fire into her, and to continue his fire until all mutiny or resistance should cease; and that, should it become absolutely necessary, he should sink the ship in the face of the fleet."

It is almost unnecessary to add, that at the signal gun the man was hauled up to the yard-arm with a run. "Thus," says Mr. Tucker, "the law was satisfied;" and at the moment, perhaps one of the greatest of his life, Lord St. Vincent said, "Discipline is preserved, sir." He might well say so; for this firm determination gave a fatal blow to the mutiny in the fleet before Cadix, but not a final one, as scarcely a ship arrived from England that was not infected with mutineers, and again and again the dreadful sentence was inflicted—the crews of such ships being invariably the executioners of their own rebels. When the St. George joined from England with some mutineers in irons, a court-martial sat on Saturday and pronounced sentence, which Lord St. Vincent ordered to be carried into effect the following morning, though it was Sunday, for which he was fully aware he would incur the censure of the sanctionious; but he was also aware that the instant punishment of death on one man, might be the means of preserving the lives of thousands. "I hope," he writes to Lord Spencer—"I hope I shall not be censured by the bench of Bishops, as I have been by Vice-Admiral ——* for profaning the Sabbath." The criminals asked five days to prepare, in which they would have hatched

* The sentence only says, "that the means taken by Captain Maitland were spirited and successful, but hasty, and not tempered with that discretion which the serious nature of the case required."

* Calder, as would appear by the following letter.

five hundred treasons. His conduct on this urgent occasion was highly approved by the Board of Admiralty; and Nelson writes to Sir R. Calder, "I am sorry that you should have to differ with — (Q. St. Vincent;) but had it been Christmas-day instead of Sunday, I would have executed them; we know not what might have been hatched by a Sunday's grog; now, your discipline is safe. I talked to our people, and I hope with good effect; indeed they seem a very quiet set."

After a few more executions of rebels, imported into the Cadiz fleet from Spithead, the chief of whom were delegates of the Corresponding Society, or United Irishmen, one of them, in the Princess-Royal, pointed out to his colleagues Cadiz as their future country. Fortunate was it for England that a man of such perspicacity, and unbending firmness of mind as Lord St. Vincent, was sent to command on this distant station; and that the disaffected ships were placed under his stern orders, to restore them, as he succeeded in doing, to loyalty and discipline. Here, indeed, this great commander showed that he possessed all the chief mental qualities necessary to greatness, on great emergencies. Others then, as before, showed a courage equally intrepid; but no man that ever held command in the British navy, ever showed in a higher degree that force of mind, that steadiness of purpose, and that undoubting reliance on native resources, by which alone can great successes, in perilous times, be achieved. It is not too much to say, that a Commander-in-chief with less nerve would have endangered the loss of the whole fleet. Nelson, from a sense of duty to his country, would have pursued similar steps, with all the milk of human kindness in his bosom, and so would Troubridge; but having named them, we pause.

It now (1795) became necessary to watch the French force in Toulon, and superintend their proceedings in the Mediterranean. In Lord St. Vincent's fleet before Cadiz were three subordinate flag officers, of whom Nelson was the junior; and by a simultaneous coincidence of opinion (not at all surprising) between Lord St. Vincent and Lord Spencer, they severally decided that it was a duty owing to the country to place this important command under "her choicest though younger son." Lord St. Vincent was fully aware that he would incur "a world of enmity, vexation, and annoyance" by this selection. Among the most disappointed and intemperate was Sir John Orde, who wrote an accusatory and fretful letter to Lord Spencer, and sent a copy of it to Lord St. Vincent; to which his lordship thus replied:—"The letter you have done me the honor to communicate, expresses precisely what I should have done under similar circumstances, for I never was blessed with prudence and forbearance. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that those who are responsible for measures, have an undoubted right to appoint the men they prefer to carry them into execution." Seeing the necessity of getting rid of so troublesome an officer as Sir John Orde, he took occasion to send him home in the Blenheim, with the following short note:—"I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated off Cadiz, 3d August, expressed in terms of insubordination, that even in these times I did not expect to receive from an officer of your rank." On Sir John's arrival in England, he applied for a court-martial on the Commander-in-chief, which was of course refused; but some time afterwards, when Lord St. Vincent returned to England, he received a challenge from Sir John, which his majesty laid his commands upon him not to accept; and here the affair ended.

The Mediterranean having now become the scene of active operations, Lord St. Vincent proceeded to Gibraltar, from whence he could not only more conveniently carry on the correspondence, but also make arrangements for repairing the defects of the Mediterranean squadron, of which he anticipated a speedy occasion. The splendid victory of the Nile, the operations against Minorca, and other minor affairs, were the objects he contemplated, and which very soon called for assistance. The actions of Nelson belong to himself, and have been recorded in the annals of the British Navy; but they belong not immediately to the life of Lord St. Vincent. On his hearing the result of the battle of the Nile, he wrote to Nelson,—"God be praised! and you and your gallant band rewarded by a grateful country, for the greatest achievement the history of the world can produce!"

Despatches were shortly received that Minorca was taken without the loss of a single man; and Sir James Saumarez having arrived with the disabled ships and prizes taken at the battle of the Nile, the indefatigable Admiral, defying the accumulation of arrears, set about the immediate repair of the ships, attending in person the whole day, though up generally till two in the morning reading and writing his letters. The prizes were patched up for Lisbon, but he announced his determination that the battered ships of his fleet should be made seaworthy at Gibraltar; and by his unceasing exertions and mental resources, the Nile squadron was repaired without a single ship quitting the station. But the excessive fatigue, both of mind and body, preyed so much upon his health, that the Admiralty, having received notice of his apprehensions "that he must retire or sink," sent out Lord Keith with reinforcements to the fleet before Cadiz.

Shortly after this his lordship returned to Cadiz bay; but found himself so ill and worn down as to be obliged to go back to Gibraltar. During his illness, which confined him to his bed, he was informed that a powerful French fleet, twenty-six sail of the line, with frigates, was passing the Rock into the Mediterranean. Invalid as he was, he superintended the equipment in person, hoisted his flag in the Ville de Paris, and the entire fleet was watered, provisioned, stored, and got ready for sea in two days. His illness, however, increasing, he transferred the entire command to Lord Keith, and repaired in the Argo to Gibraltar, and thence to England.

Information had been conveyed to Lord Spencer, that all was not right in the Channel fleet; that the deep-rooted spirit of sedition among the crews, so far from being exterminated, afforded but too serious grounds for apprehending another mutiny in that fleet, if speedy and efficient measures were not taken to subdue the insubordination of the men, and correct the laxity of discipline in the officers; that, in short, none but a Commander-in-chief of the highest reputation, of a bold, firm, and decisive character, could hope to succeed in restoring a proper degree of obedience and subordination. Lord St. Vincent was at once looked up to as being that officer; but his health was still in a precarious state. The Admiralty caused frequent inquiries to be made of Dr. Baird, his lordship's confidential medical adviser, who reported his case to be one of doubtful issue. A change of weather, however, produced a fortunate turn; and Baird thought it probable that, as the genial season was advancing, a favorable result might be expected.

Lord St. Vincent was then at Bath. One morning when the doctor paid his customary visit, his lordship said, "Baird, I am going afloat." "Surely, my lord, you are not"—"Stop, Baird," his lordship replied, "I anticipate all you are going to say; but the king and the government require it, and the discipline of the British navy demands it. It is of no consequence to me whether I die afloat or ashore: the die is cast." He then informed Baird that Lord Spencer had come to him from London for the purpose of requiring his services, and that all was settled. His Secretary was sent for, and in a few days his flag was flying in the Namur at Portsmouth. Sir George Grey was appointed flag captain, and Sir Thomas Troubridge captain of the fleet.

It was a noble fleet that was ready to receive him—his flag in the Ville de Paris, of 110 guns; two of 100 guns; five of 98; two of 90; one of 80; twenty-nine of 74 guns;—in all, forty sail. Two Admirals with flags at the main, and four Rear-Admirals. His lordship, however, was very speedily given to understand that the proud distinction conferred by the command of such a fleet was not to be unaccompanied with vexation. Immediately after the general salute to the flag, when the admirals and captains repaired to the Ville de Paris, to pay their respects to the new Commander-in-chief—at that moment he was apprized, by the Admiral next to him in command, of the dissatisfaction he felt at being superseded from a command which he considered his "birthright, having always served in the Channel fleet." Lord St. Vincent, out of respect for that Admiral, who was an old acquaintance, took no notice of his ill-timed observation, but contented himself with submitting the circumstance of the encounter to Lord Spencer.

This commencement of a grievance was speedily followed up by an act of indiscretion, which carried with it, unintentionally perhaps, its own correction. One of the captains gave as a toast, at the table of the same Admiral, the second in command, (who, it is said, had the forgetfulness to permit it to be drunk in his presence,) "May the discipline of the Mediterranean never be introduced into the Channel fleet." Lord St. Vincent could not hear of this without its exciting in his mind great surprise and regret. He considered it as a daring attempt to establish a system of insubordination among the principal officers, and to create a feeling of unpopularity in the minds of the inferior officers and men. He saw at once that the emergency had arisen which required something to be done, and done immediately; and he felt that, although his strength was not recovered, he had nerve enough to go through it. "Lord St. Vincent," says Mr. Tucker, "again came forth with the utmost composure, and, before he had even quitted his chair—'Bring me the Mediterranean Order Books, Mr. Tucker;'" and he then directed that every single order tending to enforce the discipline and general good management of the ships, and every regulation imposing those restrictions which had been productive, in the Mediterranean fleet, of such good effect, should be copied and circulated in the Channel fleet. At the same time, he addressed a courteous but firm circular to all admirals and captains, desiring their coöperation. In short, he gave them distinctly to understand, that the stigmatized "discipline of the Mediterranean" was to be introduced and rigidly enforced in the Channel fleet.

So great had been the relaxation of discipline under the late Commander-in-chief, (Lord Bridport, who was mostly absent in town,) that the officers were constantly on shore; many who had families slept on shore; the men, of course, obtained leave in shoals, and the consequence was, and could not be otherwise, immense desertion,—not fewer than seventy or eighty in a single ship. Lord St. Vincent saw that not a moment was to be lost in putting a stop to an evil of such portentous magnitude; and that this could only be done by forbidding the captains and all the officers from sleeping on shore. Desertion ceased; and the order, as if by magic, re-manned the ships. But, "to save his fleet, Lord St. Vincent took upon himself," to use the words of Mr. Tucker, "frowns afloat and maledictions on shore." Of the latter he gives an illustration, by relating that one lady, in full coterie, gave as a bumper toast—"May his next glass of wine choke the wretch!" It may be doubted whether the husband of this virago did not find himself more comfortable afloat than at home.

The fleet encountered a tremendous gale. The Ville de Paris having weathered Ushant, scudded, pitched, and rolled most fearfully. An enormous sea struck her, stove in her stern windows, flooding the Admiral's cabin. As the great three-decker was staggering awfully under the blow, our author tells us—"The Commander-in-chief was on the quarter-deck, sitting in the bight of the main-top-sail, in which a seat to windward had been formed for him; two quarter-masters were stationed beside him, to assist his infirm and aged frame; and from thence he gave his orders to his fleet. When this sea struck the Ville de Paris, it literally deluged the quarter-deck; and, on one of the quarter-masters shaking the water out of his neck, 'Pooh, pooh, man!' said the old Admiral; 'stand still, and do as I do—let it alone—don't you see it will run off you!'"

On returning to the blockade of Brest, means were effectually adopted to keep up a supply of provisions—fresh meat and vegetables—and also of water. The captains were indignant at being compelled to mount guard at the watering-place, to prevent confusion and desertion; and it was proposed to make a representation on the subject. Lord St. Vincent, hearing of this intention, stopped it by intimating to them, that when in command of the Foudroyant he had always taken his turn of this duty; "and that, think or do, write or say, what they might or choose, he was determined that, while he commanded the Channel fleet, his captains should perform their duty."

Lord St. Vincent was never wanting in expedients to convey a well-timed rebuke to an officer, without passing a direct censure upon him; and at the same time in such a way as to make him feel the rebuke more keenly. A certain Rear-Admiral in command of the in-shore squadron, not much liking his position, occasioned his Commander-in-chief some annoyance by frequent complaints about the shoalness of the water so near to the coast. In order to convince the Rear-Admiral how groundless his remonstrances were, he made use of a practical demonstration, by leading the main body of the fleet considerably within him, sailing round him, and standing out again. Very soon afterwards, the Rear-Admiral was "advised to go home and recruit his health."*

Lord St. Vincent caused it to be understood that no captain or commander in his fleet was to be off the quarter-deck or poop when any movement of the ship was made, night or day; and he generally set them his own example. One dark, cold, blowing November night, with much rain, the Secretary having heard the signal ordered for "the fleet to tack in succession," hastened to prevent the Commander-in-chief from going upon deck in such a night, he being unwell. Finding his cot empty, he took up his cloak and ran upon deck. He was not there, and no one had seen him: he had not passed the sentries; the windows were closed; his clothes were on the chair. At last he threw up the gallery window and stepped out; and there, sure enough, at the further end of the gallery was the old Admiral, in his flannel dressing-gown and cocked hat, watching the movements of his fleet. The Secretary put on his cloak, and entreated him to return into the cabin. "Hush, sir, hush," said the Admiral; "I want to see how the evolution is performed in such a night as this, and to know whether Jemmy" (Captain James Vashon, second astern of the flag-ship) "is on deck." This was soon certified by Jemmy's shrill voice giving the usual warning—"Are you all ready forward there?"—"Ay" said the old chief; "that will do;" and then he accompanied the Secretary into the cabin.

Stern disciplinarian as was St. Vincent, and suffering none of his orders and regulations to be disobeyed with impunity, there never was a more considerate, humane, and kind-hearted man, when a deserving object was brought before him. An instance or two may here be mentioned. Mr. Coghlan, in the Viper cutter, captured the Cerbère by a dashing feat of gallantry. Lord St. Vincent, in writing to the Secretary of the Admiralty says—"I did not think the gallantry of Sir Edward Hamilton and Captain Patrick Campbell could have been rivalled, until I read the enclosed letter from Sir Edward Pellew, relating the desperate service performed by acting Lieutenant Coghlan of the Viper cutter, which has filled me with pride and admiration." * * * * "I am persuaded the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will do all in their power to console him under his severe wounds, and make a minute for his promotion the moment he is in a capacity to receive it." They did so; and this promising officer, in the progress of his service, became Sir Jeremiah Coghlan, a post-captain.

But Lord St. Vincent did not stop here; he thus wrote to Lord Spencer:—

"My Dear Lord,

"I shall not trouble your lordship with a word more than is contained in the enclosed private letter from Sir Edward Pellew on the subject of the intrepid Coghlan, except to say (not out of ostentation, but to prevent the city, or any body of merchants, making him a present of the same sort) that I give him a sword of one hundred guineas' value.

"Yours most faithfully,

"ST. VINCENT."

Having occasion to shift his flag into the Royal George, his attention was drawn to a remarkably fine boy, who, as he learned from Captain Domett, wrote in the Secretary's office, and was a nephew of Captain Wilmot, who was promoted by his lordship for his gallant conduct when first lieutenant of the Seahorse, and who afterwards nobly fell in the breach at Acre. He called the boy before him, asked whether his present employment was his own choice, or whether he would prefer a more active life! The boy said his own wish was to be a midshipman; but his friends had no influence, nor means to enable him to join a midshipman's mess. The Secretary was instantly sent for. "Good heavens, Tucker! here is the nephew of poor David Wilmot, a common boy, and his parents cannot afford to clothe him as a petty officer! Do you immediately send into port, and equip him in every respect for the quarter-deck." No sooner said than done; and when the flag returned to the Ville de Paris, the boy was most agreeably surprised to find himself rated a midshipman, with uniforms and a well stored chest. Mr. Tucker need not have apologized to this gallant officer for saying, that his whole life has been one of high credit to his patron; that he has since behaved so gallantly upon every occasion, as to have promoted himself to the honor and rank of a very distinguished post-captain. The apology should have been for concealing his name.

* It appears very unnecessary in Mr. Tucker to suppress his name, as everybody knows it was Rear-Admiral the Honorable G. Berkeley, whose flag was in the Mars.

When Lord St. Vincent promoted Captain Hill to the Megara, the Captain had to pay £50 for necessaries as valued by survey, which he thought were not worth £10. On going on board the flag-ship, the chief accosted him thus: "Hill, Bover says you decline taking his necessaries." "Yes, my lord, they are valued at £50, and not worth £10; I must certainly provide a fresh supply." "But, poor Bover!" replied his lordship, "poor Bover! Hill, you must take them from him." He then ordered his Secretary to draw a check for £100, and give it to the Captain to pay for them, whispering in his ear—"Hill, your father and I were such friends that we once shared the same purse." This was a command admitting of no reply. One day, the ship's company were ordered to bathe. On returning to their duty, Lord St. Vincent observed a favorite seaman in tears, surrounded by a group of his comrades. He called his Secretary and said—"There's my delight, Roger Odell, in tears; go, see what's the matter." It turned out that Roger had jumped off the fore-yard with his trousers on; and had forgotten that all he possessed in the world consisted of bank-notes, in one of the pockets. The water reduced them to a useless pulp. The Admiral went into his cabin, but presently returned, and ordered all hands to be turned up. Odell was summoned, and the Admiral, assuming one of his angry looks, thus addressed him—"Roger Odell, you are convicted, sir, by your own appearance, of tarnishing the British oak with tears! What have you to say!" The poor fellow, overpowered by his distress, could only plead—"That he had lost all he had in the world, that he had been many years saving it, and that he could not help crying a little." The Admiral, still preserving his look of displeasure, said—"The loss of money, sir, can never be an excuse to a British seaman for tears." Then softening down his tones, he proceeded—"Roger Odell, you are one of the best men in this ship; in my life I never saw a man behave better in battle than you, in the Victory, did in the action with the Spanish fleet. To show, therefore, that your Commander-in-chief will never pass over merit wheresoever he may find it—there is your money, sir," (giving him £70)—"but no more tears. mind; no more tears." The poor fellow, holding the notes in his hand, astonished and confused, but becoming sensible of the reality, said, in a hurried manner—"Thank ye, my lord, thank ye!"—and dived down below to conceal a fresh gush of tears of gratitude.

The merits of a commander of a small brig, who, from unavoidable circumstances, had been kept out on a most trying service longer than usual, without starting a difficulty or allowing a murmur to escape him, were not unobserved by Lord St. Vincent; who had been made aware that, with very slender means, he was, by great personal privations, nobly struggling to support a wife and a numerous young family. The brig came in to be repaired, and was found in bad condition. His lordship observed—"If I send him to England now, he'll be paid off, and he has not wherewith to buy a gown for his wife and daughters." He therefore ordered that, when repaired, the brig should receive a complete refit and be well stored—and, to shorten the story, this worthy officer found in the parcel containing his orders for a cruise, £100, to provide for his private outfit.

On opening one of the letters from London brought in the cutter, Lord St. Vincent rang his bell violently for Mr. Tucker, who, on entering, was asked, whether a good dinner for forty or fifty could be managed for that day. Receiving an answer in the affirmative, he ordered signals for the fleet to lie-to, and to invite all the admirals and captains to dine, "for," he added, "the cutter must return this evening." When dinner was ended, he produced the letter, and apologizing for the short notice he had given, said he was anxious to take the earliest opportunity of communicating to them its subject-matter. A Mr. Thompson wrote to inform him, that "he had an establishment at Paddington for the orphan children of seamen who had fallen in their country's service; that it had hitherto been supported by voluntary contribution, but that the funds being nearly exhausted, he was compelled to solicit his lordship for a little assistance." He then reminded them that they all owed their honors, their fortunes, and their rank to the devoted gallantry of the brave men whose children were left destitute orphans. That, as he himself had benefited most by these brave fellows, his own contribution ought to be the largest, but not regarded as any example for others, each giving only what he could without inconvenience afford. The youngest, as is the practice in courts-martial, gave his name for the first contribution; and, when the paper came to Lord St. Vincent, he wrote upon it one thousand pounds. After this well-spent evening, every one left the ship in good humor, pleased with themselves and with the old Commander-in-chief's deportment throughout. The establishment continued to go on under the humane superintendence of Mr. Thompson, till it attracted the attention and support of government, and became, what it now is, the Naval Asylum.

Such was Lord St. Vincent—a stern and rigorous disciplinarian—but one who, on all occasions, showed that he possessed a most kind and generous disposition—ever ready and anxious to relieve distress, and to promote, to the utmost of his power, a friendless and deserving officer.

To the young captains he was indulgent, and always ready to offer them advice. In a letter to — (Mr. Tucker very provokingly and unnecessarily leaves all the names blank.) his lordship says—“You are a young man, and rather over-hasty in applying for an investigation or trial;” and he admonishes him, that the mere sound of court-martial has the same pestilential effects as a suspicion of female chastity.

He was not over-pleased with some of the lords of Admiralty. In a letter to Mr. Nepean, he “desires he will state to Lord Spencer the impossibility of governing a large fleet in times like these, while the subordinate officers are encouraged by patrons of the Admiralty Board, whom I can compare to nothing else but the orators in ancient Rome, who took up the cause of every discontented and factious person who presented himself at the forum.” Again, in writing to the same, he says—“I have no objection to the correspondence of the whole world being conveyed under cover to me, with the exception of that which passes between puisne lords of the Admiralty and subordinates of the fleet under my command.” And he carries his objections into practical effect, by returning a letter to Sir Evan Nepean, saying—“He has forbidden surreptitious correspondence between members of the Board of Admiralty and the officers of the fleet, so derogatory from the discipline and subordination thereof.” This was certainly taking high ground.

In one of his letters, he says—“First Lords of the Admiralty, on their entrance into office, resemble princes, are surrounded by flatterers, and seldom learn the true character of their subordinates. I have, to the utmost of my power, endeavored to put Lord Spencer in possession of every knowledge I have of men and things; and I have gone further with him than I ever did with any other man in office.” Little did the noble lord dream, when he penned this sentence, that he was himself on the threshold of that envied station of “princes;” but so it was. On the dissolution of Mr. Pitt's government, Mr. Addington, who succeeded him, communicated to Lord St. Vincent the king's command, that the appointment of first Lord of the Admiralty should be offered to him—a proposal which his lordship did not hesitate to entertain, having no objection to join the administration of “all the talents.” What he said to the king, and what the king said to him, Mr. Tucker no doubt found recorded among his father's papers. He told the king “that he should make but a bad return for all the honors and favors which his majesty had most graciously bestowed upon him, and very ill discharge his duty, if he did not frankly and honestly tell his majesty, that, having served nearly half a century with the Roman Catholics, and seen them tried in all situations, it was his decided and conscientious opinion that they were entitled to be placed upon the same footing in every respect as his majesty's Protestant subjects.” And more to this effect, adding—“That having discharged this duty to his majesty and to himself, he would also add, that his life and his utmost services were at his majesty's disposal, and that he was ready to return to the fleet, or to serve his majesty on shore, or to retire into private life, as his majesty might think proper to command.” When he had finished, the king replied—“Lord St. Vincent, you have in this instance, as you have in every other, behaved like an honest, honorable man. Upon the question of Catholic emancipation, my mind is made up, from which I never (with great energy) will depart; and therefore, as it is not likely that it will be a matter agitated or discussed between us, I can see no reason why you should not take the Admiralty, where I very much wish to see you, and to place the navy entirely in your hands.”

Thus was the lofty-minded and uncompromising Whig, for once in his life, thrown amongst a combination of Whigs and Tories. Mr. Grey's motion on the state of the nation, and Mr. Fox's denunciation of the inefficiency of Mr. Addington and his colleagues, must have been rather awkward; but then from the latter was excepted the first Lord of the Admiralty. “I do not think,” said Fox, “it would be easy, if possible, to find a man in the whole community better suited or more capable of the high office he fills, than the distinguished person at the head of the Admiralty—I mean the Earl St. Vincent.” Thus, it appears, that notwithstanding all the handsome things said of him, Lord St. Vincent was early convinced that “first Lords of the Admiralty, on entrance into office, do not exactly resemble princes, nor are they surrounded by flatterers, even among some of their own friends, as he experienced on his first entrance, and also in the sequel.” He soon, in fact, discovered what his new position really was; that it was by no means an easy one, but, on the contrary, one that required great temper and circumspection, to avoid giving umbrage to the multitude of applicants of all descriptions. Some of the duties and qualifications of the first Lords are thus stated by one who has had considerable experience: “He should possess a sound judgment and great discretion—a patient and placid temper—a courteous deportment and civil demeanor to all—an easy access to officers of every rank—and a ready and obliging acknowledgment of all applications addressed to him in writing; for a kind manner of receiving and replying to them, personally, or by letter, goes a great way towards softening the bitter pangs of disappointment, the unavoidable result of a non-compliance with what is requested.*

How far Lord St. Vincent's demeanor corresponded with this, in his reception of officers, we have no means of knowing; but his letters of refusal are generally expressed in courteous terms, and with much tact. His Board, however, was certainly unpopular in the naval service, both ashore and afloat; more so, it would appear, from the temper of the two professional lords, (the other three being ciphers,) than from any conduct of his own. With Sir Thomas Troubridge he had no acquaintance but what was gained from their professional intercourse in the Mediterranean; but he very soon proved his eminent qualities, and the beautiful description he gave of them fully warranted his nomination as senior or advising lord of the Chief—"He is the ablest adviser, and best executive officer in the British navy, with honor and courage bright as his sword." Of Markham he could not have known much professionally, but speaks highly of him. "Lord St. Vincent," Mr. Marsden says, "during the course of his naval administration, behaved to me with uniform attention and politeness; but my colleague, Nepean, could not say the same thing, although he had been an old connexion (follower, as the naval term is) of Sir John Jervis, and had taken a zealous part with the minister in negotiating for him the rank of 'earl,' instead of 'viscount,' as was intended after his victory of 14th of February. My colleague," he adds, "having long found his official situation irksome, in consequence of the footing on which he stood with some of the members of the Board, obtained from Mr. Addington the appointment of Chief Secretary in Ireland, with the rank of baronet."† Mr. Marsden succeeded Nepean, though he at first declined the secretaryship; and, he says, opened his mind to Lord St. Vincent. He told him he was convinced, from experience, of the tempers, ideas, and conduct of the professional members of the Board, (Troubridge and Markham,) that he could not carry on the public business with them, with the least chance of satisfaction to his own feelings;‡ and he frankly expressed to his lordship his conviction, that it was not in his lordship's power to remedy it, as he could not change their natures, or do without them.§ Marsden contrived, however, to keep on good terms with them, though Nepean could not.

Lord St. Vincent soon discovered that the Admiralty presented no "bed of roses" to repose upon.

* Sir John Barrow's Life of Earl Howe.

† Brief Memoir of the Life and Writings of Mr. Marsden, written by himself, and printed by his widow.

‡ Ibidem.

§ Marsden's Memoirs.

It was not a situation he had sought, or one that he ever appeared anxious to retain. Perhaps he did not find himself actually suited for it. "What sort of figure I shall make," he writes to Lord Keith, "will be seen. I have known many a good admiral make a wretched first Lord of the Admiralty. I will, however, support the Commander-in-chief upon all occasions, and prohibit any intrigue against them in this office." He had long conceived a most unfavorable opinion of the Navy Board, and of the abuses committed in the dockyards. "I hope," he says to Mr. Thomas Grenville, "you will be able to brush these spiders from the Navy Board." This, if meant personally to the members of the board, is too strongly expressed; the system undoubtedly was bad, but there were among the Commissioners many excellent, intelligent, and honest men. Need we mention the name of Sir Andrew Hammond, or of Admiral Sir Byam Martin, than whom a better officer or a more correct man does not exist?

Whether Lord St. Vincent was, in this respect, right or wrong, he had scarcely got into his seat when he determined to probe the alleged abuses to the quick; and for this purpose he brought before the Cabinet the plan of a searching investigation, by means of a commission, which he named "The Commission of Naval Inquiry," but which his opponents called the "Naval Inquisition." Mr. Addington from the first opposed it, and then rejected it altogether. His lordship, however, was firm, and declared, "No power short of what I demand can search such abuses as I denounce; and no honest or faithful servant can have aught to fear;" and he made it the sine qua non of his remaining in the Cabinet. They at length yielded, and the "Commission of Naval Inquiry," with certain modifications, was instituted by act of Parliament. Mr. Secretary Tucker dined with Lord St. Vincent the day it had been submitted to the Cabinet; when the dinner party was breaking up, Lord St. Vincent said, "Tucker, stay!" and then added, "Excepting my Lord Chancellor, the whole Cabinet has mutinied to-day. My commission is rejected; but," bending his fist, while his countenance personified his invincible firmness, "we'll read them a lesson out of the articles of war to-morrow, sir!" He then declared that he would not again sit on the ministerial bench in the House of Lords till he had carried his point.

Fourteen or fifteen large folio volumes being published at the time, it was hardly necessary or expedient for our biographers to go into lengthened details of a measure productive of little or no interest or importance, unless a harassing and expensive state prosecution of the late Lord Melville may have been so considered; which, though it failed of conviction, yet succeeded in utterly destroying his utility as a statesman, while it deprived Mr. Pitt of an able coadjutor.

The next step taken by his lordship was a per-annual visitation, by himself and his Board, to the dockyards; the main object being, as Marsden says, "to find grounds for delinquencies presumed in the first instance."—"At Deptford," he says, "we experienced much abuse from the enraged families of the workmen discharged, or reduced in their allowances, and with some difficulty escaped from worse treatment." In point of fact they did not escape; for we know, from the same authority, that the whole Board was pelted along the street of Deptford with mud and stones, from the moment they passed the dock gates.

No murmurs were heard at the visitation of Plymouth dock-yard. The mutinous spirit of the shipwrights there he had previously subdued. They had sent up to the Admiralty a set of delegates, (a name synonymous, in his lordship's opinion, with rebels or mutineers,) who were expected to extort from the Board, just then pressed for an increase of ships, a compliance with several exorbitant demands—such as Lord St. Vincent denounced as not merely remonstrances, but insubordination, which he determined, with his usual firmness, at once to punish. These gentlemen delegates were thunderstruck on being informed that the Board had ordered they should be turned out of the Admiralty yard into the street, and that every man of them was discharged from the service.

But these proceedings, however expedient, must have been most annoying to Lord St. Vincent, and must have proved to him how very unlike "princes" were first Lords of the Admiralty. All the naval departments, from the Navy Board (the highest) to the lowest, were in hostility to his Board; and it was not appeased by the Earl's appointing his private Secretary a commissioner of the navy, with a seat at the board in Somerset House—a very proper appointment of a fit and able man, had it proceeded from any other quarter.

The Board was much censured by the public for the kind of preparation made against the threatened invasion of England from Boulogne, and for appointing that "bravest of the brave," Nelson, to the command of a service so unworthy of him;—for establishing the sea fencibles; building Martello towers; sinking stone vessels, &c.; and Mr. Pitt brought forward, in the House of Commons, various charges of mismanagement in the naval service. His motion was negatived; but Mr. Addington's administration had become so unpopular, that the Whigs united with Mr. Pitt against it; and Mr. Fox's motion on the national defence being lost only by a small minority, Mr. Addington's Cabinet resigned.

On the whole, Lord St. Vincent's administration was not popular. We are strongly disposed to believe that it was mainly owing to two circumstances;—the one an honest and ardent desire to put an end to those gross and avowed abuses, which pervaded the whole civil departments of the naval service—an attempt which brought upon him a violent hostility, not only from the parties themselves, but from their friends and connexions; the other, a decided dislike of a great portion of the naval officers to the managing officers of his Board. Lord Howick (Earl Grey) had the same feelings with Lord St. Vincent as to the naval department; but his short stay at the head of the Admiralty did not permit him to enter upon any efficient steps for a reformation. He did not, however, forget the lesson he had learned at the Admiralty, or the principles inculcated by Lord St. Vincent; and from the moment (as Lord Grey) he became Prime Minister, his first instruction to Sir James Graham, as first Lord of the Admiralty, was to take immediate steps for an act of Parliament to cancel the Patents of every Commissioner of the Navy, both at Somerset House and at the ports, whether at home or abroad. Thus, as appears by the Imperial Calendar, twenty-seven Commissioners of the Navy, Victualling, and Transport Boards, were deprived of their Patents on the same day; of whom nine belonged to the Navy Board, and seven to the Victualling and other departments: and in lieu of those sixteen, were substituted five responsible officers, one to each of the five departments into which the new establishment was divided—the Surveyor, the Accountant-General, the Comptroller of Victualling, the Storekeeper, and the Inspector of Hospitals and Fleets—and each of these was under the supervision of a Lord of the Admiralty. Eight or nine superintendents at the ports supply the remainder of the twenty-seven.

This new system, we believe, works well, though at first it met with a determined opposition. It is now twelve years since it was established, and we are not aware that any changes have been found necessary in the plan, though a succession of Whigs and Tories have formed the several Boards of Admiralty; but we may observe that, whether it works well or ill, Lord St. Vincent was, in fact, the primum mobile that impelled Lord Grey to adopt it, and Sir James Graham boldly and manfully to carry it into execution.

We have thought it necessary to enter briefly into this discussion as part and parcel, or, at any rate, the result, of Lord St. Vincent's administration of the navy. The space we have allotted for this article will not admit of transcribing any portion of his very voluminous correspondence. Suffice it to say, that it was always to the point in question—briefly and clearly expressed, and free from all ambiguity. When obliged to refuse a request, it was generally couched in kind and courteous terms, whether his refusals were addressed to the princes of the royal family, the first nobles of the land, or to a poor lieutenant.

On the death of Mr. Pitt, and the accession of Lord Grenville as Prime Minister in 1806, and Lord Grey as first Lord of the Admiralty, Lord St. Vincent a second time accepted the command of the Channel fleet; and being promoted to the high rank of Admiral of the fleet, he hoisted the Union flag at the main in the Hibernia. Just then intelligence arrived of the renowned victory of Trafalgar; on which occasion the old Earl wrote thus to the Secretary;—"Lord Collingwood has done himself immortal honor by his conclusion of the battle, which Nelson so nobly began. Writing to you privately, I suppose I may confess that I do feel a pride in this great victory beyond the general enthusiasm. I was prepared for everything great from Nelson, but not for his loss." No wonder that the news of this immortal achievement, and of the loss of the unsurpassable hero by whose sublime genius it had been planned, and who had hailed him as "the father" of a numerous contemporary group of England's most illustrious seamen, should have occasioned a glow of enthusiasm, attempered with a severe pang to a nature which, though strong and stern, was yet as tender and feeling as it was warmly patriotic!

About this time Lisbon was threatened with the presence of a French army; on which it was deemed expedient to send an embassy to negotiate with the house of Braganza, supported by a strong squadron and a large body of troops, which were immediately to be despatched to the Tagus. Lord St. Vincent was nominated for this service, as being considered the most fit for such an occasion. The object was to defend the country, if that should be found practicable; if not, and the Court should resolve to remove itself with the ships, forces, and stores to the Brazils, in either case his lordship was to lend his coöperation. The storm, however, did not break over Portugal quite so soon as was anticipated; and before the end of the year Lord St. Vincent was ordered to resume his command before Brest.

Almost immediately after this, Mr. Fox died, and Mr. Thomas Grenville took the place of Lord Howick (Earl Grey) in the Admiralty, where he remained only a few months; George III. being anxious to get rid of a ministry, "many of whom," says Mr. Tucker, "he personally disliked, and the political principles of whom he detested." On the change of administration, Lord St. Vincent immediately resigned his command; and was ordered to strike his flag and come on shore—an order "to which," as he wrote to his Secretary, "he meant to be very prompt in paying obedience."

During this short command we see little to call for any remark. There is, however, an observation his lordship makes in a letter to his former Secretary, who was now the second Secretary to the Admiralty, which rather surprised us. "I pity," he says, "the exposure of the weakness of some of your 'lords, whose dulness I have long been acquainted with.' Now these weak and dull lords were his old colleague, John Markham, and the other naval lords were Sir Charles Pole and Sir Harry Neale. In another letter to Lord Howick he thus expresses himself—"I am sorry to say there are few flags at the main or the fore I have any respect for;" and farther—"If you will, my good lord, bring a bill into Parliament to disqualify any officer under the rank of Rear-Admiral to sit in the House of Commons, the Navy may be preserved; but while a little, drunken, worthless, jackanapes is permitted to hold the seditious language he has done, in the presence of flag-officers of rank, you will require a man of greater health and vigor than I possess to command your fleets."

In answer to another letter of Lord Howick, who had asked his opinion of Clerk's system of Naval Tactics, he says—"If it had any merit in the battles of the 1st June, of Camperdown, and Trafalgar, that fought off Cape St. Vincent is totally out of the question." That Lord Rodney passed through the enemy's line by accident, not by design—that Lord Howe's attack upon the fleet of the enemy was at variance with the tactics of Mr. Clerk—that Lord Duncan's action was fought pell-mell, without plan or system—that the attack of Aboukir furnishes no argument for, or against, these tactics—"that a fleet to windward bearing down at right angles upon the fleet of an enemy must be crippled, if not totally disabled, before it can reach the enemy," (Clerk's position,) "has been disproved by the more recent action, under Lord Nelson, bearing down in two columns at Trafalgar." He adds—"Mr. Clerk is more correct in his statement of the advantages to be derived from being to leeward of the fleet of the enemy." On the whole, he admits that the work is ingenious, and worthy the study of all young and inexperienced officers; adding, however, that he perceives signs of compilation from Père le Hoste down to Viscount de Grenier. The question as to the originality and merits of our distinguished countryman's system, we have long since fully discussed; and shall only now add, as we are bound in fairness to do, that the later tendencies of opinion are rather adverse to that which we upheld.

Lord St. Vincent having now struck his flag for the last time, received a summons to a private audience of the king. After a few preliminaries, the king said—

"Well, Lord St. Vincent, you have now quitted active service, as you say, forever—tell me, do you think the naval service is better or worse than when you first entered it?"

"Lord St. Vincent. 'Very much worse, please your majesty.'

"The King, (quickly.) 'How so, how so?'"

"Lord St. Vincent. 'Sire, I have always thought that a sprinkling of nobility was very desirable in the navy, as it gives some sort of consequence to the service; but at present the navy is so overrun by the younger branches of nobility, and the sons of members of Parliament, and they so swallow up all the patronage, and so choke the channel to promotion, that the son of an old officer, however meritorious his services may have been, has little or no chance of getting on.'

"The King. 'Pray, who was serving captain of the fleet under your lordship?'"

"Lord St. Vincent. 'Rear-admiral Osborne, sire.'

"The King. 'Osborne, Osborne! I think there are more than one of that name admirals.'

"Lord St. Vincent. 'Yes, sire, there are three brothers, all admirals.'

"The King. 'That's pretty well for democracy, I think.'"

How cleverly and adroitly was the fact as to the Osbornes drawn forth by the king! The old lord proceeded to explain it in detail, and ended thus:—

"'Sire, I hope your majesty will pardon me for saying, I would rather promote the son of an old deserving officer than of any noble in the land.' The king mused for a minute or two, and then said—'I think you are right, Lord St. Vincent—quite right.'"

Lord St. Vincent now retired into private life, bearing with him, as Sheridan happily said, "a triple laurel—over the enemy, the mutineer, and the corrupt." The state of his health did not allow him to reside long at his house in London, and his small retreat of Rochetts, therefore, became his principal abode; but he occasionally came up to attend the House of Lords, and sometimes, on particular subjects, he spoke, and with biting severity.

He opposed Lord Grenville's bill for the abolition of the slave trade. He doubted the humanity of the measure, as "from his own experience he was enabled to state that the West Indies was paradise itself to the negroes compared with their native country;" and he could only account for the noble proposer bringing it forward "by supposing that some obi-man had cast his spell upon him." He was a steady advocate for Catholic Emancipation. "God forbid," he said, "that any the smallest alteration should be made in the bill to enable the Catholics to serve in the navy and army;" and he expressed his indignation on hearing that Sir John Cox Hoppesley had gone to the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle to obtain a decree for the extinction of the Jesuits;—an order to whom we were obliged, not only "for the most useful learning and discoveries of every description, and necessary for the instruction of the Catholic youth throughout the civilized world." With the same feeling of toleration and liberality, he is said to have subscribed £100 towards building a chapel for the Jews, and also to their hospital.

It appears, indeed, that he was generous and charitable, even to profusion; of which several marked instances have been mentioned in the course of our remarks. But he had no commiseration for the exigencies of a spendthrift; and a gambler was his detestation. To an officer who had contracted debt, he says—"Having fought my way up to where I now stand, without the smallest pecuniary aid from any one, even when I was a mid., I cannot possibly entertain an opinion that officers of this day, whose half-pay is considerably more than formerly, cannot practise the same necessary economy which marked the character of mine." His lordship, in the plenitude of his pecuniary circumstances, never lost sight of a prudent economy; but his generosity was liberally and extensively manifested. "The charity to the poor," says Mr. Tucker, "from Lord St. Vincent's establishment, was equal to that of any mansion in England; and the delightful drives with him to inspect the erection of the cottages he built for some industrious laborers, can never be forgotten." Throughout his whole command, indeed, we constantly meet with instances of his generosity. "Let but a case of real misfortune be brought before him, especially of an officer who had deserved well, and whose necessity was not occasioned by his own imprudence, it would be sure to meet relief, promptly, liberally, and with an exquisite delicacy of feeling still more admirable." There can be no greater or more exalted praise! A private soldier at Gibraltar fell into a deep pit, so filled with mud, and exhaling noxious vapors, that no one would venture down to help him. One Joaquim, who had been boatswain of Nelson's ship, and now in the dockyard, let himself down by a rope, and rescued the poor fellow. Lord St. Vincent presented his deliverer with a piece of plate, value £28, with this inscription—"For preserving a soldier's life at the risk of his own." Hearing by chance that poor Dibdin, to whose happy genius such excellent nautical songs are due, was in distressed circumstances, Lord St. Vincent immediately sent him £100, and desired an enquiry into the real state of his case to be made; "for it would indeed be a shame, Mr. Tucker," he said, "that the man who has whiled away the mid-watch, and softened the hardships of war, should be in need, while a seaman enjoys an abundance." What a tribute to the muse of Dibdin, and how noble, generous, and kindly the sentiment which it embodies!

Never, indeed, was there a more compassionate or a more kind-hearted man than Lord St. Vincent. A domestic affliction had greatly depressed his old confidential Secretary's health and spirits. To divert his thoughts, and with no other motive, his lordship said to him that he had long wished to visit the Scilly islands to look at a spot for a lighthouse, and also Cornwall to enquire into the rapid deterioration of copper, and he desired the Secretary's attendance at these inspections; and his humane and now aged chief actually took that long and fatiguing journey ostensibly with these objects, but really to assuage the grief of an old and attached servant.

The loss of Sir Thomas Troubridge sank deeply into his heart. In a postscript to a letter are these words—"Oh, Blenheim! Blenheim! where are you?" After the receipt of every letter he would exclaim—"Where is the Blenheim? What can have become of the Blenheim? I shall never see Troubridge's like again." He called him "the Bayard of the British navy." Google

In 1816, when in his eighty-first year, Lady St. Vincent died. On her monument, by Chantry, in the church of Stone, is the following short but classically simple inscription, by his lordship:—

“Sacred to the memory of MARTHA, COUNTESS ST. VINCENT, who was eminently pious, virtuous, and charitable.”

Her age is not given, but she could not be much less than seventy. No mention is made of her domestic life. It is only stated that she was a lady of kindly feelings; that the state of her health had made her very infirm; and that, as a wife, her adoration of her lord was very ardent. They lived together thirty-four years.

In answer to a note from Captain Tower, accompanied by a bust of Napoleon, in which the Captain says—“I feel a gratification in presenting it to one who knows how to respect a great and fallen enemy,” Lord St. Vincent replies—“You do me justice in attributing the feelings you so well describe to my character; and I blush for those who trample upon a man many of them feared, and all allowed, in the career of his military glory, to be an astonishing character.” And shortly before his death he took occasion to observe—“That it had often been a matter of satisfaction to him, that Bonaparte saw such specimens of our naval officers as Sir Henry Hotham, Sir George Cockburn, and Sir Frederic Maitland.” When reminded that they all had risen from his own school—“No,” he nobly replied, “that is too much. They would have been as great anywhere; it was with such men that I formed a school.”

He was much pleased when the present Lord Melville appointed him General of Marines; and took this opportunity, as he had done on a former occasion, of testifying his sense “of the justice which Lord Melville did to the services of sea-officers”—a compliment most justly due to every part of the administration of that amiable and excellent nobleman, who came into office and left it, twice as first Lord of the Admiralty, with an unblemished reputation.

Lord St. Vincent's great desire, in the declining years of his life, plainly for the sake of his profession, was the Garter. He cherished a hope of it, Mr. Tucker says, to the day of his death, frequently observing, “that when so many were worn by the soldiers, the sailors should at least have one; that surely England's naval merit must be equal to that; and that the navy never should be without one.” When the Prince Regent increased the order of the Bath, and created Knights' Grand Crosses, his lordship said, he “did not care whose name they placed on the list, if they had only done him the favor to strike his out; that when he was created a K. B., it was an honorable distinction; but that now he saw names on the list which he thought disgraced it, and all classes with them.” The Duke of Wellington, according to Colonel Gurwood, was pretty much of the same opinion as regarded the army.

In 1818, then in his eighty-third year, the decay of his health was so perceptible, and his cough so distressing, that he was advised to winter in a milder climate. Captain and Miss Brenton, and a medical attendant, accompanied him to the south of France. Every honorable reception and attention were paid to him in passing through France. He continued at Hyeres until the spring of 1819, and then returned. An anecdote is told by Mr. Tucker, which the writer of this article heard from the noble Earl himself, at his own table at Rochetts. He had been walking in his grounds, and looking at a green-house then building, when his bailiff suggested that a venerable old oak should be felled, as it was rapidly decaying. “I command you to do no such thing,” said his lordship; “that tree and I have long been contemporaries; we have flourished together, and together we will fall.” He was then exceedingly cheerful and agreeable, but occasionally distressed with his cough; yet even at this time, Miss Brenton, who remained in the house, said he came down stairs about five every morning.

In 1821, Lord Melville appointed him to the rank of Admiral of the Fleet; and shortly afterwards the King honored him with a naval baton, accompanied by an expression of “his Majesty's warmest regards, as a testimony of his Majesty's personal esteem, and of the high sense he entertained of the eminent services which his lordship has rendered to his country, by his distinguished talents and brilliant achievements.”

When George IV. was about to embark on his visit to Scotland, Lord St. Vincent proceeded to Greenwich, and slept at the house of Sir George Keats, governor of the hospital, in order to pay his respects to his Majesty on board his own yacht. Long before six in the morning, the old Earl was seen on the terrace with four old pensioners, who had served under him, walking in his wake, and in frequent conversation with them. Their only object was an interview with their old Commander-in-chief, now in his eighty-eighth year. On his return to breakfast he appeared in more than usual spirits, related the interview, and said, “We all in our day were smart fellows.” On this occasion he wore, for the first time, the repudiated Star of the Grand Cross of the Bath, that of the Knights Commanders being usually worn by him. It is stated, as a trait of his kind attention to children, that one day being asked by a child what that star was, and where he found it—“I found it,” he replied, “upon the sea; and if you become a sailor, and search diligently, perhaps you may find just such another.” The interview with his Majesty was long and gracious; it was also the last time that his lordship was on the water, and the last officer who, on duty, had the honor of attending him, was the present Commander M'Clintock, whose arm assisted his lordship's tottering step on shore from the boat; and then taking off his hat to the youthful midshipman, "Thank ye, sir—thank ye!" said the old Admiral, in his last adieu to the naval service.

From this day, August, 1822, to March, 1823, Lord St. Vincent's robust frame was approaching its last functions; old age, debility, and convulsive fits of coughing had all but worn it out. Yet, on the 13th of that month, while the hand of death was just upon him, he was still alive to the great passing events of the day; and about eight in the evening, after lying in silent exhaustion for two hours, he departed without a sigh or a groan, in the presence of his affectionate friends, Sir George Grey, Doctor Baird, and his faithful old Secretary. It is stated he did not die wealthy. He was succeeded in the Peerage by his nephew, Mr. Edward Jervis Ricketts, inheriting the Viscounty only. His remains were interred at Stone in Staffordshire, quite privately, as his will directed. A public monument is erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral.

We shall here extract Mr. Tucker's synopsis of the Earl's public character and services:—

"To the ardent admirers of the great Admiral, nothing could be more easy or gratifying than to eulogize his naval career, which would not be more glowing than just. To repeat his inexhaustible expedients to overcome difficulties; the reformation, the instruction, the rapid advance of his school; the spirit which he infused of enterprise; the omnipresence which he enforced of obedience; the perfect discipline of his energetic command; the distinguished officers whom he educated; the boldness with which he attacked and defeated an enemy's fleet nearly doubling his own in numbers; the grandeur of his conduct in the mutiny; the wonderful skill with which he drew forth the powers and resources of all ranks of subordinates, and then combined them to work together for the country; his fearless opposition to injurious prejudices and usages of however long standing, however high abode; and, what crowns his course, the ulterior and lasting excellences which have emanated from his system—on all this it would be delightful to indulge."

To this not very felicitous summary, we may add a few words, though we have already touched on most of the transactions in which, throughout his public life, he bore a principal part. It cannot be supposed that, during his long and active career, Lord St. Vincent escaped censure;—proceeding mostly, however, from those civil servants of the naval department whose irregularities—to call them by no harsher name—had provoked his ire, and induced him to the adoption of measures for their correction, which seriously affected the reputation of some, and the interests of many. Neither can it be expected that he passed through the various stages of public life altogether free of blame. But if he had faults, they were so much neutralized by great and eminent virtues—charity, generosity, and magnanimity—as to prevent their assuming any general or prominent character. Nor was there in his disposition anything sullen or morose, whatever the provocation might be. His anger was never smothered, but readily appeased by giving it full vent. He was undoubtedly severe; but the occasions which called for its exercise fully justified it. These were chiefly two. The first, his prompt measures for the complete extinction of the mutiny in the fleet before Cadiz, augmented as it frequently was by mutinous ships sent to him from England. What the consequences must have been of an organized mutiny in a fleet close to an enemy's port, on a foreign station, cannot be unknown to any, and is fearful to contemplate; but by a stern and uncompromising severity—if sending the criminals to immediate execution, after a legal conviction, can be so called—he saved the fleet, and rescued the country from the dreadful recurrence of a second general mutiny, the first of which had recently, but imperfectly, been subdued at home. The second instance was, his conduct to the officers of the Channel fleet. Here, too, he was not only fully justified, but imperatively called upon, to put in force a rigid system of discipline, which had been unaccountably neglected. On taking the command of this fleet, he found an extraordinary laxity of duty, and disregard of all discipline;—the captains sleeping on shore; boats constantly employed for them; the men deserting by hundreds; the Commander-in-chief very much in London; the other flag-officers, good easy men, letting things go on quietly; and all this while the fleet was supposed to be watching that of the enemy, ready to start from Brest! What a difference of conduct must the Admiral have here found, from that of the active and gallant officers he had been accustomed to command in the Mediterranean, where mutual affection and respect prevailed. But he soon brought these other officers to a sense of their duty and obedience;—by rigid and decisive measures at first, and by subsequent indulgences to all whom he found deserving of them. He thus succeeded in converting their displeasure into regard and good-will. In fact, they soon discovered that, whatever discomfort the exigencies of the service demanded from them, their Commander-in-chief was the first to make the sacrifice and show the example.

The liberality of his political opinions was another fault with many; but though a decided Whig in principle, his political feelings and opinions were displayed only in Parliament, or on public occasions. On service he never suffered them to appear. Throughout the whole course of his professional career, his conduct proved him to be far removed from the influence of party considerations. In the multitude of applications which he received for promotions, from princes of the blood, the highest nobles, and members of Parliament, of his own party, he invariably told them, as appears from his own Letters,* that deserving young men, who were sons of old and meritorious officers, always had, and always should continue to have, the first claim on his patronage. In this and all other respects, he was not more steady to his purpose than prompt in decision.

Of great mental and bodily powers, he was never disconcerted by difficulties, and never deficient in means to overcome them. His vigilance was extreme. Nothing passed in the fleet without his observation; and he is described to have had an eye so quick and piercing, that it was often said he appeared to look through one. On shore he was cheerful, lively, and fond of a joke. The account of his calling up Captain Darby at Gibraltar, and detaining him at a bedroom window to listen to a pretended dream he had just awakened from, is more like a story in a novel than an incident of real life, (Tucker, vol. i., 371.) With children he was always playful, though he had none of his own. The two portraits in Mr. Tucker's volumes are good; that given by Captain Brenton is a perfect satyr—a Silenus. In his countenance was a strong expression of intelligence; in his figure, and manners, and speech, he was the picture of a true Englishman.

We have little to say generally on Mr. Tucker's volumes. Though he had every motive to paint the character and conduct of Lord St. Vincent, as regards the public service of the State, in the brightest colors, we must do him the justice to say, that the portrait he has drawn appears to be a faithful and accurate likeness, free from flattery and exaggeration. But, throughout the work, the execution is far from faultless. In point of taste, correctness of construction, and purity of expression, it is eminently defective. His long sentences are sometimes so involved, inflated, and inverted, as not easily to be intelligible. In this latter particular we have seldom, indeed, seen a work so obnoxious to censure. In the use made of the Earl's letters, there is an utter want of literary resource. Had one half of the six hundred he has given been omitted, and the other half dovetailed into the narrative, instead of being huddled together at the end of each chapter, it would have been a great improvement, and a relief to the reader. Every name almost, in these letters, is a blank; in most cases unnecessarily so. These great blemishes and faults will, we hope, be at least partly removed, should another edition be called for.

* In one to Mrs. Montague, who had solicited the promotion of —, he says "The officers of the Ville de Paris remain as they did when I left her; and my own nephew, commander of the Stork sloop, who is respected as an officer of uncommon merit and acquisitions, stands as he did before I came into office; and I have refused to promote at the request of four princes of the blood."—These were, the Prince of Wales, and the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, and Cumberland.

From Chambers' Cyclopædia.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOW—JOSHUA SYLVESTER
—RICHARD BARNFIELD.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOW, so highly eminent as a dramatic writer, would probably have been overlooked in the department of miscellaneous poetry, but for his beautiful piece, rendered familiar by its being transferred into Walton's "Angler,"—The Passionate Shepherd to his Love. JOSHUA SYLVESTER, who died in 1618, at the age of fifty-five, and who was the author of a large volume of poems of very unequal merit, claims notice as the now generally received author of an impressive piece, long ascribed to Raleigh—The Soul's Errand. Another fugitive poem of great beauty, but in a different style, and which has often been attributed to Shakspeare, is now given to RICHARD BARNFIELD, author of several poetical volumes published between 1594 and 1598. These three remarkable poems are here subjoined:

The Passionate Shepherd to his Love.

COME live with me, and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That valleys, groves, and hills and fields,
Woods or steepy mountains yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses,
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers and a kirtle,
Embroider'd all with leaves of myrtle:

A gown made of the finest wool,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold:

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs;
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swain shall dance and sing,
For thy delight, each May-morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

The Nymph's Reply to the Passionate Shepherd.
By Raleigh.

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold;
And Philomel becometh dumb,
The rest complain of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields;
A honey tongue—a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten,
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs;
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joys no date, nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

The Soul's Errand.

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand!
Fear not to touch the best,
The truth shall be thy warrant;
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.

Go, tell the court it glows,
And shines like rotten wood;
Go, tell the church it shows
What's good, and doth no good:
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates, they live
Acting by others actions,
Not loved unless they give,
Not strong but by their factions.
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition,
That rule affairs of state,
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it most,
They beg for more by spending,
Who in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending.
And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it lacks devotion,
Tell love it is but lust,
Tell time it is but motion,
Tell flesh it is but dust;
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth,
Tell honor how it alters,

Tell beauty how she blasteth,
Tell favor how she falters.
And as they shall reply,
Give every one the lie.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickle points of niceness:
Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in over-wisness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic of her boldness,
Tell skill it is pretension,
Tell charity of coldness,
Tell law it is contention.
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness,
Tell nature of decay,
Tell friendship of unkindness,
Tell justice of delay.
And if they will reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts they have no soundness,
But vary by esteeming,
Tell schools they want profoundness,
And stand too much on seeming.
If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city,
Tell how the country erreth,
Tell, manhood shakes off pity,
Tell, virtue least preferreth.
And if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

So, when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing;
Although to give the lie
Deserves no less than stabbing;
Yet stab at thee who will,
No stab the soul can kill.

Address to the Nightingale.

As it fell upon a day,
In the merry month of May,
Sitting in a pleasant shade
Which a grove of myrtles made;
Beasts did leap, and birds did sing,
Trees did grow, and plants did spring;
Everything did banish moan,
Save the nightingale alone.
She, poor bird, as all forlorn,
Leaned her breast up-till a thorn;
And there sung the dolefull' st ditty,
That to hear it was great pity.
Fie, fie, fie, now would she cry;
Teru, teru, by and by;
That, to hear her so complain,
Scarce I could from tears refrain;

For her griefs, so lively shown,
 Made me think upon my own.
 Ah! (thought I,) thou mourn'st in vain;
 None takes pity on thy pain:
 Senseless trees, they cannot hear thee,
 Ruthless bears, they will not cheer thee:
 King Pandion he is dead;
 All thy friends are lapp'd in lead;
 All thy fellow-birds do sing,
 Careless of thy sorrowing!
 Whilst as fickle Fortune smiled,
 Thou and I were both beguiled.
 Every one that flatters thee
 Is no friend in misery.
 Words are easy, like the wind;
 Faithful friends are hard to find.
 Every man will be thy friend
 Whilst thou hast wherewith to spend;
 But, if store of crowns be scant,
 No man will supply thy want.
 If that one be prodigal,
 Bountiful they will him call;
 And with such-like flattering,
 "Pity but he were a king."
 If he be addict to vice,
 Quickly him they will entice;
 But if fortune once do frown,
 Then farewell his great renown:
 They that fawned on him before
 Use his company no more.
 He that is thy friend indeed,
 He will help thee in thy need;
 If thou sorrow, he will weep,
 If thou wake he cannot sleep:
 Thus, of every grief in heart,
 He with thee doth bear a part.
 These are certain signs to know
 Faithful friend from flattering foe.

KING OF PRUSSIA.

It may arise from his besetting uncharitableness of heart, but Punch was never in love with the King of Prussia. When his majesty, under the auspices of good Mrs. Fry, went to Newgate, and when in the female prisoners' ward, his pious majesty dropped upon his knees and prayed, we thought the King of Prussia, as the lawyers say, proved too much. The humility, if true, was too good to last. And so it has proved; for though his majesty was so very good a Christian whilst in Newgate, he can, it appears, play the NICHOLAS in little on the Prussian throne. Sweet and touching is it to contemplate a mighty potentate of earth down upon his knees with BET SLY, SUKE TAGRAS, MOLL FLASHLY, and twenty other forlorn birds of Newgate, "in trouble," for felony and misdemeanor; beautiful, indeed, is the humility! The matron wonders, and the turnkeys cry, "Bless us! what a pious cretur." The story is read and told at melting tea-parties; and the King of Prussia—Mrs. Fry's pet—is received into the large and tender bosom of female philanthropy. He is a king of comforts—a king of sugar-candy!

His majesty returns to Prussia, and with almost the gloss of his Newgate benevolence upon him, he becomes Jack-of-all-work to the Emperor of Russia. He is NICHOLAS's most humble servant: a tool, a scourge, a Prussian knout in the hand of the imperial executioner.

A number of Poles, dignified by misfortune—ennobled by suffering patriotism—take refuge in Prussia from the bloody fangs of the Russian bear. They are—in a holiday mood, it seems, of the Prussian monarch—permitted by him to find a home in Posen. Their country destroyed to them, their fortunes shattered by as wild and merciless a tyrant as Heaven ever permitted to scourge humanity—they are allowed to find a resting-place in Prussia. They become planted in the soil; when, lo! NICHOLAS has ugly dreams about them,—they disturb his cheerful thoughts,—and, as he cannot have them back, first for the knout, and then for Siberia, why—he begs of his brother Prussia to banish them, accursed from the land. Whereupon, Mrs. Fry's pet shows himself obedient to the greater son of mischief, and, whether or no, the Poles must pack. The soil of Prussia is not favorable to virtuous misery.

Strange are the sympathies of kings! His majesty of Prussia could feel for and pray with Illegal Pawning, with Highway Robbery, with Embezzlement, with Felony, in its many shapes: but for Defeated Valor, Heroic Suffering, Patriotism, in all its glorious and glorifying aspirations—all such are naught, and must not find harbor in Posen.

In Newgate, the KING of Prussia was a Christian; what a pity that he should have quitted it to act journeyman despot at home.—Punch.

From Punch.

LAW OF PARENT AND CHILD.

WE now come to the tender subject of parent and child, which Shakespeare has so tenderly touched upon in many of his tragedies. Macduff calls his children "chickens," probably because he "broods" over the loss of them; and Werner, in Lord Byron's beautiful play of that name, exclaims to Gabor, "Are you a father?" a question which, as the Hungarian was a single man, he could not have answered in the affirmative without rendering himself amenable to the very stringent provisions of the forty-fifth of Elizabeth. Children are of two sorts—boys and girls: though the lawyers still further divide them into legitimate and illegitimate.

The duties of a parent are maintenance and education; or, as Coke would have expressed it, grub and grammar. That the father has a right to maintain his child, is as old as Montesquieu—we mean, of course, the rule, not the child or the parent, is as old as Montesquieu—whose exact age, by the bye, we have no means of knowing.

Fortunately, the law of nature chimes in with the law of the land; for, though there is a game, called "None of my child," in which it is customary to knock an infant about from one side of the room to the other, still there is that natural σρογη in the parental breast that fathers and mothers are for the most part willing to provide for their offspring.

The civil law will not allow a parent to disinherit his child without a reason; of which reasons there are fourteen, though there is one reason, namely, having nothing to leave, which causes a great many heirs to be amputated, or cut off, even without the ceremony of performing the operation, with a shilling. Our own law is more civil to parents than the civil law, for in this country children are left to Fate and the Quarter Sessions, which will compel a father, mother, grandfather, or grandmother, to provide for a child, if of sufficient ability. If a parent runs away, that is to say, doth spring off from his offspring, the churchwardens and overseers may seize his goods and chattels, and dispose of them for the maintenance of his family; so that, if a man lodging in a garret leaves nothing behind him, that must be seized for the benefit of the deserted children. By the late Poor Law Act, a husband is liable to maintain the children of his wife, whether legitimate or illegitimate; and we would therefore advise all "persons about to marry," that though it is imprudent to count one's chickens before they are hatched, still it is desirable that chickens already hatched, and not counted on, should be rigidly guarded against.

It being the policy of our laws to promote industry, no father is bound to contribute to a child's support more than twenty shillings a month, which keeps the child continually sharp set, and is likely to promote the active growth of the infantine appetite.

Our law does not prevent a father from disinheriting his child; a circumstance which has been invaluable to our dramatists, who have been able to draw a series of delightful stage old men, who have a strong hold on the filial obedience of the walking ladies and gentlemen, who dare not rush into each other's arms, for fear of the old gentleman in a court coat and large shoe-buckles being unfavorable to the youth in ducks, or the maiden in muslin. Heirs are especial favorites of our courts of justice—much as the lamb is the especial favorite of the wolf—for an heir with mint sauce, that is to say, with lots of money, is a dainty dish indeed, to tempt the legal appetite.

A parent may protect his child: and thus, if one boy batters another boy, the parent of the second boy may batter the first boy, and the battery is justifiable, for such battery is in the eye of the law only the working of parental affection; though it is rather awkward for parental affection to take a neo-classic turn in its extraordinary zeal to show itself.

The last duty of a parent is to educate a child, or to initiate him into the mysteries of Mavor at an early period. Learning is said to be better than houses and land—probably because it opens a wide field for the imagination—that Cubitt of the mind—to build upon.

The old Romans, says Hale, used to be able to kill their children; but he adds that "the practyse off cuttinge offe one's own hair was thoughte barberous." This atrocious pun reminds us of the cruelty of a certain dramatist of modern times, who used to write pieces and take his own children to see them, thereby submitting his own offspring to the most painful ordeal; for they were compelled to sit out the whole performance, and were savagely pinched if they fell asleep, while they were, at the same time, expected to laugh and look cheerful at every attempt at a joke which their unnatural father had ventured to perpetrate. In conformity with the maxim that "paterna potestas in pietate debet non in atrocitate consistere," it is believed that a child in such a dreadful position as that which we have alluded to, might claim to be released by his next friend, for the time being, the box-keeper.

A parent may correct his child with a rod or a cane—a practice originally introduced to encourage the growers of birch, and to protect the importers of bamboo, as well as to promote the healthy tingling of the juvenile veins; and a schoolmaster, who is in loco parentis, is also empowered to do the like by an old Act of Parliament, known as the statute of Wapping.

Children owe their parents support; but this is a mutual obligation, for they must support each other—though we sometimes hear them declaring each other wholly unsupportable.

Illegitimate children are such as are born before wedlock; being, like Richard the Third, "sent before their time into this breathing world:" and though there is a fine maxim, to the effect of its being "better late than never," it is, in some cases, better to be late than too early. They are said to be nullius filii, or nobody's children; but so many people are now the children of mere nobodies, that all the old prejudices on this point against innocent parties are becoming quite obsolete, as they ought to be.

There is now no distinction between the two kinds we have named, except that one cannot inherit, and the other can; but some of those who can can't, and some of those who can't are enabled to do what is far better, namely, to give instead of taking.

---

MISFORTUNES NEVER COME ALONE.—We see the KING OF HANOVER is announced, as well as the EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, to visit England in the month of May. Perhaps it is all for the best that these two monarchs should make their visits at the same time, as instances have been known of one violent poison counteracting another.—Punch.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

SHOPPING IN LONDON.

Let me tell you, scholar, that Diogenes walked on a day with his friend, to see a country fair, where he saw ribbons, and looking-glasses, and nut-crackers, and fiddles, and many other gimcracks; and having observed them all, and the other funnibums that make up the furniture of a country fair, he said to his friend, "Lord, how many things there are in this world of which Diogenes hath no need." ISAAC WALTON.

WHAT would London be without its shops?

How dull to the pedestrian, on a fine Sunday in June, is the formal, quaker-like aspect of the shuttered shops of Fleet Street and the Strand! How dismal to the loungeur are the tedious streets, where the tobacconists and pastrycooks alone offer their attractions to his excursive eye! How provoking to the pert milliner, whose only day of lifting her eyes from everlasting work is Sunday, when the haberdashery shops, with all their frippery, are as a sealed book, or a fountain shup up.

The shops of London, on Sunday, like a gallery of pictures turned to the wall, on other days display their thousand works of art in the most splendid frames, and the gayest colors; each shop is a picture, more or less highly-finished, or colored, according to the wealth and taste of the owner, and drawing its own especial mob of gaping admirers.

Without the privilege of the shop-windows, what on earth would become of our thousands of London loungeurs?

Without their aid, and the auction-rooms, how, in the name of laziness, would the wretched member of a West End club contrive to annihilate the time between breakfast and dinner?

To him, and to the stranger, the unemployed, the idle, the shops of London are means of education and amusement; normal schools of art and industry; repositories of taste and virtù; libraries of industry, science, intellect, applied to provide for the artificial wants and multiplied requirements of civilized and social man; museums of manufacturing ingenuity and skill.

If we were called upon to point out a single test by which we might determine the degree of refinement of a people, we would say, look at the shops; there you will see, reflected in the number of commodities, the number of wants of refined life; and perhaps, after all, it is by the number of our artificial wants that our refinement is to be calculated.

Let a man walk leisurely from Oxford Street, down Regent Street, along the Strand, Fleet Street, Cheapside, "to the India House;" let him stop, and introduce himself to the outsides of individual shops; let him enter into conversation with them, and hear what they have to say; and, if he does not return to his chamber impressed with more vivid ideas of the tremendous wealth, importance, enterprise of this mighty metropolis of shopocrats than he had before, we can only say, he is not the man we took him for.

There is a physiognomy of shop; a decided expression of countenance, that at once indicates to the spectator its social position, and status in society. Here is a shop, for instance, with wide mouth, low forehead, bleared eyes, and dusky features; a shop that a poor man would no more think of entering than he would of intruding into a gentleman's parlor; a shop that says as plain as it can speak, "I care, not I, for chance customers, I am a shop of high connexions and good family." The employés of such a shop as this are more like clergymen than shopmen; bald-headed, confidential, black-coated, long-service shopmen; men of good salaries and manner, grave and independent in their deportment, who have been in the establishment nine-and-twenty years come next Lord Mayor's day; and intend to be there the remainder of their respectable lives.

These old established shops stare at a chance-customer; they are civil, but cool in serving you, and take care to charge you a little higher than they do to their own connexions; they will not condescend to enter into conversation with you; and if you make any objection to the price or quality of any article, they return your money with great indifference and solemnity.

Nevertheless, you cannot lay out your money at a greater advantage than in one of these; in fact, they are the only shops to be depended on; they cannot afford to cheat you, nor give you a bad article; they are said to be dear, because they charge a high price for a good article, and in this point of view they may be as well called cheap shops as dear.

Contrast one of these with a ticket-shop, or pretended cheap shop, a lying, Jeremy Diddler shop, that pretends to be always selling off at a great sacrifice, as if its sole ambition were to ruin itself for the benefit of a discerning public.

There is something of the cut of the swell-mob about one of these cheap shops; it looks as if it had stolen its commodities, or had obtained them upon false pretences, which, in truth, is usually the case; its plate-glass windows, brass sashes, and full-length mirrors, have an impudent, unpaid-for expression.

There are no shopmen in these places, but only somethings between young men and boys; raw, twenty pounds a-year counter-jumpers, in sallow, half-starved cravats, and seedy black coats; there is great bustle and appearance of business, which you never notice in shops that enjoy the reality; the shop-boys have a servile, insolent manner, and an open, undisguised desire of cheating and taking you in. You are attracted, if you know no better, by the low prices of articles ticketed in the window, and you enter; you ask to look at the article in the window; this the shopmen will not allow, but assure you they have precisely similar goods, which they proffer for your inspection; if you persist in declining any other article than that you see marked in the window, you will in all probability be insulted, and turned out of the shop, if not sent to the station-house, as has before now happened to an adventurous bargain-hunter. Whatever you are wheedled or bullied into buying at these pretended cheap shops is sure to be dear, or, what amounts to the same thing in the end, of inferior quality; you never quit the counter without the unpleasant sensation of having been taken in, or of having been dealing with people whose trade is to take people in.

We hear a great deal of execration bestowed upon fortune-hunters; but we do not know that there is not another class of sporting characters, almost, if not altogether as detestable, we mean bargain-hunters. Time, temper, and shoe-leather, will these people submit to the loss of, for a bargain; will stew themselves in an atmosphere of odoriferous perspiration among greasy Jew-brokers, at an auction, for a bargain; will bid against their best friend for a thing which he wants, and which they don't want, for the love they bear a bargain. Now, what is a bargain? Something purchased for less than its fair marketable value. Who is the sufferer by this! Either the vendor, the owner, or the poor artizan, whose days and nights of labor have been consumed in its production.

With what excess of glee will a bargain-hunting lady return home with "such a love of a bonnet," "such a beautiful worked muslin," "such a sweet love of a tamboured collar," in the purchase whereof she has been lucky enough or clever enough to get it a bargain—"a mere nothing—an old song—and wonders how they can make it for the money."

Alas! how many tears may not the poor worker of that precious bargain have shed, while wearing her fingers to the bone for wages, mayhap barely enough to keep body and soul together! What struggling hearts may not have bent over the needle or the tambour-frame,—hearts whose only aspiration is for that happy, that longdesired hour, when they will for ever cease to beat,—hearts whose joy, hope, and freshness have long since given place to the complaining bitterness of unremitting, unrequited toil!

Ay, ladies of Britain, go bargain-catching, and give to South Sea islanders and nasty niggers the accumulated produce of your savings from the sweat and life-blood of your distressed countrywomen!

We have no patience with the hungry-eyed, greedy-hearted wretches who rush into cheap shops; and the only respectability about the cheap shops is their cleverness in doing these hunters of bargains. It is not that the buyer is sure at these places to get an article fifty per cent. worse, at five-and-twenty per cent. less than a respectable tradesman can afford to sell it for; this we rejoice at; this is a sort of retributive justice; it serves the bargain-hunter right. It is the misery among tradespeople, artificers, shopmen, the screwing of the poor workmen and workwomen, to which the bargain-hunter, by his purchases, is an accessory after the fact, since all who have the misfortune to have any concern with the cheap shops are sure to burn their fingers.

A respectable tradesman has an article in his shop, forming the most valuable portion of his stock in trade, but which he cannot afford to sell, and which secures to the honest purchaser an honest article at an honest price, I mean his character. This enables the tradesman to afford to do what is fair, and he does it; this is a protection to the customer, from imposture far before the mendacious announcements of the ticket-shops; this it is which enables the customer to enter a shop with confidence, quit it with satisfaction, and return to it with alacrity. Believe me, it is worth a trifle extra to deal with an honest man, who by straightforward behavior has raised himself to independence.

These observations apply to cheap tea-shops, cheap tailors, cheap jewellers, cheap haberdashers, cheap everything—whatever is too cheap is too dear. The tradesman will not get rich by this cheap system, and the customer will find, sooner or later, that he has sacrificed his true interest to a mere delusion.

Let us now resume our stroll and our casual observations, as we proceed along the leading line of the world of shopkeepers. Here is an historical shop—a shop that has made a fortune, and founded a family. There it stands, a monument of the supremacy of honest, humble industry in this great and powerful country. There you see it, an estate of five or ten thousand pounds a-year to the tradesman, and the means of a decent livelihood to numbers of industrious heads of families,—and yet it is only a saddler's shop. Out of that shop have been turned boys, sons of the saddler, who stitched therein. These boys have gone to school and college, and have returned with all the honors that intellectual labor can extort from colleges and schools. The eldest son of that saddler has pushed himself, through the several gradations of an arduous profession, to a highly respectable station; the second son of that saddler is at the head and is confessed worthily to be at the head, of a profession the most distinguished by public honors and rewards of any in this country. He has long been a senator and an advocate, and before these pages see the light may probably be a peer. The third son of that saddler has extended, in distant lands, the power and glory of his country by force of arms, and stands confessedly one of the most distinguished warriors of his time. What an accumulation of honor in one family!—what an illustration of the height to which in this country the son of the humblest man may, if he is worthy, attain!

Here is another shop—another saddler's shop. You see a number of clean-faced, well-fed looking fellows, pricking pig-skin into shape. The owner of that shop, once a poor youth, has now a title, a carriage—what did I say? a manufactory of carriages—footmen in sanguine breeches and gold-laced coats; a splendid mansion in one of the most fashionable parts of the town; he is, moreover, a valuable magistrate, an exposé of swindlers and schemers, and a public-spirited citizen; in Oxford Street a saddle-maker, in Park Crescent a gentleman of fortune, at the Mansion House a man of law and authority.

A third shop is a baronet's—a knight of the bloody hand—a man of enormous fortune. Here you must excuse me, while I step in and purchase at the counter of Sir John a pennyworth of sweet oil, wherewith to anoint my razors.

Not to particularise individual shops, it is quite a catalogue to recount the number of men of distinction that have been shopkeepers in London, and whose children now sit in Parliament, on the Bench, adorn the Church and the army, or swell the number of independent families in private life. When a shop is established in London, it is no longer a shop; it is, in point of fact, an estate, from which the possessor can quietly retire, receiving his rents, through the hands of his shop-keeping representative, with the same certainty as if his property were in lands, funds, or houses.

Stop here—let us take a lesson in the fine arts at one of these gorgeous print-shops—take care of your pockets, and flatten your nose against the middle of the window. No one heedlessly passes the print-shops; a look at them costs nothing, and there is always something to please. The wealthy and great go inside the shops, pay for prints, and possess them; the vulgar and penniless stay outside, criticise the engravings, and enjoy them; so trivial, after all, is the difference between the man who has money and the man who has it not.

The sporting print-shops attract us; one sees what is going on in the hunting world, without crossing a horse-back or going to Melton. There they are—magnates of the chase, in hunting panoply, their dogs, horses, and the whole matériel of the chase. Next, the caricatures while away ten minutes, not without much risible emotion; the inimitable H.B. puts forth all his powers of humorous ridicule to amuse us wayfarers of the streets;

Brougham, the Proteus of politicians, is pulled into ludicrous postures by a string in the hands of the Duke of Wellington; Palmerston, as Cupid, blows bubbles, that, as he blows them, break in empty air; Peel, as Phaeton, drives his triumphant chariot, oblivious of the melting influence of the sun of public opinion. Our rulers are by the pencil of this witty artist made ridiculous, and we laugh contentedly, in the confidence of our own obscurity. At Cockspur Street, the Haymarket, Bond Street, and Pall Mall, we have displayed before us the classical engravings of the day. Here Turner's extraordinary and incomprehensible experiments in color resolve themselves into subject, and become legible under the hand of the translator. The exquisite dogs of Landseer, with their human faces, are dispersed upon the wings of the multiplying press. Raphael and Correggio live over again in the soft, luscious, lithographic productions of the German school of engraving; Fanny Ellsler, Dumilatre, Taglioni, in their chosen pas, bound through the sustaining ether; Wellington, in dresses heroic and academic, as like and as unlike himself as it is possible for the same man at one and the same time to be, smiles and scowls upon the admiring spectators; Peel's bland, immovable, and gentleman-like features are not wanting.

We see in the windows of print-sellers what a nonentity is fame. Here, in the evanescence of a transitory popularity, statesmen have their places in the windows, as on the Treasury bench; when they are in Opposition, they are deposed from the post of honor in the centre of the print-seller's window, and stowed away, no longer marketable, in the unenviable obscurity of the portfolios in the back-shop. The grave has hardly closed on the remains of a royal duke, or other illustrious personage, than he lives again for the mob of gazers at the print-shops, and continues offered for sale until some other great personage appears, whose lineaments become, in life or death, saleable commodities. Even kings are treated with hardly more ceremony by those great potentates of Cockspur Street and Pall Mall. His Majesty of Prussia frowns upon us in all the dignity of his huge moustache, for a week or ten days after he has quitted our shores, when he is deposed from his window, and Espartero reigns in his stead. Queen Christina puts the Regent out of countenance, and the widow, and Narvaez or Bravo, or whoever is uppermost for the day, compels her Christian Majesty to retire into the back-shop, and waste her sweetness in a portfolio.

The print-shops, properly regarded, are not mere galleries of the arts, but popular pictorial histories of England, the Continent, and in a word, the world.

From the print-shops we proceed to the book-shops. These furnish less matter for observation to the lingering mob; the titles are soon read; and, as you are not in the humor, or the funds to buy, the titles are all the information you are likely to obtain.

From the sublime to the ridiculous is but a step—from the print and book-shops to the gourmand shops is but twenty yards. Perhaps in nothing is the excess of London luxury more strikingly exhibited than in the gourmand shops; where plain roast, baked, or boiled, have no place, where everything is foreign, rich, full of zest, and expensive.

What a variety of stimulants for the palled, exhausted palate has not the research of caterers for the appetite of luxurious man provided! Here are every variety of continental sausages, while Norwich, Cambridge, Epping are forgotten.—reindeer tongues, Strasburgh bacon,—as if Wiltshire was not good enough for Englishmen,—turkeys stuffed with truffles, wild boar's head, potted meats, fish and fowl in every variety of pot and pan, pates de foie gras, fat goose-liver-pies of Strasburgh, powdered beef of Hamburg, and a thousand other contrivances, that might create an appetite "under the ribs of death."

Ha! do I not see a bulky form, swathed hand and foot in bandages of flannel, with bolsters at his back, and pillows supporting his misshapen toes? Now he rubs his chalky knuckles with misshapen thumb—now he plies the brandy-bottle to assuage his agony—'tis Gour, taking his ease in this his own chosen palace, where thousand sprites of dainty meat and drink, potted and bottled, wait to do his bidding on a thousand belly-gods about town. See his sunken eye, his flaccid chops, his greasy lips—bah! let's be off—these delicate meats are delicate poisons!

Here is something more plain English, more honest, more substantial, a butcher's-meat shop. Here you may behold the roast-beef of Old England in all its glory, beef in exaggeration of feeding and condition. That rib, now, is not merely the fat—no, sir, it is the marrow of the land!

"The ox was a picture for painters to study,

The fat was so white, and the lean was so ruddy."

There is not in London—which is as much as to say there is not in the world—a finer sight than the shops of the great victuallers about Christmas time. It is at once a delightful and tantalizing sight. You see it for nothing; but you get nothing by the sight, except a feeling of regret that you are not able to appropriate a portion, as the saying is, to your own cheek.

Here is a shop we should have noticed before—meat after fish—Grove's vension and fish shop. Really this is worth looking at. Here ichthyologists linger delighted; there is always some strange, monstrous fish extended on the marble slab,—a sturgeon, dog-fish, hog-fish, saw-fish, or other curiosity of the deep. Here you are sure to find the largest salmon imported, with shoulders broad as a Bath chairman's, and tail like the blade of a battle-axe; turbot, over whose creamy breast crawls in congenial society the yet live lobster; the speckled trout, bedropped with crimson hail; the luscious carp, the slimy tench, physician of the flood; the gelatinous john d'ory, the delicate little white-bait; the huge crimped cod-fish, with his appropriate garnishing, the smelt. Surely these Groves must be the Groves of Blarney, of whom we have heard so much and so often, in poor Power's melodious song,

"The trouts and the salmon they play backgammon,

Sporting so beautifully all the day;

But if you offer to take hold of ever a one of them,

Don't the polis immediately take you away?"

Good eating deserves good drinking; and, if you have the wherewithal, you need assuredly not remain many minutes either hungry or dry. In London, the public-house is always either next door but two, or round the next corner, or over the way.

The regular gin-shop or gin-palace is familiar, in exterior at least, to every perambulator of the streets; but, designing our lucubrations for a distant posterity, a posterity, mayhap, altogether made up of tee-totalers,—for to this perfection, doubtless, shall we come at last,—we think proper to essay a brief description of one of those nurseries of misery, want, and vice, that abound in every quarter of our thirsty metropolis.

The gin-palace, then, is generally at the corner of two intersecting streets, in a gin-drinking neighborhood; it lowers, in all the majesty of stucco pilasters, in genuine cockney splendor, over the dingy mansions that support it, like a rapacious tyrant over his impoverished subjects.

The doors are large, swinging easily upon patent hinges, and ever half-and-half—half open, half shut, so that the most undecided touch of the dram-drinker admits him. The windows are of plate-glass, set in brass sashes, and are filled with flaming announcements, in large letters, “THE CHEAPEST HOUSE IN LONDON,”—“CREAM OF THE VALLEY,”—“CREAMING STOUT,”—“BRILLIANT ALES,”—“OLD TOM, fourpence a quartern,”—“HODGES’ BEST, for mixing,” and a variety of other entertainments for the men and beasts who make the gin-palace their home. At night splendid lights irradiate the surrounding gloom, and an illuminated clock serves to remind the toper of the time he throws away in throwing away his reason.

Within, the splendor is in keeping with the splendor without; counters fitted with zinc, and a long array of brass taps; fittings of the finest Spanish mahogany, beautifully polished; bottles containing cordials, and other drugs, gilded and labelled, as in the apothecaries’ shops. At one side is the bar-parlor, an apartment fitted up with congenial taste, and usually occupied by the family of the publican; in the distance are vistas, and sometimes galleries, formed altogether of huge vats of the various sorts of liquor dispensed in the establishment. Behind the counter, which is usually raised to a level with the breasts of the toppers, stand men in their shirt-sleeves, well-dressed females, or both, dispensers of the “short” and “heavy;” the under-sized tipplers, raising themselves on tiptoe, deposit the three-halfpence for the “drop” of gin, or whatever else they require, and receive their quantum of the poison in return; ragged women, with starveling children, match and ballad-venders, fill up the foreground of the picture. There are no seats, nor any accommodation for the customers in the regular gin-palace; every exertion is used to make the place as uncomfortable to the consumers as possible, so that they shall only step in to drink, and pay; step out, and return to drink and pay again. No food of any kind is provided at the gin-palace, save a few biscuits, which are exhibited in a wire-cage, for protection against the furtive hand; drink, eternal, poisonous drink, is the sole provision of this whited sepulchre.

There is not in all London a more melancholy and spirit-depressing sight than the area of the larger gin-palaces on a wet night. There, the homeless, houseless miseries of both sexes, whether they have money or not, resort in numbers for a temporary shelter; aged women selling ballads and matches, cripples, little beggar-boys and girls, slaving idiots, piemen, sandwich-men, apple and orange-women, shell-fishmongers, huddled pell-mell, in draggled confusion. Never can human nature, one would imagine, take a more abject posture than is exhibited here; there is a character, an individuality, a family likeness common to the whole race of sots; the pale, clayey, flaccid, clammy face, pinched in every feature; the weeping, ferret-like, lack-lustre eye, the unkempt hair, the slattern shawl, the untidy dress, the slipshod gait, too well betray the confirmed drunkard.

The noises, too, of the assembled toppers are hideous; appalling even when heard in an atmosphere of gin. Imprecations, execrations, oburgations, supplications, until at length the patience of the publican, and the last copper of his customers, are exhausted, when, rushing from behind his counter, assisted by his shopmen, he expels, vi et armis, the dilatory mob, dragging out by the heels or collars the dead drunkards, to nestle as best they may, outside the inhospitable door.

Here, unobserved, may you contemplate the infinite varieties of men self-metamorphosed into beasts; soaker, tippler, toper, muddler, dram-drinker, beer-swiller, cordial-tipper, sots.

Here you may behold the barefoot child, hungry, naked, clay-faced, handing up on tiptoe that infernal bottle, which made it, and keeps it what it is, and with which, when filled, it creeps home to its brutal father, or infamous mother, the messenger of its own misery.

Here the steady, respectable sot, the good customer, slides in, and flings down his throat the frequent dram; then, with an emphatic “hah” of gratification, drops his money, nods to his friend, the landlord, and for a short interval disappears.

Here you may behold with pity and regret, and as much super-added virtuous indignation as the inward contemplation of your own continence may inspire, the flaunting Cyprian, in over-dressed tawdriness, calling, in shameless voice, for a quartern of “pleasant-drinking” gin, which she liberally shares with two or three gentlemen who are being educated for the bar of the Central Criminal Court. You may contrast her short-lived hey-day of prosperous sin, with that row of miseries seated by the wall, whose charms are fled, and whose voices are husky, while they implore you to treat them with a glass of ale, or supplicate for the coppers they see you receive in change from the barman; and who are only permitted that wretched place of rest, that they may beg for the benefit of the publican, and for his profit poison themselves with the alms of others.

Their day is over; night has fallen thick and heavy upon their fate; beggars are they of the poison, which, while it mitigates for the moment their gnawing sorrow, soon

Shuts up the story of their days.

Let us forget this painful scene, and resume our digressive, shop-exploring way.

Of London shops the shawl shops are decidedly the most attractive to the passer-by. These are more like the interior of a Sultan’s divan than an English tradesman’s shop; draped and festooned as they are with the rich productions of the looms of Thibet, Angola, Cashmere, of more than Tyrian splendor of dye, and of patterns varied, it would seem, to infinity. Rich carpets conceal the floor of these establishments, vases of rare and costly china are dispersed about the room, whose great size is relieved by rows of pillars; lustres of brilliant crystal depend from the painted ceilings, and the rosewood tables (for here you see no vulgar counters) dispersed throughout the vast apartment are heaped with costly velvets, and piles of cloth of gold.

The goldsmiths, although the display in their windows may not be so attractive to vulgar eyes as the shawl-shops, far surpass these in internal wealth and variety of costly property.

The chronometer-maker's is a never-failing stopping-place for the shop-window loungers. Let us count the gold watches, as we have nothing else to do; more than three hundred gold watches in the window alone, each reposing in state on its bed of crimson velvet; very satisfactory to the poor author, who is so seldom up to the "time of day," or able to inform the vulgar world "what 's o'clock!" Here is always something scientific at work in the window, attracting mechanical optics; a spiral spring, putting in motion some intricate piece of machinery, or a compensating pendulum, moving from side to side, like a trimming politician in either House of Parliament.

We pause curiously to examine shops that delight in displaying new inventions; grates, for example, warranted to burn no coals, or what amounts to exactly the same thing, in which no coals will burn. An infinity of stoves, calculated to suffocate a family with the greatest economy; candles warranted to burn without snuffing, and candlesticks that snuff their own candles; waterproof coats, caps, life hats, preservative from water, not only of the head, but, in case of accident, of the body appertaining thereunto. Apparatus calculated to cook everything for nothing; patent beds, patent easy and uneasy chairs, patent locks, not only impossible to pick, but which detect the picker; articles with outlandish names; co-razza shirt-shops; Hedyosoma coat-shops, and a thousand other indispensable necessities, made attractive by Greek, and Latin, and Gibberish denominations.

The greatest curiosities among shops are, beyond all question, the curiosity-shops; nor do we think, that, if called upon to exhibit to a stranger by one illustration, the profusion of superfluous wealth in this metropolis, we should not conduct him to a curiosity-shop, saying, "Lo, in such a place as this there are people who expend thousands of pounds."

The useless lumber, or, as Brother Jonathan would call it, "plunder," that abounds in these establishments passes all calculation; but it may be safely assumed that everything bears a price in an inverse ratio to its possibility of being applied to any useful purpose. Here are high-backed chairs, with low bottoms, the frames of carved oak, the seats crimson plush, as old as the time of my grandmother's grandmother, who, if she used these, must have

Sat with her toes
As high as her nose.

Yet this useless apparatus for a hall, or vestibule, will cost you from five to ten pounds a piece, or somewhat about three times the price of a chair that you can sit down on. Here are inlaid cabinets, of ridiculous and tasteless design, whose only merit is the labor that has been wasted in the manufacture of such trumpery; Japan screens, covered with outrageous mimicry of things animal and vegetable, in tawdry colors; hideous idols, bronzes, noseless blocks, and cracked china teapots, bound with tape; old copies of old pictures, for which prices are demanded that make one's hair to stand on end; old rusty armor, swords, helmets, and musty, moth-eaten tapestry; in short, whatever is ridiculous in design, worm-eaten in texture, and in use unprofitable.

Nor, in our enumeration of the endless varieties of shop, must we forget the shops of the lanes, alleys, and other lesser veins of town. These seem to be surviving shops of the last century, which, having fallen into reduced circumstances, have retired from the prosperous thoroughfares to these dusky regions, where presides over their commerce a venerable lady in white hair, and silver spectacles, or a superannuated gentleman, as old as themselves. Hundreds, we might say thousands of these shops, presided over by these ladies and gentlemen, "all of the olden time," are juvenile; that is to say, subsist upon the farthings, halfpence, and pence, affectionate pa's and ma's of all ranks are in the habit of bestowing upon their little ones. The modern Michael Angelo (Titmarsh) in his amusing, instructive, and impartial book on Ireland, records an observation of one ragged urchin to another; "Once," says he, "I had a halfpenny, and bought apples with it." "Dates," observes De Quincy, "we forget, epochs never;" possession of the halfpenny the Hibernian youth could not forget; it was his epoch. In London, under the most unfavorable circumstances, the observation would be to the following effect: "Once a week I have a penny, and buy sweet-stuff with it." For these youths, so liberally dealt by, the little sweet-stuff shops in the little lanes and alleys abound in great profusion. Here, under the tantalizing denominations of hard-bake, almond-rock, brandy-balls, bulls'-eyes, elicampayne, sugar-plums, candied almonds, acid drops, Bonaparte's ribs, peppermint, are saccharine juices in great variety and profusion; in the City, however, where children are taught to stuff as soon as they can crawl, these sweet-stuff shops rise to wholesale dignity, and supply not only little children, but the "trade."

In these minor shops, too, one sees restored the little penny-half-penny places of a remote village, where the division of traffic is unknown, and where everybody sells everything at every price; coals, penny battledores, brick-dust, odd, tattered volumes of the Spectator, potatoes, pens and ink, Bibles, bacon, farthing tobacco-pipes, turnip-tops, table beer, the Sunday paper, Warren's blacking, and forty songs for a halfpenny.

But the reader is tired, and thinks it high time to shut up shop.

We are of the same opinion. Dick—turn off the gas—turn out the cat, and up with the shutters!

THE COUNTRY IN DANGER.

WHILE reading over the last European papers, in our little office in Boston, we were attracted by a sudden elevation of voice from some Irish laborers in the room below us—and clearly distinguished the following remarkable and significant words—"THE COUNTRY OUGHT TO BE KICKED!" It may be that the conspirators were talking of the Philadelphia war, and only gave vent to the anger of the moment; but it may be that this design may be carried into execution! At any rate, we should rather be laughed at for causeless alarm, than sleep on our post; and it is the duty of every patriotic citizen, when sounds of treason meet his ears, to "cry aloud and spare not;" more especially if by so doing he can fill out a column.

From Hood's Magazine.

IRISH TRAVELLING ANECDOTE.

TRAVELLING is decidedly a pleasant occupation, and nowhere pleasanter than in Ireland for those who love fun; and where you have "Nothing else to do,"

like the stars in "Molly Bawn," you could not do better than—

"Order your wings and be off to the west,"

as Moore recommends us. It so happens I have the pleasure of knowing both the authors whose lines I have quoted, and I have heard them both speak with enthusiastic warmth of the enjoyment they have had in revisiting the land of their birth, being welcomed by the open arms and hearts of their countrymen, and hearing their own songs reverberated by the echoes of their native hills, and floating across the silver waters of Killarney. Moore, by the way, alludes to this in one of his exquisite melodies, which is too tempting not to quote:—

'T was one of those dreams, that by music are brought Like a light summer haze o'er the poet's warm thought,
When, lost in the future, his soul wanders on,
And all of this life, but its sweetness, is gone.

The wild notes he heard o'er the water were those
To which he had sung Erin's bondage and woes,
And the breath of the bugle now waited them o'er
From Erin's green isle to Gienà's wooded shore.

He listened—while high o'er the eagle's rude nest
The lingering sounds on their way loved to rest,
And the echoes sung back from their full mountain quire,
As if loth to let song so enchanting expire.

It seem'd as if ev'ry sweet note that died here
Was again brought to life in some airier sphere,
Some heaven in those hills where the soul of the strain
That had ceased upon earth was awaking again!

Oh! forgive if, while listening to music whose breath
Seem'd to circle his name with a charm against death,
He should feel a proud spirit within him proclaim,
"Even so shalt thou live in the echoes of fame;

"Even so, though thy memory should now die away,
'T will be caught up again in some happier day,
And the hearts and the voices of Erin prolong,
Through the answering future, thy name and thy song!"

The honest exultation of the poet is here so just, that it delights us, and if ever man deserved it, it is Thomas Moore. But while Moore manifestly exulted in the triumph he enjoyed at Killarney, that spirit of fun, which is sure to steal out of everything Irish, tinged the glowing picture he painted of the reception given to him by his countrymen. "It is all very well," said Moore, "for me to tell you of my being a great personage at Killarney, but Sir Walter Scott, who was there shortly after, told me something which amused me very much, showing what a strange notion these very people had of 'a poet,' though it was for my poetry alone I was to be valued. At a certain point in the lake, the boatman who rowed Sir

Walter told him, that was the place which Misther Moore liked so much. 'You mean Moore the poet,' said Sir Walter,—"Faix, he's no poet * at all, but a rale gentleman, for he gave me half-a-crown.'"

Now Killarney is a place Irishmen always rave about, but if they be poets as well, there is no stopping them. I have heard Lover tell how intense was the pleasure he experienced when he was awakened from his slumber after his first night at Killarney by his "Angel's Whisper" being played on the bugle under his window by way of welcome to him, and the other bugle player, who would not be outdone, making a sort of Irish echo by returning "Rory O'Moore."

This was a very elegant way of paying a compliment, by the by, and might be matter of pride to any man. It was certainly a heartfelt pleasure to the author, who was destined, however, to have his pride taken down a peg a few days after. He was proceeding with a friend to Glengarriff, and was waiting beside the mail "car"—(for they have few "coaches" left in the South of Ireland, Bianconi having revolutionized the system of travelling) surrounded by some friends, and most of them people of consideration, waiting for the moment to start, when two travellers by the same vehicle approached, and very unceremoniously took the cloaks of Lover and his friend, which had been previously placed on the side of the car commanding the best view of beauties which lay along the road they were about to travel, and threw them to the other seat. Lover, who has the hot blood of the Celt about him, at once interfered, and an angry altercation was about to ensue, when the driver of the car plucked the offending traveller by the skirt of the coat, and whispered in his ear something which made him give in at once. It was discovered afterwards the driver had pointed out to the offender, that those on whom he had attempted to commit a wrong, were "not to be sneezed at."—"Sure there's all the principal gentlemen of Killarney come out to see them off, and the high sheriff himself at the head o' them, and that the man wrote 'Rory O'Moore' sure, and the devil a one has a better right to the pick and choice of any sate on any car in Ireland!"

The car started, and the gentlemen on either side, in Irish parlance, "kept themselves to themselves;" but on arriving at Kenmare in the evening, the invaders of the cloaked seats thought it better to hold out the olive branch, and sent a note across the coffee-room to express a hope, that, instead of the route being pursued on horseback, as an order from Lover to the landlord implied, a car and pair of horses should be substituted, in which they might be permitted to join. The proposal was accepted, a pleasant supper followed, and an early start in the morning agreed upon.

The road between Kenmare and Glengarriff is extremely mountainous, obliging passengers to alight frequently; and it was in a walk up a stiff hill that one of the strangers in company with Lover suddenly addressed him thus:—

"I believe, sir, I have the honor of addressing a distinguished author?"

Mr. Lover disclaimed any right to so proud a title.

* The term "poet" is often applied among the lower orders in Ireland to express some reckless crack-brained fellow.

"Oh, sir, I believe a most distinguished author."

"Indeed, sir, you are mistaken."

"No, no, sir—I know who you are—I am proud, sir, in having the honor to address the author of 'Jim Crow.'"

"—'Here was an end of my glory,' said Lover —'Rory O' Moore' being confounded with 'Jim Crow,' brought my 'nobbs to nine pence.'"

This anecdote, in a condensed form, has been introduced by Mr. Lover in his pleasant entertainment, called "Irish Evenings," a novelty which most agreeably surprised the town a fortnight ago. When first Mr. Lover's intention was announced of becoming in his own person an expositor of his country's music and character, a good deal of curiosity was excited. The author of upwards of a hundred songs, many of them amongst the most popular of our day; the author of Irish novels, Irish dramas, and Irish legends, was looked upon as likely to do the subject justice; and the world, to whose judgment he ventured thus publicly to appeal, were willing to receive him with welcome. This he must have felt when he heard the hearty and prolonged cheers which greeted his entrance upon the platform of the Princess's Concert Room, (a beautiful room by the way, and admirably adapted to convey sound,) and that welcome given by a distinguished auditory, comprising rank and fashion, and literary and musical celebrity. Mr. Lover plunged at once into his subject; and in an easy and conversational tone touched upon the early musical history of his country, all tending to prove an original school, and a fanciful nomenclature for the strings of the harp. He also contended that music is not to be considered as a frivolous pursuit; that it has played an important part in our own history; and, from Venerable Bede and Cambrensis down to Fletcher of Saltoun, Mr. Lover happily adduced authorities in favor of his position. This dry ground he soon left, however, and asked indulgence for his small voice in giving the appropriate song which followed, "Whisper low," written to the original Irish air of the "The Rejected Lover," which name Mr. Lover said was ominous to him, but hoped, in the words of Rory O' Moore, that "names" as well as "dhrames" might be allowed to go "by contraries." This little point was well received by the audience, and won favor for the reception of this first song, "Whisper low," one of Mr. Lover's very happiest effusions, and which we would quote, did our space permit. As for the singing of this song, it was the most novel thing possible. It was putting to the severest test the problem, whether expression would serve instead of voice. That in private, Mr. Moore has this power in a marvellous degree, is notorious; and it was also well known that Mr. Lover was only second to him in that capability: but whether that mentality (if we may use the term) of singing could operate in the large area of a spacious concert room was yet to be tried, and Mr. Lover has made the experiment most successfully.

"One touch of feeling makes the whole world kin?"

And it is the feeling which he throws into his song, that makes his hearers forget the want of mere organic power. His singing of the "Angel's Whisper" is so fine a reading of that touching song, that we had rather hear it in his diminished tones, than in all the volume of a tenor, or seductive sweetness of a soprano.

Mr. Lover has shown great judgment in not depending on his own singing alone;—pleasing and curious as it is, it might want force for a whole evening, therefore has he selected two charming singers to assist in his illustrations—Miss Cubitt, who is vastly improving of late, and Miss Rollo Dickson (quite new to us,) a sweet and tasteful warbler, whose clear, sound tones, and nice execution won her well-deserved applause—indeed, both the ladies were encored; so was Mr. Lover, on his second evening, in "Widow Machree," which he gave with great effect, but he wisely declined the honor, and "begged off," though not without some difficulty, for the audience were rather bent on having it. One word, by the way, on the subject of encores. We look upon encores in general as injudicious. At the first glance, they seem a pleasing testimony to the power of both author and singer—and singers are only too ready in general to yield to the temptation; but, if we look deeper into the matter, we see that a song, be it ever so good, is never so effective on its repetition. The public are, in this respect, like a child who cries for another cake, and when it gets it, cannot enjoy it.

The lecture was, as might be expected from Mr. Lover's acquirements, scholarlike and gentlemanly; displaying taste and feeling where they are appropriate, but much more frequently inspiring mirth; and we certainly never heard more hearty laughter, than that which rung through the Princess's Concert Room. We cannot conclude, without wishing Mr. Lover all the success in his new undertaking. We will go farther than wishes, and prophesy, to him much profit, and to the public a great deal of pleasure.

THE HUSBAND TO HIS LATCH-KEY.

HAVE I lost thee, my Latch-Key, or was I so green

As to leave thee this morning behind?

No; thou hast but conceal'd thee, my waistcoat between,

And the texture by which it is lined.

Thou hast rubb'd a great hole in my pocket, I see,

I have worn thee so long near my heart;

And that must be look'd to to-morrow, my Key,

Or else we are likely to part.

I believe we left home at a quarter to noon,

And here we're again at our door;

I don't know what the time is exactly; but soon

I expect we shall hear it strike four.

I cannot conceive what on Earth I should do,

My Latch-Key, if 't were not for thee:

For I never get home of a night before two;

And not very often till three.

And here, till I woke all the street with the row,

In vain I might hammer and ring;

At one time my wife would sit up for me; now,

Oh catch her at any such thing!

But Thou art no changed one, my Latch-Key; and so,

Since I find it's beginning to rain;

By thy leave, gentle Key-hole.—Eh! What? Here's a go!

That woman has put up the chain!

THE LIVING AGE.

No. 5.—15 JUNE, 1844.

CONTENTS.

|   | PAGE.   |
|---|---|
| 1. A Forced March with Espartero, . . . . .   | Hood's Magazine , . . . . . 259            |
| 2. Threatening Letter to Thomas Hood, . . . . .   | Hood's Magazine , . . . . . 261            |
| 3. Chess Studies, . . . . .   | Examiner , . . . . . 263                   |
| 4. The Strong Wind in St. Martin's Church, . . . . .  | Punch , . . . . . 264                      |
| 5. The Omen, . . . . .  | Bentley's Miscellany , . . . . . 266       |
| 6. Meeting of Distressed Sheriffs' Officers, . . . . .  | Punch , . . . . . 268                      |
| 7. George the Beau and George the Fourth, . . . . .   | Punch , . . . . . 268                      |
| 8. NEWS OF THE WEEK.—Budget—Recall—Imprisonmentfor Debt—Code of Criminal Law, . . . . .   | 270   |
| Texas—Currency, . . . . .   | 271   |
| Lord Ellenborough, . . . . .  | 272   |
| 9. TOPICS OF THE DAY.—Powers of the East India Company,Mirror of the Age—The Circulation, . . . . .   | 272   |
| Visit of Nicholas—The Bank Project, . . . . .   | 274   |
| Visit of Louis Philippe—Law Reform, . . . . .   | 275   |
| Moral Prospects of the United States, . . . . .   | 276   |
| The Zollverein and the United States, . . . . .   | 277   |
| Lord Ellenborough, . . . . .  | 278   |
| India, and British Conquests, . . . . .   | 279   |
| Texas, . . . . .  | 280   |
| 10. FRANCE.—Invasion of England—Slavery—Church, . . . . .   | 281   |
| 11. SPAIN.—Christina and the Pope—Social State, . . . . .   | 283   |
| 12. HAYTI.—New Refugees, . . . . .  | 283   |
| 13. MISCELLANEOUS INTELLIGENCE.—Letters and Despatches of Nelson, 263—Quick Travelling—Neapolitan MSS.—Christian Sepulture—Needlewomen—Governesses—Galvanic Tele-graph—Syrian Medical Aid, 265—Late King of Sweden—Russia and Circassia—W. Beck-ford, 269—Commerce in Chinese Seas—Stout Rope—Gipsy Wit—Nursing Foxes—Barto Marriage—Family Bottle—Wholesale Marriages—Birth in a Wheelbarrow—Aristo-cratic Convict, 285—Great Chess Match—King of Saxony—Anti-State Church—Lettersthrough Post Office—Furniture of Napoleon—Commissioners of Fine Arts—Increase ofLetters—Mr. Brown, of Liverpool—Swedish King—Russian Absentees—Mr. Lover—Mr.Wilson, 286—Decorative Designs of New Houses of Parliament—Horrible Accident—Post Office Returns—Drunkenness and Murder—Protection against Smoke—Russian Rail-roads, 287—German Emigrants to Texas—Salmon Fishing—Diplomatists—Malady inNew Brunswick—Buried Treasure—Marked Man—Wood Pavement—Prussian Annex-ation—India Rubber Matting—White Crows—Due Proportions—Espartero, 288—Tahiti—Bernadotte's Estate—Trade in Scotland—Cast Iron Pulpit in Jewish Synagogue—PublicWalks—Communion Plate for the Navy—Scripture Readers—Mr. Dickens, 285. | 284   |
| 14. Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression, . . . . .   | British and Foreign Review , . . . . . 289 |
| 15. Books for Children, . . . . .   | " . . . . . 296                                   |
| 16. The Atmospheric Railway, . . . . .  | " . . . . . 301                                   |
| 17. POETRY.—A Song of the Season, 260—Little Frenchman's First Lesson, 267—Patriot'sAddress, 269.   |   |

BOSTON:

E. LITTELL & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

BOSTON.—REDDING & Co.—JORDAN & Co.—HOTCHKISS & Co.
 NEW YORK.—MOWATT & Co.—SUN OFFICE.—BURGESS & STRINGER.
 PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUDE & CANNING—R. G. BERFORD—ZIEBER & Co.
 BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.
 ALBANY.—W. C. LITTLE—GEORGE JONES. PORTLAND.—GEORGE COLMAN.
 CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.
 NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

In the management of the Museum of Foreign Literature, we never hesitated to reprint foreign attacks upon the United States, however ill-natured, or however true they might be. We have no sympathy with the very great tenderness of that patriotism which cannot hear of our alleged faults, and shrinks from every attack.

But as the good people abroad now begin to know something of us, we may be sure that their attention will be turned more and more this way; and not having the fear of stern democracy, or its great apostles before their eyes, they may, perhaps, not only praise the country itself, less than they ought, but they may even doubt the perfect wisdom or virtue of Whig or Democratic leaders! Shall we, then, who wish to show to this country the public opinion of England and of Europe, upon all leading topics of the day, be afraid to print what may be said of our great men? Are they not deserving of European attention—and must we not know what is said of them? We shall venture to trust to the candor of our readers, and without dread of being suspected to be opposed either to one party or the other, shall, with all the impartiality of history, repeat such praise or censure, as may seem to us of some interest or amusement, whether it agree, or disagree with our private opinions and prejudices.

On the subject of Texas, the comments we copy are somewhat savage; but, although the subjects do not seem to be thought of in connexion, the censure of the British annexations in India, (against the will of the annexed by the way) is equally decided, if not so sharp. That is not the “grasping” of a republic.

The question of the meaning of the words “the most favored nation,” in late treaties, is likely to become of considerable importance. If the British interpretation be settled, it is likely to result in more free trade than Lord Aberdeen supposes.

The Spectator's article upon the East India corporation, has interest for all Anglo-Saxon governments, in none of which is the power resident in a single head. The division has succeeded in practice, better than could a priori have been supposed. The recall of Lord Ellenborough is a striking proof that “her merchants are princes.” Punch has an engraving representing his Lordship in the character of Othello, bidding farewell to all the pomp that makes ambition virtue; and exclaiming “Ellenborough's occupation's gone.”

The Prince de Joinville's abstract speculations upon the feasibility of sending troops to invade England, now that steam is in operation, must often have occurred to Napoleon, if he has continued to be interested in European politics.

Let neither grave or gay readers fail to read the article on the Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression. They will all be pleased with it.

If the conclusions of the writer on the Atmospheric Railway, should be proved to be sound, it will come into extensive use. We do not understand the mode of operation in all respects, but shall probably get more light from other articles.

SIR ROBERT PEEL's Currency Plan will be a very great improvement. The changes in the money market will be regulated by nature, and not by the discretion of a Board of Directors. So they will be more gradual, and less.

So far as can be judged of by what came before the public, in the canvass of 1840, Mr. Webster's plans were similar.

The writer of these lines went to Washington in 1833, to endeavor to impress upon General Jackson the great advantage of establishing our paper currency upon the same principles, and at the same time of making the change very gradually, through a new charter to the Bank of the United States. But it is not recorded that Hercules did anything in the way of building up; perhaps his time was too much occupied by clearing the ground.

After the opportunity of using the Bank of the United States as a transition state had passed, we urged successively upon Mr. Van Buren, General Harrison, Mr. Tyler and Mr. Clay, the establishment of the currency on fixed principles, by means of a new department of the government itself, similar in its constitution to the Supreme Court, so as to be above executive control.

The capital proposed, was the Public Lands; the paper issued to be payable on demand at the Mint in Philadelphia. The amount of issue, to be so arranged that it would gradually increase as the needs of commerce required it as a means of domestic exchange. Failure to pay on demand, to ensure loss of office; the profits and interest to be divided among the States.

The whole was founded upon the same principle as that on which Sir Robert Peel's plan rests:—that the amount of the currency should vary by the increase or diminution of gold and silver, but not by the increase or diminution of bank notes. So far as the currency is composed of the latter, it should be fixed by strong bounds. We are encouraged to hope now for a hearing from the country on a subject which has no connexion with party politics, and shall take an opportunity of again asking attention to a few words on a matter which we have long thought of the greatest importance to the morals, as well as the trade of the United States.

From Hood's Magazine.

A FORCED MARCH WITH ESPARTERO.

AMONGST the various calumnies that have been circulated concerning the late Regent of Spain, perhaps the most glaringly untrue is the imputation of a want of personal courage. Whatever may be his abilities as a statesman or a general, as a soldier his bravery is unquestionable, and, indeed, has often led him into acts which, however laudable they might have been in a young officer who had his way to make in the service, might almost be qualified as rashness on the part of the leader of an army, whose life is of too great value to be risked like that of a mere subaltern. It would be easy to cite a dozen instances of dashing and headlong courage on the part of Espartero. The following anecdote may however suffice :—

It was in the month of April, 1838, that the Carlist general, Count Negri, at the head of two or three thousand men, crossed the Ebro and made an incursion into Castile. As soon as this was known, several divisions of Christian troops started in his pursuit; Iriarte in one direction, Castaneda in another, Espartero himself, in a third. There was a good deal of marching and counter-marching, but Negri's movements were rapid, and his information good, and for some time he managed to elude his pursuers. I was then attached to Espartero's division, and on his escort, which consisted of a troop of English lancers and a detachment of Spanish cazadores of the guard, together with about eighty horses.

The pursuit of Negri had lasted some days, and had brought us to Burgos, whence we marched at daybreak one morning, and late in the afternoon reached a village where we were to halt for the night. The men got into their billets, disencumbered themselves of their knapsacks, were beginning to cook their dinner, for which a severe march had given them a tolerable appetite. It was six o'clock in the evening. Suddenly, a boy, fourteen or fifteen years of age, mounted on a bare-backed horse that was literally white with foam, came dashing full speed into the village, scattering the fires that had been lighted in the street, and causing a woful disturbance among the temporary kitchens of the hungry soldiers. Regardless of the curses and threats vociferated after him, he galloped on, and only drew bit when he reached the centre of the town, where he inquired for the quarters of the general, for whom, he said, he had most important intelligence. Having, at length, been brought before Espartero, he stated that he had seen Negri and his division, not above two or three leagues off, marching in the direction of the Carrascal.

Espartero could at first hardly credit this. None of the information he had had through more regular channels led him to believe the enemy so near. He suspected it might be some stratagem of the Carlists to put him on a wrong scent, and cross-questioned the boy severely and minutely. The lad, however, was perfectly consistent in his replies; nobody had sent him, he said; he saw the Carlists, took a horse out of a field, and came immediately to inform the general.

It would not do to lose a chance. Espartero gave a few hurried orders to his aides-de-camp; and the next minute the tired soldiers were disturbed in their culinary preparations by the roll of drums and braying of trumpets. Horses were resaddled, knapsacks and muskets resumed, half-cooked rations thrust into holster-pipes and haversacks, and in an incredibly short time the division was again on the march. Upon reaching the place where the boy said he had seen the Carlists, we found indications of the passage of a body of troops. This gave fresh ardor to the pursuit, but, nevertheless, the men were so tired, that it was evident they would never be able to overtake the light-footed mountaineers, we were in search of, and Espartero resolved to push on with his escort, leaving the others to follow more slowly.

La Escolta! Adelante la Escolta! was the cry, and away we went; Espartero, his staff and aides-de-camp, about twenty in number, followed by the escort, in all about one hundred horsemen, the best mounted in the division. The lad who had brought the news was with us. The general had promised him a large reward if he had spoken the truth; a rope and a tree, if he was misleading us. The poor boy seemed dreadfully frightened at this, but at the same time persisted in his story.

On we went, at a hand-gallop where the ground was good, as fast as we could where it was steep and broken. We at length reached the Carrascal, which is a table-land of considerable extent on the top of a chain of mountains; this was fine ground for a canter, and we made the most of it. At last, after a rapid and fagging march, we found ourselves, at about two hours before daybreak, on a sort of ridge, whence, looking downwards, we saw the fires of the Carlists who were bivouacked around two or three cottages, which served probably as quarters for their leaders. The night was very black, and we could see nothing but the fires, or occasionally the dark form of some sentinel pacing to and fro before their light. There was perfect stillness in the camp; the Carlists were sleeping, totally unsuspecting of our vicinity.

On our part, we could do nothing but wait for daylight, by which time we trusted the division would be up. It was tantalizing in the extreme to be so close to the enemy, whom we might easily have surprised, and not to have sufficient men to attack him; although, even had we been more numerous, it would still have been the best policy to wait till morning, for in the confusion of a night attack many of the Carlists would doubtless have escaped. There we remained then, perfectly still, awaiting the arrival of the division. It was a most exciting situation; and we were in a fever of anxiety and suspense, fearful lest our prey might yet slip through our fingers. We listened to every sound of the wind and rustle amongst the trees, taking it for the tramp of our approaching troops, although we knew well enough that they must still be a long way behind us.

Two hours passed in this manner, during which we saw the bivouac fires one after the other smoulder away, and become extinguished. At last the faint tinge of gray appeared in the east; a brass band was heard clanging out the diana, and immediately all was bustle and preparation among the Carlists. They were soon ready for the march, and presently we saw a long dark line winding like a huge snake through the glimmering twilight; it was the Carlist column moving rapidly away, refreshed by the night's repose, and marching at a pace which made it pretty evident we should never catch them if we waited the coming up of our tired comrades. It was a risky thing to do, to attack upwards of two thousand men with only a hundred dragoons; but the temptation was great, and Espartero was just the man to give way to it Putting himself at the head of the escort, he gave the word, and dashed after the Carlists at a gallop. As soon as the latter perceived us, their handful of cavalry faced about, and made as if they would have charged us, but when they saw us coming steadily on, they turned and went off at a saute-qui-peut sort of pace, which soon carried them to a safe distance. We did not care much about them; there were two thousand infantry marching in a column of fours, and we considered that if we made sure of those, it would not be a bad morning's work. We soon overtook them, and without striking a blow, or killing or wounding a single man, we cantered along the side of the column, shouting as we passed, "Halt! Down with your arms! Quarter for all!" The Carlists thought, no doubt, that a whole division was upon them, and, panic-struck, they obeyed our orders, and halted as they were bid. We rode to the very head of the column, right in front of everything, and then halted and faced about, and there we were with all our troubles before us: two thousand prisoners to keep, and a hundred men to keep them!

It was now getting pretty light, and the Carlists were able to see our small numbers. Certainly, if they had chosen to give us a volley, they might have exterminated us, but they still supposed the division to be close at our heels, and thought it better to submit with a good grace. When it became broad daylight, and half an hour or more had elapsed without any accession to our strength, I saw some of the Carlist officers looking at one another, as much as to say, "They have had too cheap a bargain of us." We were scarcely even numerous enough to guard the muskets, and we should have found ourselves in the awkward position of having caught a Tartar, but for the very temerity of the attack, which prevented the enemy from suspecting how far we were from our main body. All remained quiet, and at last, to our great joy, the division came up, and our prisoners were secured, not a man escaping, except the cavalry and Count Negri himself, who accompanied them in their flight, and returned mightily crestfallen to the Carlist country.

Inquiries were now made for the lad who had brought the information concerning the whereabouts of the enemy; it appeared that he had been so terrified and confused by the menace of being shot or hung if he misled us, that when we charged he seized the opportunity of escaping. He concealed himself in some village, and several days elapsed before he could be traced; at last he was discovered, and by Espartero's orders munificently rewarded for the important service he had rendered to the queen's cause.

From Hood's Magazine.

A SONG OF THE SEASON.

THERE is a voice through our city sent,
But not with its thousand murmurs blent;
For it hath no part in the jarring sounds
That rise in a city's troubled bounds.

But it tells of the flowers by rock and rill

Whose breath the breezes bring;

And the words of that pleasant voice are still—

"Come forth to meet the spring;

For she comes as full of promise yet

As when Eden's flowers her footsteps met.

"Come forth, for the light of her smile hath shone
On the far old hills and forests lone;
They are green with the dews of gentle showers,
They are rich in the odors of early flowers.

Come forth, for the buds of another spring

May all as brightly bloom;

But the trees of the churchyard's growth may fling

Their shade o'er many a tomb,

And eyes that are beaming brightly now

May gaze no more on the blossomed bough."

They hear that summons loud and long,

In the crowded haunts of the toiling throng;

It fills the dreams of the 'prisoned child

With songs of the woodbirds sweet and wild;

But it whispers love in the sleepless ear

Of the maiden young and pale,

Of a cottage home by a fountain clear,

In a far and sunny vale.

And the young heart answers with a prayer

For the lot of the birds and blossoms there.

It speaks by the prison's dreary walls,

Of plains where the oak's broad shadow falls,

Of dewy dells and of breezy steeps,

Where the stream in its path of freedom sweeps:

And, oh! how its faintest murmurs rise

By the sick and lonely bed,

For they tell of the health and hope that lies

Where the wood-flowers' scents are shed;

But the spring that shines on that slumberer's dreams

Hath never brightened our earthly streams.

It speaks, in the student's lonely room,

Of sweeter love, where the violets bloom

By homes or graves, where he left the truth

And love, perchance, of his blighted youth,

Till the weary eye from pen and page

Turns fondly back at last

To the joy of its early heritage,

In the glow of summers past;

For nought that can meet his onward gaze

Hath half the light of those vanished days.

It breathes on the exile's hours of rest

A dream of the land he loves the best;

Till its scenes arise to his memory's view,

Still bright with the springs his childhood knew,

Oh! could such blessed dreams restore

To the withered hearts of men,

The bloom of those early springs once more!

For the flowers may come again;

But they never can be what they have been

To the heart before it lost its green.

"Come forth, come forth;" how that joyous call
Is sent like the winds of heaven to all!

But it comes in vain to many a heart,

For whom life hath lost its better part.

Ah! wo for the hopeless years that bring

No summers in their flight;

But joy to the land of our promised spring,

Where the bloom is ever bright;

For hearts who have lost their verdure here

May find it yet in that fadeless sphere.

Thus faintly murmurs a broken string,

Awoke by the passing breath of spring;

But it wakens no more the harp whose swell

Hath echoed its sweetest tones so well.

We heard them far, and we loved them long,

That gentle harp and hand;

But they left our paths for the ceaseless song

Of the minstrel's "Better Land,"

And the isles may listen long in vain,

Till the spring-breeze wakes such a harp again.

Digitized by FRANCES BROWN.

From Hood's Magazine.

THREATENING LETTER TO THOMAS HOOD,
FROM AN ANCIENT GENTLEMAN.
BY FAVOR OF CHARLES DICKENS.

[For the benefit of country gentlemen, it may be well to explain, that the neglect of men of Letters, Science and Art, by the Queen—her great attention to General Tom Thumb, and to the Ojibbeway Indians, (one of whom married an English—Lady, so an English traveller would have called her had she married here,) are the causes of this writer's alarm. He takes occasion to say a word in favor of perpetual copyright.]

MR. HOOD—SIR,—The constitution is going at last! You needn't laugh, Mr. Hood. I am aware that it has been going, two or three times before; perhaps four times; but it is on the move now, sir, and no mistake.

I beg to say, that I use those last expressions advisedly, sir, and not in the sense in which they are now used by jackanapeses. There were no jackanapeses when I was a boy, Mr. Hood. England was Old England when I was young. I little thought it would ever come to be Young England when I was old. But every thing is going backward.

Ah! governments were governments, and judges were judges, in my day, Mr. Hood. There was no nonsense then. Any of your seditious complainings, and we were ready with the military on the shortest notice. 'We should have charged Covent Garden Theatre, sir, on a Wednesday night: at the point of the bayonet. Then, the judges were full of dignity and firmness, and knew how to administer the law. There is only one judge who knows how to do his duty, now. He tried that revolutionary female the other day, who, though she was in full work (making shirts at three-halfpence a piece,) had no pride in her country, but treasonably took it in her head, in the distraction of having been robbed of her easy earnings, to attempt to drown herself and her young child; and the glorious man went out of his way, sir—out of his way—to call her up for instant sentence of Death; and to tell her she had no hope of mercy in this world—as you may see yourself if you look in the papers of Wednesday, the 17th of April. He won't be supported sir, I know he won't; but it is worth remembering that his words were carried into every manufacturing town of this kingdom, and read aloud to crowds in every political parlor, beer-shop, news-room, and secret or open place of assembly, frequented by the discontented working men; and that no milk-and-water weakness on the part of the executive can ever blot them out. Great things like that, are caught up, and stored up, in these times, and are not forgotten, Mr. Hood. 'The public at large (especially those who wish for peace and conciliation) are universally obliged to him. If it is reserved for any man to set the Thames on fire, it is reserved for him; and indeed I am told he very nearly did it, once.

But even he won't save the constitution, sir; it is inauled beyond his power of preservation. Do you know in what foul weather it will be sacrificed and shipwrecked, Mr. Hood! Do you know on what rock it will strike, sir! You don't, I am certain; for nobody does know, as yet, but myself. I will tell you.

The constitution will go down, sir (nautically speaking,) in the degeneration of the human species in England, and its reduction into a mingled race of savages and pigmies.

That is my proposition. That is my prediction. That is the event of which I give you warning. I am now going to prove it, sir.

You are a literary man, Mr. Hood, and have written, I am told, some things worth reading. I say I am told, because I never read what is written in these days. You'll excuse me; but my principle is, that no man ought to know any thing about his own time, except that it is the worst time that ever was, or is ever likely to be. That is the only way, sir, to be truly wise and happy.

In your station as a literary man, Mr. Hood, you are frequently at the court of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen. God bless her! You have reason to know that the three great keys to the royal palace (after rank and politics) are Science, Literature, Art. I don't approve of this myself. I think it ungenteeled and barbarous, and quite un-English; the custom having been a foreign one, ever since the reigns of the uncivilised sultans in the Arabian Nights, who always called the wise men of their time about them. But so it is. And when you don't dine at the royal table, there is always a knife and fork for you at the equerries' table: where I understand, all gifted men are made particularly welcome.

But all men can't be gifted, Mr. Hood. Neither scientific, literary, nor artistical powers are any more to be inherited than the property arising from scientific, literary, or artistic productions, which the law, with a beautiful imitation of nature, declines to protect in the second generation. Very good, sir. Then, people are naturally very prone to cast about in their minds for other means of getting at Court-Favor; and, watching the signs of the times, to hew out for themselves, or their descendants, the likeliest roads to that distinguished goal.

Mr. Hood, it is pretty clear, from recent records in the Court Circular, that if a father wish to train up his son in the way he should go, to go to Court: and cannot indenture him to be a scientific man, an author, or an artist, three courses are open to him. He must endeavor by artificial means to make him a dwarf, a wild man, or a Boy Jones.

Now, sir, this is the shoal and quicksand on which the constitution will go to pieces.

I have made inquiry, Mr. Hood, and find that in my neighborhood two families and a fraction out of every four, in the lower and middle classes of society, are studying and practising all conceivable arts to keep their infant children down. Understand me. I do not mean down in their numbers, or down in their precocity, but down in their growth, sir. A destructive and subduing drink, compounded of gin and milk in equal quantities, such as is given to puppies to retard their growth: not something short, but something shortening: is administered to these young creatures many times a day. An unnatural and artificial thirst is first awakened in these infants by meals of salt beef, bacon, anchovies, sardines, red herrings, shrimps, olives, pea-soup, and that description of diet; and when they screech for drink, in accents that might melt a heart of stone, which they do constantly (I allude to screeching, not to melting,) this liquid is introduced into their too confiding stomachs. At such an early age, and to so great an extent, is this custom of provoking thirst, then quenching it with a stunting drink, observed, that brine-pap has already superseded the use of tops and bottoms; and wet-nurses, previously free from any kind of reproach, have been seen to stagger in the streets; owing, sir, to the quantity of gin introduced into their systems, with a view to its gradual and natural conversion into the fluid I have already mentioned.

Upon the best calculation I can make, this is going on, as I have said, in the proportion of about two families and a fraction in four. In one more family, and a fraction out of the same number, efforts are being made to reduce the children to a state of nature; and to inculcate, at a tender age, the love of raw flesh, train oil, new rum, and the acquisition of scalps. Wild and outlandish dances are also in vogue, (you will have observed the prevailing rage for the Polka,) and savage cries and whoops are much indulged in (as you may discover, if you doubt it, in the House of Commons any night.) Nay, some persons, Mr. Hood—and persons of some figure and distinction too—have already succeeded in breeding wild sons; who have been publicly shown in the Courts of Bankruptcy, and in police-offices, and in other commodious exhibition-rooms, with great effect, but who have not yet found favor at court; in consequence, as I infer, of the impression made by Mr. Rankin's wild men being two fresh and recent. To say nothing of Mr. Rankin's wild men being foreigners.

I need not refer you, sir, to the late instance of the Ojibbeway Bride. But I am credibly informed, that she is on the eve of retiring into a savage fastness, where she may bring forth and educate a wild family, who shall in course of time, by the dexterous use of the popularity they are certain to acquire at Windsor and St. James', divide with dwarfs the principal offices of state, of patronage, and power, in the United Kingdom.

Consider the deplorable consequences, Mr. Hood, which must result from these proceedings, and the encouragement they receive in the highest quarters.

The dwarf being the favorite, sir, it is certain that the public mind will run in a great and eminent degree upon the production of dwarfs. Perhaps the failures only will be brought up, wild. The imagination goes a long way in these cases; and all that the imagination can do, will be done, and is doing. You may convince yourself of this, by observing the condition of those ladies who take particular notice of General Tom Thumb at the Egyptian Hall, during his hours of performance.

The rapid increase of dwarfs, will be first felt in her Majesty's recruiting department. The standard will, of necessity, be lowered; the dwarfs will grow smaller and smaller; the vulgar expression "a man of his inches" will become a figure of fact, instead of a figure of speech; crack regiments, household-troops especially, will pick the smallest men from all parts of the country; and in the two little porticoes at the Horse Guards, two Tom Thumbs will be daily seen doing duty, mounted on a pair of Shetland ponies. Each of them will be relieved (as Tom Thumb is, at this moment, in the intervals of his performance) by a wild man; and a British grenadier will either go into a quart pot, or be an Old Boy, a Blue Gull, a Flying Bull, or some other savage chief of that nature.

I will not expatiate upon the number of dwarfs who will be found representing Grecian statues in all parts of the metropolis; because I am inclined to think that this will be a change for the better; and that the engagement of two or three in Trafalgar Square will tend to the improvement of the public taste.

The various genteel employments at court being held by dwarfs, sir, it will be necessary to alter, in some respects, the present regulations. It is quite clear that not even General Tom Thumb himself could preserve a becoming dignity on state occasions, if required to walk about with a scaffolding-pole under his arm; therefore the gold and silver sticks at present used, must be cut down into skewers of those precious metals; a twig of the black rod will be quite as much as can be conveniently preserved; the coral and bells of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, will be used in lieu of the mace at present in existence; and that bauble (as Oliver Cromwell called it, Mr. Hood,) its value being first calculated by Mr. Finlayson, the government actuary, will be placed to the credit of the National Debt.

All this, sir, will be the death of the constitution. But this is not all. The constitution dies hard, perhaps; but there is enough disease impending, Mr. Hood, to kill it three times over.

Wild men will get into the House of Commons. Imagine that, sir! Imagine Strong Wind in the House of Commons! It is not an easy matter to get through a debate now; but, I say, imagine Strong Wind, speaking for the benefit of his constituents, upon the floor of the House of Commons! or imagine (which is pregnant with more awful consequences still) the ministry having an interpreter in the House of Commons, to tell the country, in English, what it really means!

Why, sir, that in itself would be blowing the constitution out of the mortar in St. James' Park, and leaving nothing of it to be seen but smoke.

But this, I repeat it, is the state of things to which we are fast tending, Mr. Hood; and I inclose my card for your private eye, that you may be quite certain of it. What the condition of this country will be, when its standing army is composed of dwarfs, with here and there a wild man to throw its ranks into confusion, like the elephants employed in war in former times, I leave you to imagine, sir. It may be objected by some hopeful jackanapeses, that the number of impressions in the navy, consequent upon the seizure of the Boy-Joneses, or remaining portion of the population ambitious of court favor, will be in itself sufficient to defend our Island from foreign invasion. But I tell those jackanapeses, sir, that, while I admit the wisdom of the Boy Jones precedent, of kidnapping such youths after the expiration of their several terms of imprisonment as vagabonds; hurrying them on board ship; and packing them off to sea again whenever they venture to take the air on shore; I deny the justice of the inference; inasmuch as it appears to me, that the inquiring minds of those young outlaws must naturally lead to their being hanged by the enemy as spies, early in their career; and before they shall have been rated on the books of our fleet as able seamen.

Such, Mr. Hood, sir, is the prospect before us! And unless you, and some of your friends who have influence at Court, can get up a giant as a forlorn hope, it is all over with this ill-fated land.

In reference to your own affairs, sir, you will take whatever course may seem to you most prudent and advisable after this warning. It is not a warning to be slighted; that I happen to know.

I am informed by the gentleman who favors this, that you have recently been making some changes and improvements in your Magazine, and are, in point of fact, starting afresh. If I be well informed, and this be really so, rely upon it that you cannot start too small, sir. Come down to the duodecimo size instantly, Mr. Hood. Take time by the forelock; and, reducing the stature of your Magazine every month, bring it at last to the dimensions of the little almanack no longer issued, I regret to say, by the ingenious Mr. Schloss: which was invisible to the naked eye until examined through a little eye-glass. You project, I am told, the publication of a new novel, by yourself, in the pages of your Magazine. A word in your ear. I am not a young man, sir, and have had some experience. Don't put your own name on the title-page; it would be suicide and madness. Treat with General Tom Thumb, Mr. Hood, for the use of his name on any terms. If the gallant general should decline to treat with you, get Mr. Barnum's name, which is the next best in the market. And when, through this politic course, you shall have received, in presents, a richly-jewelled set of tablets from Buckingham Palace, and a gold watch and appendages from Marlborough House; and when those valuable trinkets shall be left under a glass case at your publisher's for inspection by your friends and the public in general;—then, sir, you will do me the justice of remembering this communication.

It is unnecessary for me to add, after what I have observed in the course of this letter, that I am not,

Sir,
Ever
Your CONSTANT READER.

Tuesday, 23d April, 1844.

P. S.—Impress it upon your contributors that they cannot be too short; and that if not dwarfish, they must be wild—or at all events not tame.

CHESS STUDIES.

Chess Studies: comprising One Thousand Games, actually played during the last Half Century. By GEORGE WALKER.—Longman and Co.

MR. WALKER'S boast that this collection of specimens of chess skill is unique, and that it will form a complete encyclopædia of reference to the student and player of chess, is quite just and well-founded. It contains upwards of a thousand games, almost all of them the classical exploits of the best chess-warriors of the age.

And, since any record of games was kept, what age in the annals of chess-warfare has surpassed our own—either in attack or defence, in “desperate assault or siege and mine,” in “brilliancy of imagination, thirst for invention, judgment of position,” or eminent view of the board? Let Mr. Walker answer:

“Should the bygone century taunt us with Philidor, Bernard, or Legalle, we reply with De la Bourdonnais, Des Chapelles, and M'Donnell:—bearded by Boncourt, and Sarraut; by Lolli, Del Rio, and Ponziani,—we proudly oppose to them the names of Cochrane, of St. Amant, of Staunton, of Der Lasa, of Szen, and Kieseritzkij. Moreover, with a Chess Museum before us like the present, we can equally adjust the claims to renown presented by the great living players of all the countries of Europe, opposed on the Chess-field in arms to each other. Petroff and Janisch in the frozen north—St. Amant, Calvi, La Roche and Kieseritzkij in their sunny France—Heydebrand Der Lasa, Szen, Lowenthal, and Bledow of Germany—Perigal, Staunton, and Daniels in London town—all pass severally in array before us, like soldiers on parade, or beauties at a court drawing-room.”

This is the proper tone of enthusiasm, and Mr. Walker is one of the few English players living who has the right to use it. He places Mr. Staunton at the head of that select few, and is probably right. But there are not many men, in his position, that would have offered the first rank so freely.

With what a pleasant ardor he also speaks of Mr. Cochrane. This royal and venerable war of chess is certainly the most humanizing of the military sciences.

“Of Mr. Cochrane it may be said, with greater truth than Johnson writes of Shakspeare, that ‘he lost the world for a quibble, and was content to lose it.’ Mr. Cochrane could have been the Philidor of the age; but would not. His ardent temperament, as a Chess-player, runs away with his judgment; disdaining to track a beaten path, even if certain victory present itself in the vista of the route. Mr. Cochrane's banner bears for its device, ‘Attack, attack.’ Attack at all risk—attack at every cost. Mr. Cochrane is the most brilliant player I have ever had the honor to look over or confront; not even excepting De la Bourdonnais; and pity it is that his very brilliancy so often mars success. Mr. C.'s game may be compared to the very dashing charges made by the Mamelukes at the Battle of the Pyramids; when they impaled themselves, horse and man, upon the bayonets of France.”

Mr. Walker's Chess Studies are in ten chapters: of which the first four are devoted to the most celebrated games of De la Bourdonnais, M'Donnell, and Philidor; the fifth to Philidor's contemporaries; the sixth to Mouret's clever artifices with the automaton-player; the seventh to the best games by correspondence; (this is a very interesting section;) and the remainder to the highest efforts of general modern play, both at home and abroad. The last chapter, with its subdivision of sections illustrative of the various openings, and of the game in all its stages, is in itself, as we have said, a complete encyclopædia of chess reference.

Every student and lover of this fascinating game should possess himself of Mr. Walker's book.—Examiner.

THE letters and despatches of Nelson are at length about to be collected and published, in a form corresponding with Colonel Gurwood's celebrated work, “The Wellington Despatches.” The task has been undertaken by a gentleman, Sir Harris Nicolas, whose previous publications are strong evidence of his fitness; indeed, we should have some difficulty in fixing upon one better calculated, from talents and industry, to accomplish the object, and we therefore appeal to all who are in possession of letters and other documents to come forward and assist Sir Harris in the completion of a work of such vast national importance.—Naval and Military Gazette, Google

THE "STRONG WIND" IN ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

PUNCH has the pleasure to record an interesting event which occurred on Tuesday, the 9th instant. NOT-EN-A-AKM, or "the Strong Wind," interpreter of the Ojibbeway Indians, was married to SARAH HAINES, which name, translated into the Ojibbeway language, means "the London Fog." The ceremony was performed in St. Martin's Church. The Ojibbeway Indians attended, and, with a fine sense of the struggles of matrimonial life, appeared in their war-paint.

Some folks have grumbled at this union; they know nothing of history. The truth is, as we will prove, we owe a large dividend of wives to American savages, and SARAH HAINES, or "the London Fog," is only the first instalment of a long-standing debt.

In April, 1613, PRINCESS POCAHONTAS gave her maiden hand to JOHN ROLFE, "a discreet young Englishman." Yes; "in the little church of Jamestown," says the historian, "which rested on pine columns fresh from the forest, and was in a style of rugged architecture, as wild, if not as frail, as an Indian wigwam," did the beautiful Virginian savage become MRS. JOHN ROLFE. This event happened two hundred and thirty-one years ago, and we have been in debt to the Indians ever since. We put it to MR. HUMR, or any other subtle arithmetician, to calculate the amount of our liabilities. Multiply one wife by two hundred and thirty-one, adding thereto compound interest on the accumulating amount, and our debt to the savages must be something very serious. However, we have begun, though in a small manner, to liquidate it; we have given "the London Fog" to "the Strong Wind," and trust that Pennsylvanian bondholders will take example by our honesty.

We have a superabundant female population. This fact is on all hands allowed and deplored. We see an easy remedy for this. Let parties of Indians be imported. Let us have samples of the Chippewas, the Dog-Ribbed, the Sioux, the Choc-taws—indeed, a company of every tribe of wild men, from Hottentots to Greenlanders—and let them be let loose in our various towns for the sole purpose of captivating the hearts, and so carrying away in lawful wedlock, our superabundant females. By this means we shall honestly liquidate our long-standing debt to the savages, and shall, at the same time, relieve ourselves of over-populousness. War-paint, glass beads, tattoo-work, and tomahawks, have a sweet and proper influence on the female mind. What says the splenetic Philip Van Artevelde?

"——the women's heaven

Is vanity, and that is over all.

What's fiercest still finds favor in their eyes;

What's noisiest keeps the entrance of their ears;

The noise and blaze of arms enchants them most.

Wit, too, and wisdom, that's admired of all,

They can admire—the glory, not the thing.

An unreflected light did never yet

Dazzle the vision feminine."

From which caustic philosophy we may gather this fact, that a savage, to be considered "quite a love" by a civilized maiden, must first be exhibited in front of the lamps.

However, as the romantic devotion shown by MISS SARAH HAINES, or "the London Fog," for NOT-EN-A-AKM, or "the Strong Wind," will doubtless become a fashion among our too susceptible countrywomen, we only perform a public duty in enumerating a few of the accomplishments required by a North American Indian of his wife or squaw. She tills the ground, she digs, she sows, she reaps: she pounds the parched corn; she dries the buffalo meat; she carries home the game that her husband kills; she hews wood and draws the water; she builds the wigwam, and in times of journeying carries the poles upon her shoulder. Think of this, young ladies, and say whether it is not more pleasant to hatch canary birds in white satin, and work puppies' heads in Berlin wool? However, for the ruder and more picturesque operations, "the London Fog" is, doubtless, duly prepared; and, therefore, let us return to the sacrifice of the bride, "attired in flowing white," with a "wreath of orange blossoms circling her hair," in St. Martin's Church.

The ceremony was particularly solemn. When "the London Fog" was asked if she would take "the Strong Wind" for her "wedded husband," she replied "I will," with an emphasis that showed she had duly weighed the responsibilities of hewing, and delving, and shouldering the wigwam poles. "The Strong Wind," in the most charming way, took the ring from his nose, and placed it on the finger of "the London Fog." He then in the "most graceful manner" kissed his bride, to the satisfaction of everybody, "the London Fog" included. MRS. ELLIS, we were happy to perceive, was in the church, and in the handsomest manner presented to MRS. "STRONGWIND" The Wives of England, bound in hymeneal white satin; with a copy of her forthcoming work, entitled Can Woman make a Lobster-Salad!

It will particularly gratify our female readers to learn that "the Strong Wind" has promised "the London Fog," on their return to America, to take no other wife, but to remain constant, "solely to her." Should "the Strong Wind" break this pledge, of course "the London Fog" will have the readiest redress at any of the Ecclesiastical Courts to be found in the back woods.

When the bridegroom led the bride to her carriage, there was a shout from the multitude, evidently meant as an approval of the fine moral courage of a young lady, who gives up the sickly refinements of civilized life for the invigorating comforts of savage existence. When the carriage drove off, the crowd shouted again, and the crowd was right; for "the Strong Wind" had carried away, for good and all, "the London Fog."

"The Strong Wind" exhibited himself with his friends, the Ojibbeways, the day after his marriage; and it says much for the liberality of the keeper of the show, that the public were allowed to see the bridegroom without the charge of an additional sixpence. "The London Fog" was to have been visible at the Egyptian Hall, but was prevented by her friends. She ought to have exhibited; it would have been in complete keeping with the pure taste that dictated the marriage.

It is only due to MR. RANKIN, the showman, to observe that he managed the wedding with a fine eye to all advertising purposes.—Punch.

We have reason to believe that his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias will arrive in this country on a visit to her Majesty in the course of a few weeks. The Emperor is expected about the second week in May.—Times.

THE NEW-MARRIED OJIBBEWAY INDIAN.—

Though we do not usually interfere with matters of a private nature, yet a case of so peculiar a character has been brought to our notice, that we are induced to give the statement publicly, with the hope of drawing forth a satisfactory explanation of the circumstance. A correspondent informs us that Mr. Rankin, who brought over and is now exhibiting the Ojibbeway Indians, and who used his influence to promote the marriage of the interpreter of the party, Cadotte, to a respectable young female, desired the bride to remain in the room with the Indians to render the exhibition more attractive. On her declining to do so, he dismissed, so our correspondent asserts, Cadotte from his party, and the poor Indian, without employment or finances, is now left destitute with his newly-married wife on his hands. We give this statement as it has reached us, with the view of eliciting a satisfactory explanation. We have, of course, no feeling in the matter, and can bear Mr. Rankin no ill will. But, if the facts be as stated, he certainly owes it to himself and to the public, who have largely patronized this singular and interesting exhibition, to publish some justification of his conduct.—Britannia.

QUICK TRAVELLING.—A few days since, her Majesty's packet, Princess Alice, having on board Mr. Robins, an English messenger, arrived at Dover, from Calais, after a passage of one hour and forty-five minutes. The messenger was just in time for the eleven o'clock train, in which he took his place, and arrived at London at three o'clock; performing the whole distance from Calais to the metropolis, via Dover, in the unprecedented short time of five hours and forty-five minutes!

GALVANIC TELEGRAPH.—The first intelligence of the arrival of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, from Germany, on Thursday week, was communicated to her majesty at Windsor Castle, by means of the galvanic telegraph on the line of the Great Western Railway. Within one minute of the arrival of his Royal Highness at the Paddington terminus, the information had reached Slough, at which station a special messenger was stationed by command of the queen, who proceeded with the intelligence to the castle, where he arrived in eight minutes and a half from the time of his leaving Slough.

THE DISTRESSED NEEDLEWOMEN OF LONDON.—A grand concert in favor of the funds of the Society for the Protection and Employment of the distressed Needlewomen in London, was given last night at Covent-garden theatre. A more deserving object for the sympathies of the public than the unfortunate class for whom they were appealed to on this occasion cannot be imagined; and after all the eloquent appeals and the heart-rending disclosures of which they have of late been the daily object, it was not only a matter of regret but astonishment to find the house presenting the miserable aspect which it did. This cannot be imputed to the want of enticement in the programme, for certainly it was in every respect an attractive one, embracing the names of Ernst, Moscheles, Madame Dulcken, Parish Alvares, Madame and Signor F. Lablache, Miss Romer, and Miss S. Flower. A very full and effective orchestra was also in attendance, and in every respect the arrangements were such as, considering in addition the main object of the concert, would have justified a far different anticipation. In the course of the evening, Hood's "Song of the Shirt," which has been admirably set to music by Mr. J. H. Tully, was sung by Miss Romer. That the funds of the society can have derived much benefit from last night's enterprise cannot be expected; let us hope that they may shortly be increased by a more direct application of public charity.

GOVERNESS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The first anniversary festival in support of the funds of this charity was celebrated on Saturday, at the London Tavern, the Duke of Cambridge in the chair. The report showed among the subscribers, her majesty the Queen Dowager, £20; the noble chairman, £20; the Duchess of Gloucester, £10. The total amount was £1052 18s. 6d. During the evening many toasts were given. We feel pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to an institution for the comfort and relief of aged, infirm, and destitute governesses.

The King of Naples has appointed a commission of twenty-two members to collect and prepare for publication all the remarkable unpublished manuscripts connected with the history of his territories, which are to be met with in either the public or private libraries. It is supposed that the labors of this commission will, owing to the immense number of manuscripts, continue from twelve to fifteen years.

CHRISTIAN SEPULCHRE.—It is stated that a number of Christian catacombs, supposed to be of the earliest age of that faith, and the first ever found in Greece, have been discovered near Milo.

CREDULITY.—In the villages around Wakefield, for some time past, many of the poorer inhabitants have firmly believed in some vague prophecy that the world was to have been at an end on last (Good) Friday. As an instance of this, a man residing at Lee-fair, a week or two since, actually killed two pigs, his property, and distributed the pork amongst his neighbors, in order that they might "eat and be merry," before they died!

SYRIAN MEDICAL AID ASSOCIATION.—On Wednesday a public meeting was held at the Hall of Commerce in aid of the above association. Lord R. Grosvenor presided. The association originated about two years ago with a few benevolent individuals who were impressed with the wretched condition of the inhabitants of the land of Palestine as far as medical relief was concerned, there not being a single resident qualified practitioner either in Palestine or Syria, which countries had a population of about two millions. An agent was sent out, in 1842, to Beyrout, in the person of Dr. Thomas Kearns, whose success rendered the practicability of the undertaking no longer problematical. During the first year of his residence he relieved no less than four thousand two hundred and ninety-eight patients, including many difficult and important surgical operations, performed to the satisfaction of all parties. The Dispensary House at Beyrout is beset at all hours by persons of every denomination, who are anxious to obtain advice for themselves or relatives. Many have to traverse the rocky regions of Lebanon, a distance of thirty or forty miles; whilst others come even from Damascus, because in that great city, although there is a population varying from one hundred and twenty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand, there is not a single medical man who is worthy of their confidence; those who profess "the healing art" being either charm-venders, magicians, or adventurers. The following is given in a letter from Dr. Kearns, as a happy illustration of the state of Syrian surgical practice:—"A man fell from a walnut-tree, a height of thirty feet; his arm was broken, and his body severely bruised. On taking him up, the people instantly killed a sheep, and, stripping off the patient's clothes, wrapped him up in the warm sheepskin, (the fleshy side inwards,) broken bones and all, like a mummy! I saw him twelve hours after the accident, and he was then steaming in his new dress. Hearing who I was, they very gladly availed themselves of my services; and I left them quite satisfied with a more enlightened plan of treatment." The claims of the institution were ably advocated by the chairman, Mr. Buckingham, Dr. Croly, and others.

From Bentley's Miscellany.

THE OMEN.

A LEGEND OF BERGEN-OP-ZOOM.

BEFORE the bombardment of Bergen-op-Zoom,
(Not the fatal attack when Skerret and Gore,
Macdonald, and Carelton, and numberless more,
Were lost to their country, and plunged us in gloom;) But the siege when, old Cumberland acting as bat-holder,
Maurice of Saxony warr'd with the Stadtholder,
Still, as the fire of his batteries got more range,
Redoubling the cry of—"No quarter to Orange!"—
So that, when the poor city surrendered,—'t was sack'd
Which seems a great shame, and is called a great fact!—

Well,—before THAT bombardment of Bergen-op-Zoom,
In one of the aisles of its stately cathedral,
To all English travellers, a wonderful tomb
Was specially pointed to note by the beadle.—
And the moment the eye of the stranger espied it,
Though others more showy by half stood beside it,
Every monument there, whether urn, bust, or slab,
he
Held cheap, as the tombstones in Westminster Abbey,
Which headless and dusty, look shockingly shabby :
Or St. Paul's, where on payment
Of twopence a head,
In a temple to pray meant
They peep-show the dead ;
Where beadle and verger
So cruel a scourge are,
And keen Dean and Chapter
To screw one so apt are,
That Sir Christopher Wren would their robbing dis-
own,
Could he do in St. Faith's what he pleased with his own.

On marble Archdukes
In flowing perukes,
A Dutch burgomaster
In pure alabaster ;
Electors in steel, and Archbishops of Zealand,
All mitred and crosiered,
(You'd fancy their prose ye heard,)
People listlessly gaz'd, like the cockneys who go
To stare at the wax-work of Madame Tussaud,
Stiff as pokers or pikestaffs, and ugly as sin,
Lord Palmerston,—Nap,—and Commissioner Lin!—
But awful to view was the wonderful tomb,
Beside the high altar of Bergen-op-Zoom :
Its emblems mysteriously hinting a doom
That might take out the shine in cadaverous gloom
Of the tales of Monk Lewis, Ann Radcliff, and Co.,
Once the popular authors of gens comme il faut.—

To remind us that fragile as glass human fate is,
A lesson old Time still imparts to one gratis,
It bore the sad text,—“VANITAS VANITATIS!”—
And the emblems,—I shudder in writing the tale,—
Were a skull on a looking-glass,—parti per pale :—
The technical term may be wrong :—of Sir Harris
Exactness in matters heraldic the care is ;
But the objects were plac'd,—as your forefathers saw,
Sir,—
The skull like a teacup,—the glass like a saucer.—

Such a blazon announc'd to the prosy and dull,
Not a crack in the glass, but a crack in the skull,—
Till the terrible legend was told to its ending.
But a moment for breath, if you please! 'T were like blending

Ash-Wednesday in sackcloth with loose Mardi Gras, if
We touch'd on such horrors without a new paragraph!—

By the Frith of Forth
In the canny North
Once dwelt a noble man ;—
Brave, braw, and spruce
Was young Lord Bruce,
A farthing of Queen Anne!—
The gamesome and the gay among,
He bore away the belle ;
But belles, alas! can wag a tongue
Their right to rings to tell ;
And when some blustering brother talks
Of Mantons and eight paces,
Even fighting Smith, or doughty Dan
Or Lady Sale, or Cardigan,
Or valiant Jack, the Cornish man,
Might wish he dar'd to walk his chalks
And ne'er had seen their faces!—

However, Lord Bruce was so general a favorite,
That, do what he would, 't was the vote of the Lords,
'T would be their own loss were he sent to the grave for it,
So they sheathed their toledos, and swallow'd their words.

'T was the time when from Scotland King Jamie the First
Brought his naked and hungry, our treasures to bone here,
And a cat-and-dog sort of affection was nurst
'Twixt the courtiers of England and stout Caledonia!—
Mid the proudest at court
Young Sackville was seen,—
A champion for England
A knight for a queen :—

Like Bayard the Spotless,—of chivalrous France a star,
Or the preux of our own time, to whom he was ancestor,
Cantilupe,—last of the Dorsets, whose bays
Crown'd heroes and bards in Elizabeth's days,—

Now Sackville detested the Scotch, and protested That Bruce, who just then with his sister was flirting,
If he show'd but his nose in the house, for proposing,
Should be seiz'd by his vassals, and tumbled the dirt in,
Wherever they jostled,—no matter the spot,—
He muttered the insult of—"beggarly Scot!"—
And Bruce, though 't was hard his emotions to smother,
Had not e'en the resource to retort—"you're another!"

A Scotman's devotion pro aris et focis
As the love of the Swiss for their fatherland, close is ;
So that Bruce thus revild, though averse to the action,
Was forced in the end to demand satisfaction.

But as luck will'd, King Jamie, "their gossip and dad,"
Got a hint of the business, and swore with an oath,
"If he heard of a meeting between 'em, egad!
He'd settle in Newgate the hash of them both."—
To the London police
He gave them in charge,
Rehearsing the piece
Of the "Prisoners at large,"—

But they turn'd on their heel, and Set sail straight for Zealand,
With seconds and surgeons
To act in emergency;
And landing at Antwerp, upon the Escout, Sir, Agreed they would fight the next day, at Tergosa.—

'Tis unpleasant to draw
On one's brother-in-law:
And that night, when in bed
Lord Bruce laid his head,
And thought of the sorrow
Might chance on the morrow;
Having supped on sauer-kraut
Pumpnickel and stout,
In which Dutchmen delight,—
He was tortur'd all night

By a nightmare, just such as one dreams in one's flurry
After seeing Macbeth done to rags at the Surrey!—
And awaking at daybreak, "used up," and affrighted,
Beheld what was worse than ten nightmares united!

In that province, where webbed in the foot man and beast are,
A mirror is plac'd in the beds for a tester;
Like a looking-glass stuck in a comfit-box lid,
Multiplying by two what must else have been hid,—
And making the snoozer snooze double,—too bad, O,
My Wordsworth,—to rest on thy Swan and its Shadow!

Therein of course Lord Bruce expected
To see his night-capp'd face reflected;
But lifting up his eyes,—(the wind
With hideous moanings howled the while,—)
Behold a human skull thence grin'd
Most horribly a ghastly smile!—
Oh, omen dire.—Oh, omen dread,—
His face transform'd to a death's head!—

He fainted not, nor call'd for aid
From waiter, or from chambermaid:—
But softly to himself he said,
"I'm a 'gone' coon!—All's up with me!—
My doom is settled—Q. E. D."—
As though by Babbage prov'd, or Whewell,
A victim pre-ordained, he knew well
That adverse fate, with purpose cruel,
Had sworn to pink him in the duel!—
So, having wash'd and said his prayers
He took his sword and walk'd down stairs.

In the record George Sackville has left of their fight,
To prove to all England he was not a scamp,—
He tells us distinctly it rained in the night,
And the meadow they fought in was wretchedly damp.

He felt but the damp to his feet from the grass,—
But the damper of Bruce was the skull in the glass!
And dazzled and desperate, he rush'd like a fool on His foe,—in a style that would shock Monsieur Cou-lon.

From the right breast of Sackville the blood flowed in torrents,
But though pale as a portrait of Canning by Lawrence,
He rallied his strength with a wrench and a start,
And ran his antagonist straight through the heart;
The surgeons drew near,—'t was no manner of use!
As the omen foretold, all was up with Lord Bruce!

The great Earl of Clarendon tells us this story,
And Steele in the Guardian has placed it before ye;
But both have in silence the ghost of the skull,
As an old woman's tale of a cock and a bull.—

Though, when to Culross in process forlorn
The heart of the dead, cas'd in silver was borne,
By his mother those emblems were plac'd on his tomb
Beside the high altar of Bergen-op-Zoom.

MORAL.

The moral of this dread event
Should be inscrib'd on brass;
Refrain, young lords, on conquest bent,
From looking in the glass!

FREE TRANSLATION OF "THE LITTLE FRENCH-MAN'S FIRST LESSON,"

Inscribed, with high admiration of his genius, to M.
de L—, Poet-in-Chief to the "Paris Charivari."

(MAMA LOQUITUR.)

Come and hear me tell,
Little soldier mine,
Of those Ogres fell
Who on Frenchmen dine.
It will make you mad;
It will turn you blue;
Little martial lad,
Little Frenchman true!

Car ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

Men who will not fight
When their neighbors taunt,
Yet who thrash us quite Soundly, when they want:
Those audacious tars,
Morning, noon, and night,
Little son of Mars,
Hold in mortal spite!

Car ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

Curse thou, boy, Poitiers,
Cregy, Azincour,
Blenheim, Talavère,
And a hundred more—
Only Fontenoy—
Name that comes so pat,
Little martial boy
Make the most of that!

Bah! ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

Who burnt JOAN OF ARC
(The butcher! nay, the baker!)
Recent deed and dark?
Who stormed John of Acre?
He! The Englishman!
Be it still thy joy
Him to curse and ban,
Little Christian boy!—

Car ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

They our Hero shut
Under bolt and lock—
In a wretched hut,
On a wretched rock:—
Poisoned there his food,
Every pot and pan,
Roasted, boiled, and stewed,
Little martial man!

Car ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

Till, of all bereft,
That great heart was still;
And he died and left
An affecting will;
Whereon was impressed
His imperial soul,
By a meet bequest—
Child, go read the scroll!

Ah! ce sont-là des perfides Albionnais!

ETC., ETC., ETC.

GREAT MEETING OF SHERIFFS' OFFICERS ON LORD CAMPBELL'S BILL FOR ABOLISHING IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—Wednesday last a meeting of Sheriffs' Officers was held at the Fleece, for the purpose of taking into consideration the injurious tendency of Lord Campbell's Bill, now before Parliament; a bill which, if matured into an act, will entirely abolish imprisonment for debt, and thereby strike a fatal blow at the interests of a most meek and self-denying race of men, the servants of the Sheriff. The room was crowded by officers distinguished for their service, together with their humbler followers and meaner dependants. Mr. Solomon, amidst great applause, was called to the Chair.

The Chairman, with the choicest flow of language, and with that elegance of manner, which could only be acquired from a long and intimate knowledge of the aristocracy, opened the business of the day. He called upon those about him to be up and doing. Lord Campbell's Bill menaced their very existence as men, as citizens, as wine-merchants, as coal-merchants, as money-scriveners. If they loved their homes—if they valued the sanctity of their bankers' books—if they would not see the bars at their windows made worthless old iron by Lord Campbell—they would defeat so base, so unholy a tampering with a time-honored law, (Cheers)—a law under which the British Constitution had attained its present palmy condition—a law under which Eldon had grown gray and Wellington had conquered! (Vehement cheers.)

Mr. Levi rose to move the first resolution. He said they had borne more than enuff. Bit by bit hall their profits had been cut huff; and now they vos threatened to be done hup entirely. He vos a young man he vos, but he vos hold enough to remember the days when an onest officer could make his twenty pounds afore breakfast, by bail-bonds. Them days vos gone—(Groans)—gone for hever. He eld it for a truth that the law of arrest vos to society vot an oop vos to a cask; it eld it together; take away the oop, and would n't there be a tunblin about of the staves? (Loud cheers.) Lord Campbell had a good deal to answer for. (Hear.) How he could sleep on his pillar with that bill in his ed, he (Mr. Levi) could n't tell. Some men, however, had no art; and he was afeared Lord Campbell vos one on 'em. (Cries of "he his—he his.") The bill vos a great blow at public credit. (Hear.) For how, he should like to know, would anybody trust anybody if he could n't have the pleasure of locking him up? Lord Campbell's Hact would make bill-stamps vaste-paper—would hutterly destroy the discount trade, and make the veeds grow in the court-yard of the Halbany! (Cries of "Shame," and "Ve von't stand it!") The doing away vith arrest on Mesne Process vos bad enuff; but let Lord Campbell carry his bill, and adoo to the onest profits of the hindustrious officer—adoo to the vine-trade—adoo to the coal-business—adoo to everything. He saw nothin afore 'em but to go down to the lowest pint of hinfancy, and keep a play-house. (Sensation.)

Mr. Nathan briefly seconded the resolution. He would bleed in defence of the law as it existed; and he knew very well—no man better—what bleeding was!

Mr. Lazarus, an elderly gentleman of venerable aspect, and very Roman nose, next addressed the meeting. He had been door-keeper for twenty years at a most distinguished spunging-house in Newman street; a house made celebrated by the men who had enjoyed its hospitality. Ha! the happy, blissful days he had spent there in the good old times of Ellenborough and Eldon! Then, law was a manly sport, and worth something; now it was nothing but child's play. In his days, too, the law fostered such beautiful family feelings; drew son so close to father—brother to brother! For instance; the son, a wine-merchant, at some hundred per cent., did the bill; this he paid to his brother, the attorney, who employed his father, the bum-bailiff, who employed another son, broker and auctioneer, to walk in and sell up. Then a debtor, every bit of him, might be devoured by a whole family, and not a small bone to spare for anybody else. But only pass Campbell's Bill, and what's the debtor worth? Nothing, except to his creditors; they get all he has, and the lawyer and the bailiff are robbed and bamboozled. (Loud cheers.) He remembered the time when a sheet of paper sold in a spunging-house for a shilling. Now, the same article was to be had for two-pence. (Shame!) He would propose that the Duke of Wellington should be intrusted with their petition; his grace having, with that large humanity which distinguished his statesmanship, actually advised a remuneration for Sheriffs' Officers on the passing of a previous act. Mr. Lazarus concluded by moving the second resolution.

Mr. Cox was only too happy to second the resolution. The bill was a most mischievous and wicked bill, for it went to suppress, if not entirely to destroy, the best feelings of human nature. (Hear, hear.) He would prove it. For instance, you looked a man up, and if he himself had nothing, why, nine times out of ten, his imprisonment was made a tax upon his relatives and friends, who then, at any cost, came forward to help him. Abolish arrest for debt, and these beautiful feelings are sufflered to sleep, unknown to all parties. Hence, the act contemplated by Lord Campbell was a wrong done upon the human heart. It was smothering its noblest emotions. (Hear, hear.) The question to be resolved was this:—Were the expenses now paid to the Sheriff and his officer to swell the funds for the mere creditor? If such was to be the case, England would no longer be the home for the noble and the free. (Loud cheers.)

Other distinguished officers severally addressed the auditory, proposing other resolutions (expressive of unrelenting hostility towards Lord Campbell's Bill,) which were passed, and the meeting broke up; nearly every man present singing in loud and animating chorus the celebrated Hebrew chant—"No more shall the children of Judah mourn!"—Punch.

BEAU BRUMMELL'S STATUE, TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

Punch has received exclusive intelligence of a subscription which is now quietly growing at White's, at Brookes's, at the Carlton, and other Clubs, for the purpose of erecting a statue to the memory of George Bryan Brummell, the man who invented starched neckcloths, and gave its newest gloss to blacking. The sculptor, whose name we are not at present permitted to reveal, has sent in a drawing of the contemplated statue.

Trafalgar Square has very properly been selected as the place for the erection. There again will dwell in kindly neighborhood George the Beau and George the Fourth. Their lives were lovely, and their joint memories will be appropriately eternized in congenial bronze. The grandson of the pastrycook and the descendant of the Guelfs will be reconciled by the good offices of posterity, and the peculiar virtues that each possessed be brought out in stronger relief by the association. Looking at Brummell, we shall remember, with glowing admiration, the "man who never failed in his tie." Beholding George the Fourth, we shall not readily forget the man to whom all ties were equally indifferent.

Many and deep must be the reflections suggested by the two statues.

George the Beau, by the force of his genius, made himself the master of a Prince. He taught Wales "what a coat was like."

George the King, wanting royal blood, might have made himself master of journeyman tailors.

George the Beau, in beggary, refused to sell the letters of his former friends.

George the King, when Prince of Wales, sold his party at the first profitable opportunity.

George the Beau had wit.

George the King had only malice.

George the Beau would make a joke for the joke's sake.

George the King "hated without cause, and never forgave."

George the Beau felt compunction for his starving "washer-woman."

George the King ran half a million of money in debt, and, sending his bills to be paid by a starving people, felt for no one.

We might go on with the parallel, but believe we have said enough to show the great beauty of contrast that must be revealed by the juxtaposition of Beau Brummell and the "Fat Friend." It is whispered at some of the clubs, that, in addition to the Beau's statue in Trafalgar Square, there will be placed there the vera effigies of another of King George's early companions; namely, that of the lamented Marquis of Hertford. There will still be wanting another statue for the one vacant corner. How is this corner to be filled? At present we remember no person worthy of the post. Yes, we have him: Nicholas Suisse!—Punch.

THE PATRIOT'S ADDRESS TO HIS COUNTRYMEN.

My countrymen! Liberty calls you,
She gives you an Irish broad hint;
Arise and respond to her watchword—
"Be sure and remember the Rint."

Long time have oppressors enslaved you,
Who never thro' pity relint;
But now is the hour of deliverance:
Be sure and remember the Rint.

Your tyrants still wish to enthrall you,
Their hearts are as hard as a flint;
You may laugh them to scorn and despise them,
If you only remember the Rint.

My countrymen! Victory 'waits you—
Bright Fame, in a glorious tint,
Will paint forth your actions in story:
Be sure and remember the Rint.

Your fathers have fought and have conquered,
Their names are recorded in print;
So eclipse their bold prowess in battle:
Be sure and remember the Rint.

Our hands shall be freed from the tyrant,
Each hero be rich as the mint;
What blessings and comforts await ye,
If you will but remember the Rint.

What foe can expect to oppose ye,
Or the growth of your power to stint,
If you only will do what I tell ye,
And be sure to remember the Rint?

For myself he may send me to prison,
I scorn his ferocious intent,
And I care not a straw for his malice,
If you will but remember the Rint.

In this glorious cause I have labored,
For this my best days I have spent,
You cannot now mean to forsake me.
Be sure and remember the Rint.

Oh! son of this great, this green island,
I only just give you a hint,
That I always will stick to my country,
If she will but remember the Rint.—Punch.

IMPORTANT—TO THE LADIES. The great success which the "Strong Wind" has met with in the lottery of wedlock, has induced his companions in arms and paint—the Ojibbeway Indians—to advertise for English wives; and as the said Indians are very shortly about to leave the country, early applications on the part of the ladies are desirable. The Indians have already at least one wife, but they promise, even as "Strong Wind" promised, to remain constant to their new helpmates; a promise which, upon their return to the back woods, they will doubtless most honorably perform. We subjoin the advertisements:

No. I. "AH-QUE-WE-ZANTS—the Boy Chief. The advertiser is in his seventy-fifth year, and shall be happy to form a matrimonial engagement with any English lady of known property. The Boy Chief, in his admiration of the martial character of England, will have no objection to the widow of a general officer, if under forty. Her property must not be secured upon herself. She must know how to cure bear's flesh, to hoe, and rake, and dig, and reap. She must also be able to skin rabbits and clean pipes. Principals only treated with. Apply from 10 to 12.

"N. B.—The squaw must have been vaccinated.

No. II. "PA-TAN-NA-QUET-A-WER-BE—the Driving Cloud. The advertiser is the War Chief, aged 51, of a remarkably placable and humorous disposition. He has no objection to treat with a young English lady; and will, on a marriage settlement, secure to her all his scalps. The young lady must have been tenderly and affectionately brought up, as she will have to carry the wigwam poles of the Driving Cloud upon all journeys. She must bring a sufficient income to keep her husband in tobacco, rum, and laziness. English securities preferred: no holder of Pennsylvanian bonds will be treated with.

No. III. "WE-NISH-KA-WEA-BE—Fly Gull and Hereditary Chief, is open to the offers of the ladies of England. Having inherited his dignity, not won it by any deeds or virtues of his own, advertisers are confidently referred to the Ojibbeway Peerage, 4to. The birth of the Flying Gull will not allow him to treat with anybody below a baronet's daughter."

GISH-E-GOSH-E-GHEE, the Moonlight Night, and SAMMA, Tobacco, in the most unblushing manner, also forwarded their advertisements; but as Punch discovered them to be both married men, with their wives here with them, he, with his known devotion to the proprieties, has of course refused to insert any such invitations to the connubial state.—Punch.

LATE KING OF SWEDEN.—"Yesterday the body of the late king was clothed in the costume of the Order of the Seraphim, and placed on a catafalque erected in the hall of the palace bearing the name of that order. The features of the illustrious deceased are not, in any respect, altered. The body is to remain there in state for a week."

RUSSIA AND CIRCASSIA.—A letter from Trieste says, "By our last arrivals from Constantinople, we learn that Russia has fully succeeded in her appeal to the Porte on the subject of the Caucasian mountaineers. The Porte has not only given all the assurances required of her, but has promised to put a stop to the contraband trade with the coast of Circassia. This trade has been carried on by the Turks, the Ionians, and the Greeks, and by the two latter under the Turkish flag, and even under that of Russia herself."

DEATH OF W. BECKFORD, Esq.—The demise of this gentleman took place on Thursday morning, at his residence, Bath. The deceased, who was in his eighty-fourth year, was the father of the Duchess of Hamilton, and was distinguished by his literary attainments. He was formerly proprietor of the celebrated seat, Fonthill Abbey.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

From the Spectator, May 4.

BUDGET.—The great annual exposition of our financial state, the Budget, has been presented to Parliament; comprising also some little reduction of taxation, and the foretaste of an important modification of the sugar-duties. As a money account it is gratifying: the past financial year witnessed a gross surplus of revenue over expenditure of more than £4,000,000, or, after paying the deficiency on the previous year, £2,400,000; and making other deductions, there is an available surplus of £1,400,000. The skill or prescience of ministers in estimating their resources and the productive powers of the taxes under an improving state of trade is impugned, and justly; but, luckily, the error is all on the right side: the estimate of the revenue fell short of the actual yield by £2,700,000; the estimate of the expenditure exceeded the actual payment by £650,000. Possibly the improved financial policy of government may, by conducting to these results, have helped to falsify their own predictions; good fortune must have done more; but an error is easily overlooked when the disappointment is only pleasant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not over head and ears in debt to the Bank for current cash; and he talks boldly of being independent of that convenient yet burdensome ally. There is advantage as well as novelty in this sound state of affairs; witness the recent operation on the Funded Debt, by which a very considerable annual saving of interest has been made—and more may be effected in the same direction by means of overflowing coffers. The Budget, as far as it goes, justifies the policy of 1842; the revenue, especially the Customs revenue, has improved, and might seem to warrant an extension of it. Mr. Goulburn, however, only ventures on a very small and very timid observance of the principles then laid down, with reduction or abolition of duty on flint-glass, currants, wool, and some other minor matters. The wool-duty is well got rid of; but its abolition provokes new hostility to the impolitic duty on cotton. The sacrifice to Free Trade is small; but, small as it is, the movement is kept up.

THE RECALL OF Lord Ellenborough by the East India Directors has been the subject of much speculation, and of a characteristic avowal on the part of the Duke of Wellington; who declared that the acts of the Governor-General had his thorough approval, and that he held the recall to be a proceeding of the grossest indiscretion. Lord Ellenborough's success as an amateur general has quite won the veteran's heart, and he can perceive no ill equal to the removal of the man that played with armies so well. The Duke of Wellington, ever straightforward, has outlived that period of life when men are very solicitous about what will be thought of them, and he speaks without stint. Cautious Sir Robert Peel behaves in an opposite fashion, and questions fail to draw from him any explicit assertion of opinion. The Duke even reserved all reasons for his opinion; so that no one knows why he thinks the East India Directors so indiscreet, nor yet why Lord Ellenborough is recalled. His unpopularity with the officials in India, his retrenchments, his aggressive policy, and other reasons, have been guessed at. It says little that his unpopularity was diminishing; still less, that he was resting after the second game of aggression, for the directors could not well have stopped him in the midst of a game. Whatever the reason, government and the directors are quite at issue upon it; and it is from the merchant-princes of Leadenhall street that the Peel-Wellington Ministry has as yet received its severest and most mortifying check.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—Some measures of special domestic reform have been before Parliament. The most important, and the successful one, is a bill introduced by Lord Cottenham, altogether to abolish imprisonment for debt at any stage; consolidating and assimilating the bankrupt and insolvent law, enabling the debtor to obtain an effectual discharge from his liabilities on an honest cession of his goods, and a creditor to compel the debtor to make that cession; thus giving to either party the power of taking the initiative. Fraudulent debts—that is, as we understand it, the obtaining goods for which the purchaser cannot and does not mean to pay, under the false pretence of contracting a "debt" for them—will be an offence for trial before a jury and for substantive punishment as a fraud, apart from the question of mere debt. The measure is another step towards that "free trade" in credit which would be the really sound system. The laws of debtor and creditor act as a protection to improvidence on both sides: relying on the law to back him, the vender scarcely considers his customer's means of payment, extent of purchases, or personal character—expecting to supply by process of law his own want of caution: the purchaser thus attains a spurious credit, which under a system of purely personal reliance would be beyond his reach; and if improvident, he measures his purchases not by his own means but the vender's confidence. If the law refused to furnish a guarantee to the dealer, except as against positive fraud, credit would come to be tried by the only efficient tests, substantial means and honest name.

A LAW QUESTION, one of those that have only been opened, is of a larger kind. Lord Brougham has introduced a bill which consists of a digest of the statute and common law in matters of crime and punishment—in fact, a code of criminal law. The bill was read a second time; it is to be examined by skilful persons during the recess; and next session Parliament will take it up again, finally to deal with it. As to the branch incorporating the statute law, there seems, from what Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst said, to be no doubt that it will be enacted, with the concurrence of Government. Some doubt is expressed as to the expediency of meddling with the common law; and it may be regarded as standing for more mature deliberation, with a probability of success on that point also. The delay is not to be looked upon as mere procrastination: the measure is far too important to be suffered to run the chances of partial frustration by mistakes and flaws in its very substance; and the only certain method of turning out a code, sound and complete as a whole, is to let it be circulated in print, and carefully scrutinized in every part by the best intellects—by men learned in the law, and all other competent students and thinkers, undisturbed by the chatter of Parliamentary "discussion." To take a session more to the great work, matters little with a measure that may signalize a generation. But it must not be allowed to sleep.—Spectator, May 18.

TEXAS.—The startling announcement has reached London, that a treaty to annex Texas to the United States has actually been concluded—ay, sealed and signed! But stay—it has yet to be ratified by the Senate; so that the impudent manœuvre may be stopped, or at least delayed. By losing its grossness vice loses half its evil; and some years hence, by being less palpably a flagrant offence, the absorption of Texas into the Union would become really less wicked. The case of this state is known to all the world; it has arisen before the eyes of the generation now living. Texas is a Mexican province; American citizens migrate into it, upon sufferance; they grow to be a majority, or at least the most powerful class in that province; they declare themselves “independent;” and now they wish to be taken back into the Union, as American citizens, along with the Mexican territory! It is as if the English in Boulogne were first to declare themselves “independent,” and then to offer to annex Boulogne to England. In the very same way, if Mexico were hospitable to foreigners, the whole of the Mexican republic might be decoyed into the Union. The success of the measure, however, is doubtful. It is suspected to be an electioneering ruse of John Tyler, anxious to curry favor with the populace, in hopes that he may be forced to accept another term on the republican throne. It is only wonderful that Mr. Calhoun should have lent himself to the trick. Luckily, however, there are other political leaders: Mr. Henry Clay, the chosen representative of the Whigs in the approaching election for the Presidency, has forcibly denounced the plan; and Mr. Martin Van Buren, the chosen representative of the Democrats, also deprecates it: reflecting and rational men of “the two great parties in the state,” therefore, are ashamed of consummating the spoliation with such barefaced haste; the Senate is likely to revise Mr. Calhoun’s diplomacy rather unfavorably; and then the treaty will be rejected. Some day, probably, Texas, in the nature of things, must be “annexed;” but time to forget Mexican associations—time for witnesses of the trespass to die off—time for a little further insight into the social nature of slavery and of the Negro race—is due to decency, before another slavery-tainted star be added to the “star-spangled banner.”—Spectator, May 18.

SIR ROBERT PEEL ON THE CURRENCY.—The second great monetary measure of Sir ROBERT PEEL’s life, the complement to the bill of 1819, was promulgated on Monday. We had some difficulty in believing the anticipations of others early in the session, that he would suffer this opportunity to pass without that revision of the Bank charter which must otherwise have been postponed for ten more years; and while gossips were speculating on his inaction, the minister must have been maturing his pre-determined plan. It was kept so close, however, that even to the last but a very faint notion of it got abroad; and the want of foreknowledge as to his intention imparted to his speech, as he developed his plan, even in so dry a matter as a currency measure, a kind of dramatic interest. The interest lost nothing by his manner of treatment; which was in his happiest style. The few great compartments of his subject were broadly and distinctly marked out; the details, rapidly but lucidly touched, fell into their proper places; so that, while every part was as clear as glass, the relations of the whole were easily kept in view; and the animated choice of expression, with the strictly practical bearing of the whole, gave to so abstract a subject the character of action. You felt that the speaker was arranging not mere banking-accounts, but national deeds and events. He began by laying down principles. First, he defined the common denomination of value, a “pound,” which means nothing else but a certain quantity and quality of the precious metals—a known thing which is adopted as a measure of the value of other things, and not some abstract standard of positive value. Discussing this point, he achieved an easy victory over the “Birmingham” currency-men, his old controversial antagonists. He was very successful in drawing a distinction between those instruments of transfer from specified individuals to individuals, bills of exchange or such other species of paper credit, and promissory bank-notes payable to any bearer on demand, which are real substitutes for money; the distinction is, that bills of exchange represent debt, bank-notes represent coin. His business was to show that the two kinds of paper exercise different influences on the state of the currency; and that measures affecting one kind need not affect the other, as some had pretended. He proved from evidence of country bankers, that the portion of the paper-circulation which consists of country bank-notes is not regulated by considerations of what is best for the public, but is dilated or contracted according to the opportunities offered to the banks of “custom” in their trade; in time of speculation, therefore, impulse is given to over-trading by the extraordinary facilities of obtaining this kind of money; and the consequence is, that the gross amount of money in the country is ever indefinite and irregular in amount, and uncertain in value.—certainty and regularity being the two essential qualities of a proper currency. It has been observed that at this part of his speech there was an hiatus, and that Sir ROBERT PEEL passed from his principles to his practical measures without explaining their necessary connexion. We believe that this characteristic will be found in all his notable speeches, and that it is a trait of his own mind. He is not an original reasoner, nor a bold inventor. With great perceptive powers, he masters the reasonings of other, and with great practical experience and nous he contrives a way to give effect to his adopted principles; but, lacking the original logical faculty, he cannot so well explain how the measures grow out of the principles. He leaves that for commentators; who may write for years about what he will do in a session, after he has once made up his mind. You may find the same sort of hiatus in his tariff speech, and many others. His measures are not the inevitable conclusions of his premises—often the inevitable conclusion is something larger; but, allowing for his good journeyman-maxim of working with the instruments ready to his hand, you will generally find the measures pat enough as far as they go. In the present case they go a long way. He takes the existing metallic currency as being all that it is wanted to be; and his grand object is to place the paper currency in as definite and distinct a position as if it issued from the mint and bore its weight of gold stamped upon it. To that end he remodels the Bank of England. It is to be divided into two departments; one to be a bank of issue, and nothing else. Its issues will be made upon two bases, securities and bullion. The securities are to be defined,—a debt of £11,000,000 from government to the Bank, a kind of government stock to serve as a guarantee for that amount of notes; and £3,000,000 of Exchequer Bills and other public securities, not so permanently fixed; together, £14,000,000. The other department of the Bank will be an ordinary bank—the great bank of the country; managing the public debt, and serving private customers. Bullion deposited in this bank will be transferred to the issue-department in exchange for notes. The issue-bank will have the power within its own hands of contracting its circulation to the extent of the £3,000,000 variable public securities; it will be allowed to extend its circulation on emergency, with the consent of three ministers—probably the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Master of the Mint. In the dilation or contraction of the currency based upon bullion-deposits, the bank must follow the action of the public. Great security and confidence will be produced by the weekly publication of full accounts. An analogous process is ingeniously applied to the multifarious brood of country banks. The banks of issue are to be restricted to their present number—there are to be no more new banks of issue; the notes are to be restricted to their present amount—no bank is to issue more notes than it now does on an average of years; and the amount of such circulation is to be publicly recorded. The maximum amount of the country paper-currency is therefore to be fixed henceforth. Should any sudden deficiency occur in it, as by the cessation or failure of a bank, the Bank of England will apply its power of extending its own circulation; the profits of such extension to go to the public exchequer. Along with these new restrictions go some facilities and improvements for ordinary banking: joint stock banks are to have the privilege of suing and being sued; they are to be bound by the acts of authorized partners, but not of unauthorized partners; in the metropolitan circle they are to issue bills of short date; they are to publish lists of their partners and directors; in the case of new establishments, they must obtain the assent of government, and register prospectuses and other papers. Regarding the measure as a whole, the business of banking is placed on a more certain footing; and the business of issuing paper-money is made distinct, with provision for its gradual absorption by a central body,—a committee of the Bank of England virtually contracting to do the work of a government department in performing the function of a paper-money mint. The total amount of money, metallic and paper, will thus be an ascertained and centrally-regulated quantity; and the “standard of value” will possess as much steadiness as possible.

This great scheme has been received with varying impressions. Some object that it will “make money dear,” and deplore that the minister does not alter the standard of value, as it has often been altered—by swindling sovereigns—since the days of WILLIAM the Conqueror; as if, says Sir ROBERT PEELE, we gain anything in the thing measured by altering the nominal number of inches in a foot! It is remarked more justly, that in our complicated system the disturbing influences are too many to permit the result to be seen at once. But it is anticipated that the great change will be effected with singularly little detriment to private interests; and on the whole, except among “the currency-people,” the scheme is regarded as a very statesmanlike measure.—Spectator, May 11.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—The ugly-looking imbroglio between the government and the East India Directors has been settled in the quietest and most effectual manner. This victory over difficulty may stand by the side of COLUMBUS's egg for simplicity and tact on the part of the cool-headed politician at the head of affairs. There was the Court of Directors in unanimous contumacy—a most respectable and decorous rebellion; there was the most respected Duke of WELLINGTON, with all the plain-speaking indiscretion of a man who has survived petty restraints, openly scolding the Directors, without warrant to show for it—the warrant must not be shown; there was Lord ELLENBOROUGH rising in the stormy horizon in his retrograde movement, from his horrid hair shaking interofficial pestilence and war; and the invidious Whigs and mischievous Radicals already began to call for “papers.” A general blow-up seemed inevitable. Sir ROBERT PEELE tackles the difficulty. He is silent when his colleague gives tongue. He sees and soothes the excited Directors. He yields to their move, now past remedy; and proposes Sir HENRY HARDING as the new Governor-General. Happy thought! Sir HENRY happens to be “the very man” the Directors desire; he is brother-in-law to the offended ELLENBOROUGH; brother-in-arms and most trusted companion to the outspoken Duke; inoffensive to the blatant beast of party. All is quieted. The Duke of WELLINGTON disavows any intention to offend, but thinks that his silence was deemed injurious to the impugned functionary, and feels bound to defend his absent friend; his escapade thus assuming an air of chivalrous generosity forgetful of official etiquette. People would pardon more serious lapses to the honest veteran, and they rather enjoy the opportunity of exercising towards so illustrious a trespasser the patronage of forgiveness.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

POWERS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.—The Duke of Wellington pronounces a decided opinion on the conduct of the India Directors in recalling Lord Ellenborough. This the public cannot do, for want of that information which “discretion” forbids the Directors to furnish without the consent of the government; but there is a point connected with the subject upon which no doubt can exist. We mean, the unfairness of a public censure, by so very high an authority, of men whom the accuser himself deprives of the means of defence. Nor is the injustice of this proceeding the only objection to it. The weight of the Duke's opinion on most subjects is so great, that people are apt to take for granted the correctness of his mere dicta. In the present instance, a mischief ensues which may not be easily remedied. There is at this moment a tendency in public opinion, produced entirely by the Duke's speech against the tongue-tied Directors, to conclude that the East India Company itself is a bad institution. Some go so far as to say that it ought to be displaced by a Board or Office for the government of India. This sudden judgment may not hold, perhaps; but at all events the question is much discussed, and is one of immense importance. On this question, therefore, in the absence of all means of forming an opinion on the particular act of the Directors, we offer some brief remarks.

The main objection that one hears urged against the Company as a means of governing India is, that such an institution is "anomalous." Anomalous in what respect?—as being contrary to rule, or contrary to practice? A mere closet-statesman, having to frame a government for India, would probably never have hit upon the scheme of creating a joint stock, and letting the shareholders of that private money-interest choose twenty-four of their own number to be the rulers of a great empire: but on the other hand, a statesman of practical ability, or even a true philosopher, (meaning one who observes the divers peculiarities of nations, and who takes into his account the genius of the people for whom he has to plan institutions,) would not fail to perceive the thoroughly English character of delegations of authority, for special purposes, resting on a private interest. Our Indian empire was founded by this means: so were the English colonies of the West Indies; and the thirteen great colonies of North America, which might still have formed part of the British dominions if a centralizing spirit here had not interfered with their charters of incorporation and local government. Within these islands, again, and time out of mind, a vast number of public purposes, which in other countries the supreme authority undertakes, and often fails to accomplish, have been attained by means of conferring power on bodies distinct from the central authority. The principle of such delegations of authority runs through our institutions; the plan of creating special interests armed with special powers, and maintained in independence of the supreme executive, is just what most distinguishes England from such countries as France or Prussia. Nay, it is good old English constitutional law, that not even the Supreme Legislature can alter a charter of incorporation without the consent of the grantees. A keen centralizer may exclaim against the "anomaly" of making any authority independent of the supreme legislature; but even such a one must allow that good has come of it in by-gone times, when Parliament itself was more apt to do wrong than in these days; and at any rate, nobody can doubt that the peculiar self-reliance of the English character, and our practical ability in every kind of affairs, have been in a great measure produced by the habit of exercising authority and bearing responsibility,—a habit which these countless delegations of power for special purposes have mainly occasioned. Many an old English house is very "anomalous" in its variance from the rules of architecture, but none the less useful or comfortable. As these were built in disregard of rule, but suitably to climate and notions of comfort, so our corporations, enjoying power independent of the general government, have manifestly worked well. They may, indeed, be according to rule after all: for is not adaptation to working well the best of rules to go by?

In favor of the particular case of the East India Company, there are many special reasons. Among the chief of these we should be disposed to place the great objection to Mr. Fox's India Bill,—that it was an attempt by the Whig landed aristocracy to lay hold of the patronage of the government of India. The present system of patronage in that department of the state may be "anomalous;" but surely that is a pleasant departure from rule which prevented Mr. O'CONNELL from naming India among "the colonies" in which he undertook to get a place for Mr. EDWARD RUTHVEN. Then, look at the working of patronage by the Court of Directors of the East India Company: reckon all the jobbing, and still the system stands alone in the regular training for official aptitude which it supplies, and in the production of a body of administrators with which no other in the wide British empire will bear comparison. The present mode of proceeding averts two great evils,—first, that of the vastly augmented power of corrupting the House of Commons and the constituencies, which a "Colonial Office" for India would place in the hands of the landed aristocracy; and secondly, that of the incompetence of the officials whom the great Whig or Tory landlords would send to India if political influence disposed of cadetships and writerships. Who can believe that the private interest of politicians in the management of constituencies would work as well in this case, as the private interest of the shareholders of the Company in keeping up the value of their stock?

This brings us to the rationale of a stock-holding interest invested with governing power. The device seems peculiarly applicable to the government of a distant possession which is really incapable of self-government. Its object is to create responsibility where none exists. The proverbial mismanagement of the Colonial Office would show, if the fact were not obvious and notorious, that these islands contain no public sufficiently large and sufficiently interested in the well being of any distant possession, to bring home responsibility to its rulers. "Who cares about India?" is a common saying. In some colonies, such as Canada, we create a local responsibility by means of representative institutions: but whenever a distant country is governed here, so surely the ignorance and indifference of the British public with respect to that country saves its rulers from any real responsibility—excepting only in the case of India. The East India charter makes a public here, moved to keep the directors in order by a strong private interest in the good government of the distant possession. The scheme is not even anomalous, but according to the excellent rule which considers responsibility essential to good government. And again we say, it works well. Could as much be predicated of a Colonial Office for India, such as that which keeps the other dependencies of Britain in a constant state of depression or disturbance?

We cannot help thinking that the discussion as to the propriety of conferring powers of government on the East India Company will do much good. A Doctrinaire school of politicians has grown up of late years in this country, which regards the principle of centralization with great favor, and bestows as much dislike on the old English practice of local and special exercises of authority. It is well that we should look about us in this matter. The new Poor-law, which rightly created a central authority for the purpose of curing the social disease resulting from the payment of wages out of taxes, has suspended our whole system of parish-government, and threatens to destroy it. The condition of the working peasantry, between whom and their employers all sympathy has been removed by the institution of Union Workhouses and Boards of Guardians, is not so satisfactory as to make us deeply in love with the new method. Other cases might be cited, in which we appear to be pushing the principle of centralization somewhat too far. The Prussian mode of government is as unsuitable to this country as houses built after the model of Greek temples. We shall have to return to the subject.—Spectator, May 4.

THE MIRROR OF THE AGE.—If posterity judge of the present age by its newspapers, they will form a rare opinion of it. Every newspaper consists of two branches—the news, and the argumentative departments. Among the news, the rascalities of life occupy a most disproportionate space. The steady, unobtrusive exercise of the domestic virtues—which is more largely and uniformly distributed through society than in any former age—is the commonplace of life, and affords no salient points to the news-caterer. But the adventures of Lord HUNTINGTOWER and the swindling leeches who clung to him—the Marquis of HERTFORD's "voice from the grave"—bearing testimony to the character of NICOLAS SUISSE—the will-forgeries, poisonings, adulteries, stabbing of sheep by clergymen, et cetera—these fill up the news-columns as attractively as their dramatized versions do the minor theatres. The rottenness of life is sought out by the newsmonger as the rottenness of cheese is by the epicure. Its haut goût overpowers the faint, delicate odor of good lives. It is painted with such breadth that it seems to overspread the whole fabric of society. And when we take the newspapers in their lecturing vein, matters are but little mended. We find, it is true, champions of religion, morality, and liberty—denouncers of oppression, of sedition, of dishonesty—all laboring away with a three hundred horse-power: but the very excess of their energy is suspicious—one is tempted to exclaim, what a spring-tide of villainies of all kinds it must be that sets in with such force as to call for all these Mrs. Partingtons to sweep it back! The inference suggested by this state of affairs is at least not a cynical one. If our age and country—which, with all their littleness, have rather more than an average share of decorum and benevolence—show to so little advantage in the pages of its chroniclers, may not a similar fate have befallen other ages also! In reading the history of Rome under the Emperors, for example, one wonders how a society so unreddeemedly profligate could hang together. The fact that a large amount of insipid but invaluable domestic virtue is hidden from our view by the exaggerated declamation of reformers on the one hand and the brazen-faced ostentation of shameless profligacy on the other, solves the difficulty. The literary artists of CALIGULA's and NERO's days seized upon the telling points of contemporary society; they gloated on sarcastic or indignant descriptions of vice, and deepened the coloring of popular debasement and servility, in order to make their virtuous characters tell more effectively from the contrast. But in the domestic circles of Rome there must have been a large amount of average honesty—too tame for their exaggerated tastes, but still the salt of the earth, which preserved the body politic from corruption. The same was the case, doubtless, in every age famous for its profligacy. The dissolute courtiers of CHARLES the second in England, and of the Regent ORLEANS in France were the minority of the society in which they lived. And even in the blood-drunken fit of the French Revolution, the majority of the people went about their daily avocations with that routine regularity which subdues men to something very like virtue if it be not the exact reality. If all the mad politicians on every side who kept cutting each others' throats for a few years in La Belle France, had been by some sudden fatality annihilated, a vast majority of the French people would have survived—very common-place people, doubtless, but also very comfortable people to live among. So, after all, we may charitably hope that human nature is not quite the rascally thing history would lead us to believe.—Spectator.

THE ADJUSTMENT OF THE CIRCULATION.—The propositions of Sir ROBERT PEEL on Monday last are marked by the great merit of carrying out a comprehensive principle without disturbance of any existing interest. Henceforth, the paper circulation of the country will be subject to no other fluctuations than those to which it would be liable if instead of being the representative of gold it were gold itself. As an economical substitute for the precious metals, it will perform precisely the function it professes, and no other.

In any alteration he might propose, Sir ROBERT PEEL had to select from the doctrines of three different schools: the first, by no means an influential one although obviously attractive to some peculiar minds, consisting of those who seek an "expansion" of the currency—i. e. the issue of inconvertible paper—enabling them to discharge obligations contracted to be paid in the scarce commodity gold, with a commodity, the "scarcity" of which would only be limited by their ideas of what is convenient; the second, maintaining the necessity of a convertible currency, but insisting that the fact of an issuer of a note being bound by law to meet it in gold renders it impossible for him to over-issue—just as if a law decreeing that men shall keep their promises would render it impossible for them to deceive society by promising more than they can fulfil—and insisting that therefore no restriction should be placed upon him; and the third, claiming not only a declaration from the law that all notes shall be convertible, but also a provision to insure that the gold into which they profess to be convertible shall have a local habitation in the cellars of the issuer, so as to render it quite certain that each note is really what it purports to be, the "representative" of something having a tangible existence.

Upon the last of these systems the premier has taken his stand. There could indeed have been little doubt that such would have been the direction of any measure Sir ROBERT PEEL might bring forward; but the largeness of the principle was supposed, under the present constitution of the banking establishments of the country, to involve almost insuperable difficulties, and few were prepared to find that the whole matter might be effected without causing the slightest derangement. The new plan will go into operation without involving any change in our present monetary relations; and yet at the same time that it disturbs nothing, it completely insures a sound system for the future.

To show its simplicity, it is best to state it in an elementary way. The paper circulation of the country may be taken at the present moment at about thirty millions, exclusive of the reserve held by the Bank of England against deposits. If that sum were certain to remain in England in use as at this moment, it would be sufficient that it should be based on securities having a merely national value—such as Stock, Exchequer Bills, &c.; and no occasion for convertibility would exist. But when an increase of imports shall take place, and heavy payments to foreigners consequently become necessary, the holders will send in a large proportion of it in exchange for the security on which it is based, and which, to meet such a call, should evidently be of a kind possessing not a local but an universal value. Now, the greatest extent to which it is believed a demand of this description could ever go, is to eight millions from the present amount, so as to reduce the circulation of the country from thirty to twenty-two millions; any drain approaching to this extent being held certain to produce a fall in prices, and a general pressure sufficient to turn the exchanges in our favor. Since, therefore, the paper circulation of the country can never fall below twenty-two millions, it is permitted that the various banking establishments now possessing power of issue may issue in the aggregate to that extent upon other security than that of gold, it being next to certain that gold will never be demanded for it: but as it is possible that all beyond this amount may be sent in at any time, it is provided that no more shall be issued except upon a deposit of bullion, so that the notes may be guaranteed by that commodity which when the holders bring them in will be wanted in exchange. The Bank of England are therefore allowed to keep out, as at present, fourteen millions of their notes, represented by profitable securities, and the joint stock and other banks eight millions: this will make the twenty-two millions of national circulation, and the amount of notes of the Bank of England now out upon bullion will alone be subject to fluctuation. As gold flows in, the amount of notes will be increased; as it goes out, notes will be brought in in exchange, and forthwith cancelled—an unprofitable operation, to be conducted as heretofore by the Bank in consideration of their privileges.

But as it is possible that some of the joint stock and private issuing banks may fail or withdraw, and the circulation on securities thus become contracted below the twenty-two millions, it is provided that in such case the government may authorize the Bank of England to advance on securities an amount of notes to supply that which has been extinguished by such failure or withdrawal; the public to pay the expense caused to the bank by the additional issue, and to take the profit arising from the interest of the securities upon which it is made.

As far as the interests of the Bank of England are concerned, it is clear that it will gain an advantage from the stability given to its operations, to say nothing of the future freedom of its banking department. We observe, however, that some of the proprietors complain of a "hard bargain;" but on this point the arrangement between the minister and the governors of the bank seems to have taken place in a spirit highly honorable to both, avoiding all haggling and chaffering in a desire to promote a great national good. That the terms are just, is evidenced by the prices-current. Public opinion as to what the bank might fairly expect was indicated by the price of the stock before Sir ROBERT PEEL divulged his plan; and so completely has he hit the estimate, that the quotation from that time has not undergone the slightest variation.

THE AUTOCRAT'S VISIT. More than a month ago, it was positively announced that his most Autocratic Majesty, the "Self-governor" of all the Russias was to pay a visit this summer to her Britannic Majesty. But shadows of doubt and delay appear to be now thrown over this flattering prospect.

"The present state of the Queen," says a diplomatic writer in the Times, "will very shortly preclude her gracious Majesty doing the honors of her palace." Then, "material obstacles" are hinted at, "arising from the melting of the ice;" and moral obstacles from "urgent affairs on hand." In short, it is apparent that there is a hitch somewhere; and moreover, that the real cause of the Czar drawing back from his journey is not discreetly to be named, while a plausible pretext is not easy to invent. Oh no, it is not the heat melting the ice in Russia, that is the hindrance; it is the moral coldness congealing a less destructible ice here.

All hope, however, is not extinct in the breasts of those who are curious to see foreign kings and other rarities. Lord BLOOMFIELD, who proposed a visit to St. Petersburg, is detained, lest the Emperor should arrive and find no field in bloom. This is hard upon Lord BLOOMFIELD: could not his office be delegated for the occasion to Lord DUDLEY COURTTS STUART, who might do the honors with a peculiar grace to the Sovereign of Poland? Or perhaps Baron ROTHSCHILD, or Sir MOSES MONTEFIORE, out of gratitude for the favors their nation have received at the Imperial hands, might undertake the task. A body-guard of Polish exiles may be enrolled to mount guard at St. James's while the Czar remains; and of course all Houndsditch and St. Mary Axe will be illuminated on the night of his arrival!

Seriously, the Emperor of Russia is "an accident," as his better brother said of himself: he is what his position has made him—but that is not a thing to be admired. If he insist upon coming, of course our Queen will receive her guest as her own sense of hospitality and dignity demand; and every attention will be paid to him by our nobility and gentry, which official connexion with the Court may require. But it is to be hoped that, on the part of the independent and right-feeling public, the customary lion-worship will be abated. It would be well that the persecutor of the Jews and destroyer of Poland should be made to understand that he is among a people who cannot respect him, though they have too much self-esteem to treat even an uninvited and unwelcome guest with rudeness.

From the Examiner.—Opposition.

THE BANK PROJECT.—Sir Robert Peel's plan for improving the banking system is now before the country, and every feature of merit in it will, we may be sure, stir up a proportionate hostility where present interests, real or imaginary, are supposed to be affected by it. The opinions of the best authorities, on the question are generally in favor of the scheme, and the minister is much, and we think justly, commended for the boldness of his measure, as well as for the general soundness of the principles on which it is founded. Objections attach to parts of the plan, but on the whole it is entitled to much praise, and will connect the name of Sir Robert Peel with a lasting service to his country.

From the Examiner, 11 May.

It is rumored that England is to be honored this summer with a visit from the Emperor Nicholas. Now, as we regard the unbought cheers and hearty welcome of a free people as the highest honor any sovereign can receive, the noblest tribute to beneficence and virtue, we are not a little loth to see them wasted on one who can never appreciate or deserve them as the autocrat of Russia. Great pains are taken by a portion of the English press—no doubt with very sufficient reason—to mystify the people of England as to the true character of the Russian Government.

We shall give a simple authentic fact, which will enable our readers to judge of the tone and temper of the Czar's government; the baseness of its ends, and the lawlessness of its means.

An ukase dated the 27th of March has just been issued, by which the annual tax upon every passport granted for any foreign country whatever, is raised from 50 to 200 silver roubles, that is, to £30 of our money. Nor is this all, the same ukase contains an absolute prohibition on all foreign travel as regards all persons of either sex under 25 years of age, unless such as accompany their parents or guardians. To crown all, the governors of provinces or cities can no longer, as heretofore, grant passports. Every passport must be issued direct from the Imperial Chancery at Petersburg to the remotest parts of that huge empire—with what facility, despatch, and economy, we leave our readers to judge. Illness, commercial affairs, or the profession of an artist, form the only exceptions.

Of course everybody understands the meaning of these prohibitions. Not contented with all he has hitherto done to withhold his subjects from contact with higher civilization, not content with his endeavors to disqualify them from comparing what they witness at home with what they might see abroad, he has now taken a bolder step in the career of intellectual oppression. He appears to aspire to erect around his empire the barriers which his neighbor the Emperor of China has just been compelled to throw down. We can hardly think he will long succeed. Already this measure has excited throughout Russia the greatest disgust and indignation.

We call the attention of the English public to it, because it throws some light on the pretensions of such a ruler to be the civilizer of his people.

From the Britannia.

Monarchs do not always know their own minds, and the changes of imperial and royal council on the subject of the visit to Queen VICTORIA have, for the last three months, distracted the whole grande monde. The Czar, a splendid specimen of the locomotive, vibrates between Melton and Mesopotamia, and is evidently uncertain whether he shall run up the Thames, or head the march of an army across the Araxes. LOUIS PHILIPPE oscillates in the same style between the picnics of the Isle of Wight and the police-protected peace of Neuilly. The British public would, as the Lord Mayor's Stentor, Mr. O'TOOLE, hails his guests when the "loving cup" goes round, "greet them both, and give them heartily welcome." Yet, if we were of the Cabinet of the King of the FRENCH, we should advise him to stay where he can be protected, which certainly would not be the case in England. The royal life is of value to much more than France: he is the pledge to Europe against the rashness and wretchedness of war. In France he is fortunately guarded from the hand of the assassin. But, if he visited this country, some French conspirator might fatally avail himself of the unguarded condition in which he must move about here, if he moved at all, and destroy a life the most important to Europe. In this language we but speak the opinion of the public. The king is brave and knows how to face peril; but there is neither courage nor common sense in challenging unnecessary risks, and the grief which would be felt by our country, and the mischiefs which might accrue to every nation of Europe, by such a catastrophe, would infinitely overbalance any pleasure which England might feel in showing its hospitality to a great king and a great man. But the Czar would be secure: his hazards would be much more from our welcome and his own waltzing than from any of the "Chances that make rough the path of kings."

LAW REFORM.—This is the condition to which the law of every great nation must come in the lapse of centuries. New laws or modifications of old laws are called for by the altered circumstances of society: every question submitted to the decision of a court of justice has something peculiar to itself that calls into exercise the ingenuity of the judges in applying to it the general terms of the statute law. Many cases occur that must be decided more by a general analogy than by the letter either of the statute or the consuetudinary law. It is an inevitable necessity that the law—the customs of the country, the enactments of the legislature, the judgments of law courts—must increase in number and complexity with every year. And this process cannot fail in the course of time to render those authoritative sources of legal knowledge so multitudinous and voluminous, that unless some remedy be adopted the law must break down under its own weight; the nation must lose the benefit of a definite and cognizable law, from its law having outgrown the powers of human comprehension.

Two kinds of remedies have been proposed. The favorite panacea in our days has been a perfect philosophical code, that should render unnecessary the constant accumulation of statutes and decisions. Such a task could only be performed by omniscience: but the impossibility has not deterred from making the attempt. BENTHAM had his codes ready cut and dry to offer for the acceptance of every state from the North American Union to Russia. And the Code Napoléon has been held up in its day as something of the kind. It is indeed a fair specimen of what may be expected from any such attempt. That a number of explanatory statutes, of judicial decisions, and of ingenious commentaries, have already been superadded to it, is no disparagement to the Code Napoléon: the exigencies of society, and of such laws as fallible human beings can make, render this constant growth inevitable. But the true ground for adjudging the Code Napoléon a failure is, that owing to its incompleteness and vagueness—the consequence of its being compiled by theorists who had no sharp practical knowledge of the law—it is a bad starting-point for this inevitable accumulation of supplementary enactments, applications, and explanations. Its superficial vagueness infects the whole apparatus that has been constructed upon it.

The best specimen of the other kind of remedy that has at times been applied to law become useless from excessive growth, is to be found in the compilations of JUSTINIAN. The two principal books (the Institutes are a mere elementary text-book for learners) are exactly what the Common Law Commissioners were directed to prepare. The "Codex" is a digest of what may be called the statute law of Rome, which was actually in force in the time of JUSTINIAN. The "Pandects" are a digest of what may be called the common law of his time. They are neither more nor less than the law of JUSTINIAN's time as it was known to TRIBONIAN and his few assistants. The knowledge which their work shows these accurate and learned lawyers to have possessed of the best enactments, decisions of judges, and opinions of counsel, of their own and preceding ages, was amply sufficient for practical purposes. The Emperor's decree that their digests should have the force of law—that all statutes, decisions, and opinions to be found in them, and none else, should be authoritative—removed the danger to which we are daily and hourly exposed, of judgments pronounced in favor of the party whose lawyer has drawn the lucky ticket in the lottery of decisions. That decree at the same time reduced the valid law within such a compass as rendered a thorough and intimate knowledge of it on the part of practitioners possible. And by the judicious determination to give merely the law as it was—to attempt no impracticable idealization of it—all the sharp-defined forms, all the practical common sense which men trained in real business had impressed upon and inspired into the Roman law, was retained. And the consequence has been, that the law-books of JUSTINIAN were not only an inestimable boon to his own time and nation, but have been the source of much of what is most valuable in the law of every nation of modern Europe.

Digests of the statute and common law of England, executed on a principle analogous to that upon which TRIBONIAN compiled the law-books of JUSTINIAN, appear to be what is most desirable in the present state of our law. A digest of the most important acts of Parliament, and a digest of the most important decisions and opinions, such as is understood to have been prepared by the Law Commissioners, revised, corrected, and augmented by lawyers like Lords COTTENHAM, DENMAN, and LYNDBURST, would be a satisfactory body of law. It would be within the compass of the studies of men of average talent and industry to obtain a thorough knowledge of it. It would insure men against the danger of supposed obsolete statutes or forgotten decisions being raked up against them. It would not render explanatory or emendatory statutes, or reports of the decisions of courts, or text-books and commentaries on special branches of the law, unnecessary; but it would for the time bring back the whole of the law within the sphere of human comprehension; and when the necessary course of events had made the law again too exuberant, the same process of retrenchment might again be adopted. We do not regret the caution evinced by Lord LYNDBURST respecting the immediate adoption of the digest of statute and common criminal law embraced in Lord BROUGHAM's bill; but we could have wished a more decided and hearty expression in favor of the principle of consolidation. What the country most urgently requires is to know what and where the law is. Reform—improvement—will doubtless be required; but let us have a law: at present, from its sheer redundancy, we have as good as none.

Honor to whom honor is due. To Lord BROUGHAM are we mainly indebted for whatever steps have as yet been taken in the course we have indicated as most desirable. The inquiries of the Common Law Commissioners originated in his motion in 1828; and the commission directing them to extend their investigations to the Criminal Law was issued when he was Chancellor. He has taken charge of—produced to public notice—urged the adoption of—the digest of the criminal law prepared by the Law Commissioners. He has urged upon the ministers the introduction of the digest as a legislative measure of their own; and, failing in this, he has invited the attention of his own House of the Legislature to it. He has by his perseverance awakened a certain degree of public attention and extorted some show of action from government; and if by further perseverance he carry his point, he will confer a benefit upon the country, the extent and importance of which it is not easy to estimate. In that event, he may allow his enemies their small triumphs at hitting the weak points he frequently exposes to their aim—the weighty obligation he confers upon the nation will overshadow them all. It may be said of him, that as a learned and sound working lawyer he was excelled by many of his judicial cotemporaries: it may be said of him, that he could not have compiled the very digest upon which he seeks to build his fame: but it will also be said, that had it not been for the impulse he gave that digest would never have been undertaken, and had it not been for his unflagging enthusiasm it would never have become law.

Spectator.

MORAL PROSPECTS OF THE UNITED STATES.—It is true that our Transatlantic cousins are more prone to talk about than actually to engage in war; but as the pitcher which goes often to the well comes home broken at last—as the boy cried "wolf" till nobody believed him, and yet the wolf did come—this habitual bluster and rhodomontade may lead to mischief in the end. It is not denied that we have senatorial and extra-senatorial Bobadils here at home quite fit to pair off with those of the United States, and perhaps in number scarcely inferior; but, thanks to something in our form of government or our state of society, they rarely get into the Cabinet, and are always in a minority there.

Mr. President TYLER's advocacy of a crooked policy regarding Texas would be, like the Irish Repeal sympathies of Mr. President TYLER's son, simply ludicrous in a private individual fighting "for his own hand:" but when the chief magistrate of the Union concludes a treaty of annexation with a republic founded on the territory of a neighboring and allied state by citizens of the Union—many of them of rather questionable character—it is time to stop laughing and look after our own property.

It depends upon the American Senate alone to prevent as shabby a violation of the laws of nations as ever was committed by the worst of the old Kings and Kaisars, against whom the freemen of North America hold themselves entitled to rail in the gross. Mr. CLAY's protest against the TYLER policy is honorable to himself and the party he represents: it shows that some of the old blood of the WASHINGTONS and ADAMES still circulates in the land. But it cannot be forgotten that Mr. CLAY is the mouthpiece of a party which, with one or two brief intervals, has been in a minority ever since the election of THOMAS JEFFERSON as President. Mr. VAN BUREN's qualified protest is infinitely less satisfactory than Mr. CLAY's—just as Mr. VAN BUREN is himself in every respect a less satisfactory sort of person. MR. VAN BUREN, it is true, points out the dishonesty and danger of the TYLER policy; but the wind-up of his letter reads vastly like a hint to the Americans, that though he disapproves of annexing Texas, rather than not be President he will consent if they insist upon it. The wavering virtue of Mr. VAN BUREN, and the long-standing minority of the class of statesmen represented by Mr. CLAY, are not encouraging auguries of what is to be expected from the Senate; although that body, like the Supreme Courts of Justice of the Union, has hitherto made a noble stand against the low principles of policy which have found favor in the eyes of the rabble of electors.

If the Senate yield on the question of Texan annexation, our turn will undoubtedly come next. This is more than inference from the applicability to Canada of the immoral principle upon which the Texan treaty is justified. Some of the trappers, whose friends and allies have been urging the Legislature of the Union to seize upon Oregon, it is credibly reported, have already established an organized settlement within the disputed territory. This has all the appearance of an exact repetition of what has been done in Texas. First, a body of unrecognized adventurers form a settlement; then, they are recognized as de facto an independent state; and lastly, they are incorporated into the Union. In the Texan treaty, and in the Oregon settlement, we may read what awaits us if TYLER principles and TYLER partisans carry the day in the pending Presidential election and obtain a majority in the Senate.

To us it is no agreeable prospect, to be dragged into war by the unprincipled encroachments of a kindred people. But the citizens of the United States will themselves be the greatest sufferers. We do not, indeed, anticipate, with some, a near dissolution of the Union. There is enough of esprit de corps among the States to reconcile the citizens of New York to a common cause with the repudiators of Pennsylvania and Michigan; the anti-slavers of Boston with the CALHOUNS, who look upon the occupation of Texas as nothing but a just and necessary step in defence of the sacred institution of negro slavery; and all to take pride in extending their territory by violent or fraudulent appropriations of what belongs to neighboring powers. It must be a virtuous, a happy society, in which such principles are unblushingly avowed! It is not in the American Union as in the Monarchical States of Europe. On this side of the Atlantic, a line has been drawn between the statesman and the citizen class, which, whatever anomalies it may have occasioned, has at least had the good effect of keeping domestic life comparatively pure from the lax principles of politicians. In our domestic circles a stricter morality has prevailed, and proved a counter-agent to public corruption. But in the United States this cannot be: the corruption of the rulers is there the corruption of all. The low swindling principles of repudiation, the callousness to human suffering of the slave-owner, and the plundering propensities of the conqueror, are not likely to be confined to the cabinet: the poison will penetrate into domestic circles. A class will be formed in every State as demoralized as the rabble of Rome under the emperors.—Spectator, May 11.

From Bell's Messenger.

THE ZOLLVEREIN.—Some solicitude has been excited by the pending commercial treaty between the Northern States of Germany and the United States of America.

It has been reported, but the fact is not true to the extent, that a treaty has been actually signed and ratified between the Americans and the German Zollverein, for the mutual admission of articles at lower rates than if imported from Great Britain and other countries; the treaty being founded, it is said, upon the principle of preferential duties between the German Commercial Union and the government of the United States: the Germans to admit the importation of cotton wool, tobacco, and rice, and other articles from the United States free of duty, or at very reduced duties on the two latter articles of rice and tobacco; whilst reciprocal advantages are to be granted to the members of the Zollverein,—to export manufactures and worked-up fabrics to the United States, on the very low duties of custom.

It is needless to state that a very great advantage would thus be secured to the German over the British manufacturers, and that the consequence might, in the commencement, at least, be greatly prejudicial to our interests and trade.

Now there are two considerations suggested by this subject,—both of them matters of difficulty,—which we shall briefly state, and then submit our own views upon them to the reader.

There are two kinds of commercial treaties, and between them the difference does not appear at first sight to be very great, but upon examination, the distinctions are of the first importance. Under one class of treaties it is an article which enters into the substance of the convention, "That it is agreed between the contracting parties, that both countries, as respects the commerce of the other, should be put upon the footing of the most favoured nations without any equivalent being given. By the second description of treaties, it is provided that a country shall be placed upon the footing of the most favoured nations, provided she makes certain concessions."

It is to be observed that it is a treaty of the first class which now subsists between Great Britain and the United States; consequently, no proposition can be clearer, according to the faith of treaties and the law of nations, than that whilst such treaty subsists as at the present moment does subsist between Great Britain and the United States, the North American government cannot admit the productions of the Germanic League, or indeed of any country,—France, Russia, or Germany,—into their dominions,—on more advantageous terms than those upon which the productions and manufactures of this country are admitted.

That such is the natural construction of the American treaty there can be no doubt; the inference, therefore, which we make is, that any reduction of duties made by the United States in favor of Prussian or German manufactures must be equally advantageous, and reciprocally extend to the manufactures of Great Britain.

This subject, having been slightly touched upon in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening, drew from Sir R. Peel a very proper observation. The government, he said, had already taken this question into consideration: but as the treaty to which the Hon. member (Dr. Bowring) had adverted was not yet ratified, perhaps it would be better for him not to enter into details, but to content himself with stating that the matter had not escaped attention. There was a treaty in existence between this country and the United States, by which it was stipulated that England should, in matters of trade, be put upon the same footing as the most favoured nation.

The government of the United States has here perhaps involved itself in some difficulties, and it is quite clear that, if they respect treaties, or wish to range within the community of nations, regarding what is just and equal, they will not dare to violate the commercial convention with the same bold and open violence, and in the same manner, as some of their single states have repudiated their debts and loans. The United States, we will venture to say, will not go this length as a body; they have not been so thoroughly corrupted by the example of a few as thus to throw off the general allegiance they owe to the law of nations and natural justice; but that they will attempt some chicanery, and try to escape from their plain obligations, we make little doubt.

We do not now recollect the precise time when our commercial treaty with the United States will expire. We believe it contains a clause, usual in such treaties, that it may be determined by either of the parties upon a three years' notice. The first question, therefore, is,—what are the Americans likely to do, and how are we to counteract them: and the second is what retaliation would be open to us, short of war, in case of their direct violation of an express treaty.

What are treaties made for if not to be observed? and what difference is there in fact between a commercial treaty and any other treaty? They are binding upon the same rules of immutable justice and faith, as succession treaties, boundary treaties and all other national conventions of any kind whatever. We deny that the breach of them does not most directly and conscientiously justify an appeal to arms. The casus belli arises upon a wilful breach of a commercial treaty, just as much as it would arise upon the seizure of our vessels upon the high seas, or an invasion of our territories.

Nations, unhappily, have no common superior to which they can appeal; the recourse, therefore, must be, as in all other cases of wanton and wilful wrong, to arms; and whatever party shall be in possession of the government of this kingdom, the United States will find that the treaty of commerce cannot be violated with impunity. Mr. WHEATON's treaty with the Zollverein has excited particular interest and notice, not only in the press and in Parliament, but at the meetings of the Anti and Pro-Corn Law Leagues. On the 24th instant, at Covent Garden, Mr. EWART (M. P.) said:—

"There was America, whose manufactures were extending themselves with colossal strides, which always marked the onward progress of that great country. Whatever we might think of our own manufacturing supremacy, there was one nation which would follow rapidly in our steps, and possibly overtake us; a country whose people had sprung from our own soil, who were descendants of our own forefathers, and who possessed so much of English energy and perseverance, that they might be aptly termed not only English, but ultra English. [Cheers.] That nation was the United States of America. That was the nation with which we had now to contend in the manufacture of those articles in which we had hitherto maintained an easy ascendancy in the markets of the world. America was thus the most formidable manufacturing rival we had to fear. And at this moment, while we had failed in extending by a single treaty the sphere of our commerce and our trade, we heard only yesterday that the United States had concluded a treaty with the States of the Zollverein, with great advantage to herself. Was it to be borne, then, while our rivals were employing all their energies, and exerting themselves successfully to obtain equality with us, if not actual superiority over us, in manufactures and commerce, that the Parliament of England should continue its slumbers? America had opened to herself a market of twenty-seven millions of people for her produce."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—What has been the immediate motive of Lord ELLENBOROUGH's recall remains a secret.

In the mean time the public are free to follow their own conception; and there can be nothing better known than the directorial opinion—long since formed, steadily sustained by events, and growing into strength from hour to hour—that the Governor-General would be a much more useful member of the state writing despatches at the India Board, than making wars in India.

The public press has certainly not leaned heavy on his lordship. It has exhibited none of the bold vituperations which bruised HASTINGS from top to toe, nor of that stern hostility which perpetually assailed the administration of the Marquis of HASTINGS. It has exhibited even something of a quiescent favoritism, a gentle inclination to give him credit for anything that he did, and on the whole the sort of reluctance to find fault which one feels in the instance of promising but immature capacity—of an intelligent child. It might have acted differently with a man of acknowledged intellectual vigor, of a daring spirit, of a systematic ambition, or a superior natural designation to power. But, from the moment when success wiped away the disgraces of Cabul, his lordship became formidable. We pass by the loose and volatile panegyric which attributed the retrieval of the British arms to his lordship. That question has been long since settled. His merit there was, to have left the question of advance or retreat in the hands of the two gallant commanders; as their merit was to have decided on advance, and to have fought their way to the enemy's capital. But the wars of Scinde and Gwalior seem to have been exclusively his lordship's, and on them must his distinctions depend.

Of the war of Scinde no defender has ever appeared. The whole event has been characterized in the strongest language in the Legislature; but there no defender came forward. It has been assailed in all the forms of printing and pamphleteering: still even the stimulus of contradiction has not produced a defender. The most influential public journals have denounced it in the most unhesitating language. But where are we to look for its defender among the boundless diversities of newspaper opinion? The only argument which we ever heard in its favor was, that it was successful.

The war of Gwalior followed. In this war the diplomacy and the arms of England seem to have been in nearly equal peril. Then comes the question, what has been the advantage of this expenditure of blood and gold in both cases? We can judge only from the facts, that in Scinde it is necessary to keep up a force of 12,000 men, of whom one fourth are said to have been in hospital; and the climate is so much dreaded by the Sepoys, that mutiny, for the first time in the last quarter of a century, has shown itself in their ranks. Of the war of Gwalior the fruits, for good or evil, are yet to be gathered. But of its morality we may form our own opinion, from the proposition uttered, we believe, for the first time in a British legislature, that "in dealing with semi-barbarous nations we must lay aside nice distinctions in morality."

What the Governor-General may have proposed to do, or may be doing, is beyond knowledge; but if there be any truth in the common conjecture that the Punjab was tempting, that the disturbances of Lahore were opening a vista of conquest, or that the army of observation gathering on the banks of the Indus was for any purpose beyond that of absolute defence, we shall rejoice in his speedy return.

We fully believe his lordship to be a well-meaning man; but we regard his policy to be wholly hazardous to India. We have never been able to discover the necessity of his wars; and wars without necessity are contrary to the highest policy of England. We think that he deserves credit for his ready liberality to the troops, for his well-expressed praise of their generals, and for the generous and wise adoption of those marks of honor which have the proudest value to brave men. But England must leave barbarians or semibarbarians to settle their own quarrels; and the most lasting, because the purest, honor which a Governor-General can receive will be the testimony that he has cultivated the natural capacities of our Indian empire, elevated the British name by justice to the natives, and prepared the progress of Christianity by exhibiting the evidence of its value in the transactions of man with man.—Britannia, May 4.

INDIA.—The question of the Governor-General's recall was fully asked in the House of Commons on Tuesday last. But the answer, at once satisfying no one, and silencing every one, was given with his usual adroitness by the premier. It was tantamount to, "The thing is done and cannot be mended. Meddle with it and you only mar it. Lord ELLENBOROUGH is certainly coming home. Sir HENRY HARDINGE is certainly going out. Those are the facts of the case, and the House needs not trouble itself with the reasons." Nor need we. For us it is quite enough that the present Governor-General is under orders for home.

The rumors which assume the immediate grounds of his recall are the mere gossip of the day, the chat of St. James's-street, when it lets loose its club-men into the sunshine, the opinions of Almack's, and the profound whispers of the levée. With some the cause lies in financial puzzle, with others in martial ambition, a third party allude to negotiations for an alliance with the Great Mogul, and a fourth to a plan for removing the government to the summit of the Himmalaya, and building an Imperial palace on the model of Aurungzebe's, 27,000 feet above the level of the vulgar world. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?"

"Sum Davus non CEdipus" is a sufficient excuse for our shrinking from the development of matters so mighty; but the Governor-General is on the wing homeward, and we are satisfied.

Nothing, however, can be plainer than that the late Governor-General was not to be brought into the common category of governor-generalship. He had all the caprices of a great fiddler. Whether he played on one string, or on four, he was equally above the rules of his profession. England desired peace in India. Her policy, her experience, and her humanity equally urged her to live in quiet with her Indian subjects. And nothing could have been more startling to her than to find that Lord AUCKLAND had turned warrior. But his lordship's laurels were speedily cropped. The policy of shutting out the Russians from the north of India, which they never have, and never could have, approached, by attacking the frontier tribes, was laughed at in England; but the tremendous results, the horrid massacre, and the unparalleled defeat, flight, and ruin, raised the public feeling to indignation. But a question of the highest importance is the policy which is to be pursued by the new Governor-General. The question has been asked already in the House, and obtained no answer from the minister; for there is no answer in the formal language that "Sir HENRY HARDINGE must, of course, choose his own policy." He does not choose his own policy, and, whether he be so inclined, he must not. The honest, manly, and Christian feeling of the people of England must choose it for him. It will not suffer a false and furious spirit of aggrandizement to be the policy of Cabinets at home or Governor-Generals abroad. Regarding the Indian as one to whom justice as well as humanity is due, it will not endure to see war after war crushing multitudes of beings into a bloody grave without cause, provocation, or necessity. It will disdain the hollow pretences of broken treaties which those unfortunate people never could have comprehended, and will shrink from the accession of territory which has been first made a charnel for its original possessors. The success of those invasions has not justified them in the national eye. They are denounced at this moment by the honesty of England with as sacred a voice as when the public ear was first startled by their atrocity. In this censure we do not involve the brave army which have made those seizures. We acknowledge as fully as any of their panegyrists the talents and gallantry of the generals; but invincible courage and irresistible strength are not vindications. If by some new gift of power to man, those officers, instead of sweeping the natives before them by shot and shell, could launch the lightnings against them, slay their battalions and root up their fortresses by a flash from the skies, would that be an excuse for the massacre and the ruin? If we make unjust wars—and all unnecessary wars must be unjust, even if conquest gave into our hands every hill and valley from the wall of China to the Caucasus—we should be only preparing ourselves for the more condign punishment—we should be maturing some tremendous reverse—we should with every advance of our standards be only approaching with more rapid strides the edge of that gulf into which our strength, our renown, and our supremacy, would be precipitated forever. There is a God above us. He may be forgotten in the rashness of heated ambition, or in the subtlety of crooked counsel, but he will make himself remembered when all seems secure, and will smite when even the indignant voice of honor and feeling have ceased to complain. There are instances in which Providence has struck so directly and heavily on the heads of the immediate offenders, that no man can shut his eyes to the consequence or the cause. We have already alluded to the Cabul invasion as an example of rash aggression and useless injustice—an impolitic assault on a territory which we could never retain, or which, if retained, must be wholly unproductive in our hands. But we are entitled to allude to it in the higher sense of an example of Divine visitation. What was the fate of the original promoters and advisers of that wretched war? Who fell first? The whole local government, slain suddenly in all the fancied security of power. Unhappily, too, the blow fell wide, and involved the whole of the gallant army which was the instrument of these grasping councils. We have no instance in the records of British India of such utter extinction of an army. We have no record in the great European war of the French Revolution of so great a loss of life by a British force. We have none so great during the whole military annals of England. Of that brave army but one man escaped to bring his desperate tidings to a British garrison. When was there any destruction like this? And even this trampling of our battalions was not accomplished by rival courage and discipline, but by a mob of peasants half armed, and rude retainers—the wild matchlockmen and spearsmen of the hills, without a single piece of cannon. Yet before this mob perished a more numerous army than prostrated the Mahratta empire at Assaye. And even the means of ruin were scarcely less characteristic. That army was ruined by absolute infatuation. NAPOLEON, at Moscow, when he was ripening his destruction hour by hour, was not more the mark of infatuation. Every step that could be taken by fatuity was taken by the British commanders; every fault that could be committed was blindly chosen; habitual treachery was trusted, habitual hatred was taken for amity; open violence was taken for fidelity to engagements, and with the sword over their necks the British soldiery were duped into relying on Afghan mercy. The result was inevitable ruin. But, with this solemn and terrible warning still sounding in our ears, can we venture on new aggression, indulge in visions of endless conquest, and talk, in the extravagant language of the roval madmen of antiquity, of combining all the East under our dominion? The more modern word is protection, but the meaning is the same, the crime the same, and the punishment will be the same. Our late conquests, as they are called, (we can easily imagine the native name for them,) have cost the blood of two thousand or, perhaps, three thousand of our troops, and of, perhaps, ten times the number of the enemy's. Will not these things bring evil? Nothing is more evident than that they have not hitherto brought good, that Scinde is a burden, and that Gwalior is useless. If Sir HENRY HARDINGE carries with him the slightest intention of adopting the "aggressive system," we deeply deprecate his policy. But this we will not believe. He has hitherto had the character of an intelligent and high-principled man, and this he can sustain only by governing India in the spirit of justice, and clearing the British name from the curse of war.

Britannia, May 11.

TEXAS.—The arrival of the Acadia steamer has put the public in possession of the intelligence, so little doubted by any one who has known the grasping conduct of the American republic in all its transactions, the signing of a treaty for the annexation of Texas by the government of the United States. It is, however, said that this is merely an experiment, that the measure has still to make its way through the Senate, and that there is every probability of its not being able to make its way through. This we altogether doubt. The virtue of the Senate is on a par with the virtue of the populace, and, even if some partial opposition for form's sake should be raised, the treaty will be ultimately ratified.

The obvious fact is, that in a republic there can be no public justice; the populace are its virtual governors, the will of the streets sets the will of the Legislature at defiance; and we thus have paupers deciding on property, and bankrupts on justice, clamor putting down conscience, ignorance settling affairs which demand knowledge, and rabble prejudices acting with a sense of full impunity, and rabble passions threatening every man who has the honesty to stand up for the common principles of justice between nations.

The annexation of Texas will undoubtedly be scorned by all honest men, as one of the most flagrant offences ever committed by a nation professing a respect for human rights, and reprobated by all rational men as one of the most barefaced violations of all the principles of reasoning.

The case is distinctly this:—Some years ago Texas, a province of Mexico, being largely peopled with refugees and squatters from the United States, revolted and went to war with the parent state. Mexico being unable to conquer her revolted subjects, Texas declared itself independent and established a Republican government. This government was acknowledged by England and other countries, but never by Mexico, which, of course, still regarded Texas as simply its rebel province, which it was resolved to bring back whenever it should have the power. Texas, at length, feeling that it is unable to sustain the struggle with Mexico, proposes to become a portion of the United States, for the express purpose of preventing its conquest by its original masters, and there the matter stands at this moment. To such a proposal what ought to be the language of the American?

"We are at peace with Mexico, and we therefore must not interfere with her rights. If the independence of Texas shall be acknowledged by Mexico, then we may accept it as a portion of the United States. But Mexico still regards Texas as one of her provinces, and not less such because it may have for a while repulsed the power of the parent state. But, if we take it into connection with us, we prohibit Mexico from ever becoming mistress of it again, which she fully intends to do, and has every right to do. Thus we actually rob a state with whom we are at peace."

And the arguments by which the letters of the Secretaries of Government attempt to support this desperate appropriation are perfectly suited to its character. They pretended, in the first instance, that America had a right to the annexation, because England probably would either seize Texas, or at least make some alliance with it which might become injurious to the United States. But this was promptly and distinctly disclaimed by the English Cabinet. The next pretext was, that England, in expressing her opinion against the continuance of slavery in Texas, intended to make that a commencement for intrigues against the slave system in the United States. To that Lord ABERDEEN gave the most complete denial.

The pretext now is, that England, by making the general declaration of her wish to see slavery extinguished in every part of the world, renders it necessary that America should possess Texas; as if, in process of time, any abolition should occur there, it might injure the interests of the slave-dealing states of America. Thus, though no attempt whatever is made, nor intended to be made, on the slave system of America, the Government of the United States is to feel itself authorized to take possession, merely to prevent an evil wholly improbable and utterly disclaimed. The true reason is, that America longs to possess this portion of her neighbor's goods, a fertile territory nearly as large as France.

It would be only trifling with the common understanding of man to expose the ridiculous arguments to which those arguers are driven. It is enough for the world to know that the republic which laid down as its first principle that "all men are by nature equal," comes forward now as the formal advocate of slavery, and the only one except the King of Ashantee. Slavery is for the first time defined to be "a political institution," not a suffering and a misery—a sale of beings as immortal as ourselves, and the abandonment of men, be their color what it may, to the wretchedness, the vice, the cruelty, and the despair which must be included in all the general corruptions of transatlantic slavery.

It is enough to excite universal disgust to know that in America human beings are actually born and reared for exportation, like pigs; that creatures capable of local attachment and natural affections are habitually dragged from the place of their birth and all their early associations, and sent into distant countries for sale—thus incurring, from mere avarice of their fellow-man and the mere circumstance of being born, that separation from country and friends which marks the punishment of felons in Europe; or that children are torn from their parents, never to see or be seen by them again in this world; and all this only to put money in the pocket of a ruffian with his mouth stuffed full with the verbiage of liberty and philanthropy.

But one of the arguments of CALHOUN, the Secretary of State, is, actually, that slavery is a good to the negro, and that he becomes "blind, deaf, dumb, or idiotic" when free. What the wretched African may be among a slaveholding population, or a rabble of canting democrats, is nothing to the purpose. Let the question be asked, what he is in his country! Is he a sufferer by the loss of eyes, tongue, or understanding in his own country? We have heard no more extraordinary libel on freedom in the lips of an inquisitor or a gaoler. At all events, this is the first time in which we have ever heard the continuance of slavery justified as a "political institution," necessary to the state; or an act of palpable insult to the law of nations justified by a state convenience and an imaginary contingency. In the great dramatist's phrase:—

"This will not, and it cannot, come to good."

Britannia.

It is not to be supposed that republics are less greedy and ambitious than monarchies; they are often influenced by the worst passions of royal houses and dynasties, and are, generally speaking, only more covetous and sordid, in so far as the democratic feeling preponderates above what is peculiar to an educated aristocracy. In one of the speeches of Mr. Windham at the close of the French war by the peace of Amiens, that statesman acutely observed—"That, though the United States had not been rocked in the same cradle of revolution as France, they had imitated some of her deeds in a manner more ignoble and profligate; and that whilst Buonaparte had been appropriating to himself whole kingdoms in Germany and Italy, the United States of America had seized upon a brace of continents as their shares of the plunder, and that Louisiana and New Florida had passed into their hands almost without the discharge of a musket."

In treaties made by the United States it does not always happen that a ratification follows a convention. In the late treaty of the German Zollverein for admitting the commodities of those states upon very low duties into America, to the manifest infraction of the commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain; the convention, though made, has not yet been ratified; and it is not improbable that the American Senate will reject this treaty for the annexation of Texas, and upon these two grounds; that it is an act of appropriation made without the consent of the mother country, Mexico, from which Texas has been torn by the fury of civil war; and secondly, on the principle that such an appropriation would not carry along with it the sanction of Great Britain and other European powers.

The two points which concern Great Britain in this case are, first, the relations in which we have voluntarily placed ourselves as regards Texas on the one hand, and the United States on the other; and the second point for consideration is, how we should be affected, both according to the principles of our treaty and the laws of humanity, in case the Senate should adopt the treaty, and Congress proceed to enforce the annexation of Texas against the government of Mexico.

As respects the first point, the late American papers contain several official despatches from our own government, which the President has laid before the Senate; and one in particular from Mr. Pakenham, the British minister, containing a letter from the Earl of Aberdeen, addressed to him at Washington in February last.

Now it is impossible to read this letter without perceiving how much we have been embarrassed by the late imprudent policy of the Whigs in their absurd recognition of the independence of Texas without first procuring the consent of Mexico.

By recognizing the independence of Texas, we have placed her in the condition of negotiating for herself, and left her free to annex herself to Northern America, and to incorporate and merge her own independence and self-government in the general confederation of the United States. It is thus difficult to see what right we have to interfere to prohibit this annexation. If Texas be independent for one purpose she is independent for another; and the Continental Powers might as well have interposed some forty years ago, to have prevented the union of Great Britain and Ireland, as we interpose to prohibit Texas from sinking her independence in the general government of the United States. Lord Aberdeen's letter, indeed, does not point to any such intention on the part of Great Britain, and if we are right in collecting the spirit of it, it seems indirectly to sanction any steps which Texas or the United States may take to carry the incorporation into effect. The letter is rather addressed, indeed, to urge Mexico to recognize the independence of Texas, and to point out to the United States, and to the whole world, the constant and immutable purpose of England, to procure the general abolition of slavery in its two branches of slave-trading and slave-holding; that is, of foreign importation and domestic slavery.

And here we cannot overlook the obstacle which has been raised up against our own humanity, by our too precipitate recognition of the independence of Texas, to which we were principally urged by a treaty, offered upon their part, as a condition of the recognition, namely, that they would not only refrain from slave-trading, but pledge themselves to put down the entire system of domestic slavery as rapidly as possible. This was the main inducement to the recognition of the independence of Texas on the part of Great Britain, and we cannot but perceive that in case of the incorporation of Texas in the American Union, all power to enforce this condition of the treaty will be altogether lost. Whilst Texas remained independent we had a right to call upon her to make constant efforts to uproot slavery from her soil. It was for this purpose we recognized her independence and advanced her to a free state. But the moment Texas is merged into the United States, we can no longer use this language. She has passed from us, and we have no longer any control over her. We have given you independence, and like a prodigal you have sold it; and you can no longer concur with us, even if sincerely disposed, in that great work of benevolence for which we contracted with you in the first instance. In passing into the body of the confederated States of North America, you engage in new ties and bonds directly opposed to your former assurances and our expectations. The Southern States, of which you become one, are zealously upholding that very condition which it is the object of England to destroy throughout the whole compass of the globe.

In addition to these unpleasant consequences of the annexation there is yet one other observation which applies itself to the new condition of Texas, supposing the incorporation takes place. England can no longer interpose with Mexico to recognize the independence of her chief province, and for this cogent reason, that Texas has ceased to be an independent State herself by becoming one of the American Union and Confederate States. As respects Mexico, Texas has not only achieved her independence, but, having obtained it, has also sold it; and in this state of things Great Britain can no longer interfere with the parent State.

But it is still possible that one or two states of circumstances may arise, and lead to considerable embarrassment, both on our part and on that of the United States. The first is, an attempt, not improbable, of the United States, to force upon Mexico the recognition of Texan independence by arms; and the next is,—the non-consent of the other European powers to the annexation.

In the first case, we think Great Britain will have a right to interfere, and to say that Mexico shall not be compelled to surrender up her province by force; in which case the United States could do nothing without exposing themselves to a war, and this they would not be disposed to hazard for the sake of the intended annexation. Again, the other states of Europe, not having recognized Texas, would have a full right to resist the Americans in what may be deemed a conquest upon the southern continent. Now in the event of either of these circumstances occurring, much public confusion would arise. England might be compelled to interfere to prevent Mexico being forced, and the European States might be inclined to resist the further aggrandizement of the United States. It is, therefore, our sincere wish that the Senate at Washington may reject the message of the President, and prefer their present safe condition to the hazard of a future war.

FRANCE.

PRINCE DE JOINVILLE. Paris has been startled by the appearance of the Prince de Joinville as a pamphleteer, in opposition to the ministry but in harmony with the war-party. Ministers are reported to have protested against the publication of the prince's lucubrations; the king himself is said to have exerted his paternal authority in an endeavor at suppression; but the royal agitator was obstinate, and the pamphlet was published on Wednesday. It is a Cassandra-like warning on the state of the French navy. The author disclaims animosity to England and desire for war; but speculates freely on the feasibility of attacking this island, and of destroying our confidence in our insular position and in our commercial marine. When sailing was the only resource of the navy, he says, France could not compete with England, because success belonged to whichever nation could furnish most sailors. Now an engine takes the place of a hundred sailors, and France could always furnish enough soldiers and money for a steam-marine. To preserve peace, one must be prepared for war; and steam-navigation gives France an opportunity of attaining equality with England. But her ministers have allowed England to get the start; hence his pamphlet.

SLAVERY. The most important circumstance of the week is the declaration of M. Guizot, that the French Government have resolved to abolish slavery. In the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, a petition was presented from the operatives of Paris for the abolition of negro slavery in the French colonies. An animated debate took place on it, in the course of which M. Guizot explicitly declared that it was the determination of the government to abolish negro slavery in the French colonies, and that in their course they would be guided by the example and the experience of Great Britain. Ultimately the petition was referred to the Minister of Marine.

The importance of that declaration cannot be estimated too highly. The moral effect of the abolition in the French colonies will be immense. It will be a great step to the extinction of slavery all over the world.

The Patrie states that M. Thiers has concluded his History of the Empire, and is to deliver the manuscript on Tuesday to the publisher, who is to pay him 500,000 francs for the work.

There is no other topic of interest in the French papers, if we except some remarks on the address of the Archbishop of Paris to the King on his majesty's fête-day, on Wednesday in last week. The Primate did not conceal his dissatisfaction at the present state of the University question, nor did the king scruple to hint a charge of contumacy and ingratitude. The archbishop did not attend the banquet given in the evening.—Britannia, May 11.

SPAIN.

THERE has been a change of Ministry in Spain, and no one seems to care one straw for the matter, except the gentlemen of the Bolsa, the Bourse, and the Exchange. The story told is strange. Senor Gonzales Bravo resigns, because he objects to restoring confiscated church property. This is pretty tantamount to Mr. Gregory, editor of the Satirist, refusing to be First Lord of the Treasury, because he objected to the Archbishop of Canterbury being allowed to reside at Lambeth.

Christina and her Moderado politicians resemble much a crew of those inexperienced sailors, who venture to sea with no reliance upon their own skill, or upon the compass, but who direct all their zeal and hope to the image of the patron saint, the object of their orisons. Christina and Narvaez scorn constitutional law and rights,—the mariner's compass of the political ocean,—whilst they kneel down to Pope and Church to save them; Pope and Church having as much influence over the political doings of an emancipated people like the Spaniards, as the image of the saint has over the winds, which he is thought to control.

But the Pope is true to the traditional craft of his court. Revolutionary France was about as unmanageable a subject as the Court of Rome could have had to deal with; but when Bonaparte wanted to be crowned, like Charlemagne, by the Pope's hands, the Pontif seized his advantage and secured the concordat. By this concordat the Pope has a veto upon the nomination of all bishops, whilst the appointment of all the clergy of France is exclusively in episcopal hands. Such a church militant was never allowed to be formed in a free country. Now has come the turn of Spain. Christina has been naughty. Her marriage with Munoz is not a regular one, and puts one in mind of the observation of the gentleman in the "Demoiselles de St. Cyr." "Fie," says a lady to him, "you so gallant, whilst you are a married man."—"Je le suis si peu," is the reply. Now Christina is so little married, that she wants the Pope, for her children's sake and her own, to make up all defects. His Holiness does not refuse, but he imposes as a penance or a price the restoration of church property at least to the secular clergy. His Holiness, by this demand, has come in conflict with the great power of the age, the money market, for not only is the property mortgaged to the creditors, but in the sales of it the state bonds are taken in payment to a certain degree, which keep up the price of said bonds; and the struggle of the Bolsa versus the Pope, will be fierce.

On the part of Christina this is merely a domestic move; but in the opinion of Narvaez it is a great political affair: he is zealous to build up a monarchy like Charles the Fifth, and although he wants all the materials, he still thinks it may be done if he could get a Ximenes to aid him. And he has got an Archbishop of Toledo, as proud and as bigoted as need be, but poor as a rat, who says, "Give me money, and I will give you power." But where the power or the money is to come from is a mystery, and must remain so, especially as this alliance between Church and State begins by a downright quarrel with the monied potentates.—Examiner.

SOCIAL STATE OF SPAIN.—The following extract from a private letter, dated Madrid, May 4, and which we copy from the Morning Post, contains some singular illustrations of the state of society in this ill-governed and distracted country:—

"But now for a few details as to its social relations. I shall take my illustrations from commercial life. No one that is familiar with commercial habits of business in England can be otherwise than struck with the singular customs of mercantile men here. Having a letter of introduction and of credit upon a great merchant in one of the first towns of Spain, I had the opportunity, whilst enjoying the hospitality of the worthy senor, of seeing his manner of doing business. Having asked him where he kept his bank, he showed me a strong room, where piles of uncounted silver were heaped upon the floor. Having asked an explanation, he said he kept his money in this form, because if robbers broke in they might take as much as they could carry, and still not ruin him. But a far more curious instance is the following:—There exists a firm of the highest possible respectability, and doing immense business in the wine trade, in a town of forty thousand inhabitants, within a few miles of a seaport of still greater dimensions. This firm, thanks to the disorganized state of the country, keeps constantly upon the premises from £15,000 to £20,000 in gold, ready for the purchase of vintages of wine. Many have been the attempts to break into these immense warehouses. For instance, a barber's shop next door was hired by some unknown parties, and a hole bored through the party-wall. This proceeding was fortunately found out, the aforesaid house purchased and razed to the ground, and a strong room built in the very centre of the warehouses. There £20,000 in gold were locked up at first; but, fortunately, one day, the senor of the house had £8,000 removed into a cellar of difficult access, below ground. A few days afterwards, on going to the strong room, the cashier found that all the money had disappeared, excepting a few bags of French five-franc pieces, which the robbers probably did not find convenient to carry off. The locks of the doors had not been tampered with—the robbers had entered by the common sewer of the town, at a great distance, and there had begun mining and vaulting in the most scientific manner, until they found themselves beneath the strong room, which they pierced through from below, and effected their purpose. The head of the firm, who was absent, on returning home, vainly sought to discover the robbers. A young friend of his, however, found out the clue; but having unfortunately stated his suspicions one night at a coffee-house, he was assassinated at twelve o'clock at night, just as he was going out of his door. The principal authors of the robbery and subsequent murder are more than suspected to be a mason well acquainted with the premises, and a lawyer, who has ceased to visit the owners, but who was wont to be a constant visitor previous to the robbery, and go about the warehouses hitting the floor with his cane, no doubt sounding, to ascertain the progress of the mining operations. These two worthies have lately lived in splendor, and in perfect impunity—thanks to the terror they inspire. Such is the social state of Spain."

HAYTI.

The following lamentable account of the insurrection at Hayti we copy from the Jamaica Gazette of the 8th April:—

The French brig Adelina, Capt. Tahet, arrived in this port on Saturday evening, bringing disastrous intelligence, and no less than 140 passengers, including 25 children—all persons of color, and compelled to fly from their native land, to seek refuge under the flag of foreigners. The new president, Herard, had marched with a large army for St. Domingo city, to quell the insurrection in the eastern portion of the island. Taking advantage of the absence of the general and troops, the black people rose en masse on Sunday, the 31st ultimo, and commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of the brown population. On Wednesday the National Guards of the town of Aux Cayes went out with two pieces of ordnance to suppress the rebellion and punish the rebels, but, as we have learned, their own general commanding delivered up the cannons to the blacks, and joined them himself. Thus strengthened they drove the National Guard back to Aux Cayes, entered the town, and commenced a relentless butchery—murdering every brown person, without regard to sex or age. The wretched inhabitants had no means of defence, no refuge, save on board the few foreign ships lying in the harbor—French, American, and English. Into these they crowded in confused and huddled batches—men, women, and children literally covering the decks, and exhibiting a distressing spectacle of misery and sudden destitution. But the decked vessels were not sufficient to hold the number of wretched refugees; the port was dotted over with small open boats, each containing as many human beings as it could hold, who dared not remain on land to await certain massacre, and yet could have little hope of escape by sea. Capt. Tahet could not think of leaving to a miserable fate those who had fled to his protection and the guardianship of the tricolor. He was bound for France, and had but provisions sufficient for his crew. With disinterested generosity he sailed for Jamaica, and here has safely landed his unhappy freight.

MISCELLANEOUS INTELLIGENCE.

COMMERCE IN THE CHINESE SEAS.—The French government have published extracts from despatches of their naval commanders in the Chinese seas, relative to the commerce of those countries. The report of the commander of the Heroine concerning the trade of the Dutch with Japan, is curious and circumstantial. The Dutch send a vessel of 1000 tons to Japan each year, one half the freight of which is sugar. Camphor and copper are what they import in return. Twelve Chinese junks generally sail each year from Ningpo to Japan. Last year 16 were sent, and the Japanese made no objection to the augmentation. The 16, according to the French captain, were laden with English woollen, cotton, and silk stuffs. Captain Belcher, of the Samarang, has been ordered to survey the coast of Japan, and, if possible, form some trading arrangement for the English. The captain of the Heroine states the sugar of Cochin to sell there at from 34 to 4 piastres the picul, but, as the king has the monopoly of trade, and as he gives exports but in proportion as the imports please him, the trade is far from certain.

A STOUT ROPE.—A rope has just been spun by the Gourcock rope-work company, which exceeds in its dimensions anything of the kind ever manufactured on the Clyde. It is 672 feet in length, and 11 inches in circumference, and weighs 32 cwt. 2 qrs. 7 lb. It was finished in three hours. It is intended for a coal-pit near Glasgow.

GIIPSY WIT.—A short time since, two young ladies were accosted by a gipsy woman, who told them, that, for a shilling each, she would show them their husband's faces in a pail of water; which, being brought, they exclaimed, "Why, we only see our own faces." "Well," said the old woman, "those faces will be your husbands' when you are married."

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—About three weeks since, as some men were employed sowing oats near Marshwood, in the parish of Dulverton, Devon, they heard the sheep-bitch, and a bitch terrier that had accompanied them, barking in the adjoining wood, and fancied it was at some bird on one of the trees. After finishing their work, they went to look for them, and strange as it may appear, found the sheep bitch suckling four young foxes which the terrier had helped her to dig out. Both the dogs had whelped about ten days before, and had their young destroyed. The cubs are doing well, and may be seen at Mr. Webber's, Draydon farm, under the fostering care of both the sheep-bitch and terrier, who share in their support, and who appear to vie with each other in cherishing them.

BAR TO MARRIAGE.—The government of the principality of Waldek, in Germany, have given public notice, that no license to marry will hereafter be granted to any individual who is addicted to drunkenness; or, if he have been so, he must exhibit full proofs that he is no longer a slave to this vice. The same government have also directed that, in every report made by the ecclesiastical, municipal, and police authorities, upon petition for license to marry, the report shall distinctly state whether either of the parties desirous of entering into matrimonial connexion, is given to intemperance or otherwise.

A FAMILY BOTTLE.—About sixty years ago, a pair of bluecaps built their nest in a large stone bottle, which was left to drain between the lower boughs of a fruit tree, in the garden of Calender, near Stockton. Every year since that period, they, or their progeny, have regularly reared their young in the same bottle; and during the last few days the birds have again been busily employed in constructing their nest in their old domicile, in the neck of which they are constantly entering in and out all the "live long day." The neck of the bottle just admits the birds.—Cumberland Packet.

WHOLESALE MARRIAGES.—During the whole of Tuesday, Duke's-place, Aldgate, and its vicinity, presented a gay and animated appearance, in consequence of the numerous weddings which had taken place amongst the "ancient people." In the Roman Catholic Church, marriages are prohibited, except under peculiar circumstances, during Lent, so that it is a very common custom in Ireland, especially the humbler classes, for a number of couples to get married on the Shrove Tuesday. Amongst the Hebrew community a similar prohibition for 28 days exists, and Wednesday being the day preceding the commencement of the prohibition, no fewer than 28 marriages were said to have been solemnized at the three eastern Synagogues—namely, Duke's-place, Great Saint Helen's, and Leadenhall-street.

BIRTH IN A WHEELBARROW.—On Saturday, a woman named Thompson, who procures a scanty subsistence by vending hearth-stone, was taken suddenly ill whilst passing through the East India-road, Poplar, and it soon appeared that she was in strong labor pains. A crowd soon collected, which attracted some constables to the spot, who, in the exigency of the case, had no other resource than to deposit her in her own wheelbarrow, where she was quickly delivered of a fine female child. The poor woman and her infant are both doing well.

AN ARISTOCRATIC CONVICT.—We find the following in the Aix la Chapelle Gazette.—"The Baroness de Zoller, the wife of a very distinguished officer, has been condemned to five years' imprisonment for having confined her mother, who was about to marry a protestant. She wanted in this way to prevent the marriage. A petition was sent in by her friends praying for a commutation of the punishment, but the king replied that, looking at the nature of the offence, this was impossible."

THE GREAT CHESS MATCH.—It having been insinuated by the French champion, M. St. Amant, that Mr. Staunton, in his late proposals for playing a match at chess with any player in Europe, had imposed conditions which he knew were unacceptable to him, our countryman instantly published a prompt and decisive refutation of the charge, in the shape of a challenge addressed to M. St. Amant himself for a new match.

UNDER the date of "Dresden, 29th April," the Globe says—"Queen Victoria will not come to Germany this summer; but the King of Saxony will go to England on the 29th May, to pay a visit to the English Court. His Majesty will also visit Scotland. The whole journey is to be accomplished in six weeks."

ANTI-STATE CHURCH.—Delegates from all parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland, assembled at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, on 30th April, as an "Anti-State Church Conference," to consider the best means of effecting a severance between the Church and the State. Upwards of twelve hundred delegates were present; amongst whom were, Dr. Bowring, M. P., Mr. S. Crawford, M. P., Mr. J. S. Trelawney, M. P., Mr. J. Sturge, Dr. Epps, and several dissenting ministers. The Reverend John Burnet was called to the chair. A long report was read by Dr. Cox, and speeches were made by Mr. Sharman Crawford, Dr. Bowring, and others; all in accordance with the main object. The Reverend Dr. Young moved a resolution, declaring that "the Conference was not intended as a demonstration of nonconformist strength, and that its object was the disenthralment of religion from the influence of secular control." In the course of the two next days, several other papers were read and resolutions passed on the subject of ecclesiastical establishments; one resolution announcing an appeal to Parliament for the abolition of all laws supporting any particular form of worship or exacting public contributions in support of it. On Wednesday, it was resolved to establish a society to be called "The British Anti-State Church Association," and to hold a conference every three years. An executive committee was appointed to carry out the plan; and, with thanks to the officers of the conference, the assembly broke up.

The average number of letters passing through the Post-office every week at the present time, as shown by returns to the House of Commons just published, is upwards of 4,598,573. A correspondent remarks, that "if every letter thus sent economically for one penny during a single week were to pay twopence—one penny for postage, and one penny to the national testimonial to Rowland Hill—it would add £19,019 to the subscription."

FURNITURE OF NAPOLEON.—On Wednesday a sale by auction of the property of the late Sir Hudson Lowe, including some portion of the furniture which was in the possession of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena, took place at the auction rooms of Mr. Phillips, by order of the executors of Sir Hudson Lowe. These consisted of about twenty lots, and among them were a large mahogany frame indulging chair, banded with ebony, on castors, from the Emperor's study, 15*l.* 5*s.*; a small circular mahogany pillar and claw table, on which Napoleon burnt pastiles, 6*l.* 6*s.*; a six-foot pedestal library table, formed of mahogany and yew tree, on which table he almost always wrote, 18*l.* 18*s.*; an ebonied arm chair, with cane seat and back, formed of common materials (there was a hole in the cane seat, which had been caused by being constantly used, and it was stated by some brokers in the room not to be worth 1*s.* 6*d.*). From the chair being light it was carried about by the Emperor when he took his walks at Longwood. It was bought for £6.

The Queen had appointed Philip Henry Stanhope, Esq., (commonly called Viscount Mahon,) and the Right Honorable Thomas Babington Macaulay, "to be additional Commissioners for the purpose of inquiring whether advantage might not be taken of the rebuilding of the Houses of Parliament for promoting and encouraging the Fine Arts."

The amazing increase in the daily duty of the General Post-office is manifested in every department. Since the reduction of the rates on foreign, colonial, inter-colonial, and inland letters, the number, both inwards and outwards, has materially increased.

A LIVERPOOL MERCHANT.—In 1836 the transactions of Mr. Brown's house amounted to £10,000,000. In 1837, the American banks, all over the Union, went down one after another, and many together, almost with a universal crash. They fell, and their fall involved the Messrs. Brown. The latter were not crushed, but they were bruised. American commerce was at that time a towering pile in course of erection; bank credit was the scaffolding. It fell, and the Browns were not far from being smothered in the rubbish. Had they possessed less than the strength of giants they could not have extricated themselves, and, giants as they were, they would have struggled in vain had not a powerful hand assisted them. The British government saw, and looked with apprehension as it saw, the struggles of this gigantic establishment. From Inverness to Penzance there was not a single town but would have felt its fall. In Sheffield and Birmingham, and the towns surrounding them, and in Manchester, Leeds, and all the great factory communities, a large number of the merchants and employers, and, as a matter of course, every man and woman employed were less or more involved in the fate of this establishment. The government of that day saw the imminent peril, and so did the directors of the Bank of England; the latter met, and passed a resolution to give assistance to Mr. Brown to the extent of two millions. The exact sum which he was authorized to draw—a loan of money to an individual unparalleled in the history of the world—was £1,959,000. Of this loan he took advantage to the extent of between eight and nine hundred thousand pounds, which he has since repaid, besides clearing off all other embarrassments. What Mr. Brown's personal fortune may be now, it is not necessary to inquire. It is ample—probably not less than the sum which he was authorized to borrow from the Bank of England in 1837, probably more.—Chronicle.

A LETTER from Stockholm states that, from motives of economy, the king will not get himself crowned either in Sweden or Norway. Three other kings, those of France, Prussia, and Belgium, not having undergone this ceremony, the king of Sweden, it is said, feels that he can very well dispense with it.

LETTERS from Paris state that a new absentee-tax, ordained by the Emperor of Russia, has frightened home numbers of that nation. For a family of three, who pass a year away from Russia, the absentee-tax amounts to about £240.

The English vocalists find separate entertainments, in which story and song are combined, the most popular and profitable. Mr. Lover has brought out a new budget of national melodies and anecdotes, which he christens the Irish Brigade: hilarious echoes responded to their rattling fire of jokes, and whenever the Irish Brigade has a field-day—appropriately numbered among Irish Evenings—the corps will come off with flying colors.

MR. WILSON has also produced a new entertainment of Scottish song, the Jacobite Relics; affording a rich fund of characteristic melodies united with sweet poetry and racy humor. It carries us to the very fountain-head of this peculiar inspiration—goes so far back as the battles of Killcrankie and Sheriffmuir, and comes so far down as the eve of the '45. Wilson appears to have taken a new lease of his voice, so fresh and sound does it ring upon the ear—we never heard it to more advantage than this week.

DECORATIVE DESIGNS FOR THE NEW PARLIAMENT HOUSES.—Our attention has been drawn to a pamphlet furnishing explanations of a design for providing stained glass windows for the House of Lords, illustrative of the principal eras in English history. A specimen of the stained glass, and a complete design for one window, are now on exhibition among the decorative specimens in the St. James'-street Bazaar. The design is certainly clever, and the plan of surrounding the monarchs of England with the great men who reflected most lustre on their reigns, ingenious and well devised. The details are of course susceptible of any required alterations, should the idea be favorably received. It is an historical fact that the tapestry hangings in the House of Lords furnished Chatham with the theme of his grandest burst of eloquence when Lord Suffolk justified the employment of the wild Indians against the devoted colonists in the American war:—

"From the tapestry that adorns these walls the immortal ancestor of this noble lord frowns with indignation at the disgrace of his country. In vain he led your victorious fleets against the boasted Armada of Spain—in vain he defended and established the honor, the liberties, the religion, the Protestant religion, of this country against the arbitrary cruelties of Popery, if these more than Popish cruelties are let loose among us."

Obviously it must be for the advantage of the country that its Senate House should be decorated with whatever can fill the mind with grand and elevated thoughts, or which can recall past glories and inspire sentiments of principle and patriotism. In this way it would seem that the stained windows, besides being highly ornamental, and ministering to that taste for art which is always healthful and purifying, might present a pleasing record of illustrious examples of genius and virtue, and throw upon the very floor of the house, as the sun shone through the painted glass, reflected images of national triumphs in the arts of peace and war.

HORRIBLE ACCIDENT.—An occurrence of a distressing character took place on Freckleton marsh. A young man, named Walton Kirby, set off with the intention of proceeding to Preston with his intended bride to make some purchases. The latter, it appeared, had started before him, but he not being aware of this, was loitering with the expectation of meeting her. He was, however, passed by a man who informed him that she was some distance in advance. On hearing this he took a short pipe, which he was smoking, from his mouth and put it in his coat pocket, and then started off at a quicker rate. A brisk wind was blowing, and it is believed that this caused the fragments of the tobacco in the pipe to set fire to his coat, which he did not perceive till it was beyond his power to extinguish the flames. A cottager, named Henry Harrison, having his attention attracted by the flames, saw a man prostrate on the ground, but before he reached him the poor fellow had started off in the direction of the toll-gate, distant about a quarter of a mile. The flames had spread over his garments so rapidly that when he arrived at the gate-house scarcely a fragment of clothing was left upon his person, a belt which he wore only being entire; even his shoes were calcined by the fire. When Harrison arrived at the gate the poor man was imploring assistance from the gate-keeper, which, however, was inhumanly refused, and Harrison was under the necessity of taking him to his own cottage, distant upwards of a mile, where he furnished him with clothes. No hopes are entertained of his recovery.—Preston Chronicle.

POST-OFFICE RETURNS.—The ordinary Post-office returns, which have just been made to Parliament, show, among others, the following results:—

The number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom, in 1843, was upwards of 220 millions. The three weeks which are given of 1844, show an increase over the corresponding week of 1843, of a quarter of a million letters per week—this is an increase in the rate of increase, owing, no doubt, to improvement in trade. The letters of the London district post are now at the rate of twenty-six millions per annum, or fully double the number under the old system, notwithstanding that, up to the date of the returns, there had been no increase in the number of town deliveries. The gross revenue of the year 1843 was £1,620,867, and the net revenue £640,217; showing in each instance an increase, as compared with 1842, of about £10,000; which, considering the important reductions in foreign rates, is as much as could be expected. We have stated the revenue as it ought to have been given in the return—it is given at about £85,000 less, owing, as explained in a note, to certain old debts (some fifty years old) having been written off. The gross revenue is now about 70 per cent. of that received under the old system, and it exceeds that obtained during the fourpenny rate.

The money orders still increase in number and amount. The sum annually remitted through the Post office in England and Wales alone is now nearly five millions. The increase of money orders, since 1839, is twenty-five fold.—Examiner.

DRUNKENNESS AND MURDER.—A Dantsic journal publishes the following horrible account, and guarantees its authenticity:—The clergyman of a village in Lithuania had amongst his parishioners a young man dreadfully given to intoxication. Finding all other means of reforming him useless the clergyman took him one day to the church, and there made him swear solemnly, in the presence of the image of Christ, that he would abstain altogether from spirituous liquors. In the evening of the same day the young man met some friends, who invited him to a public-house. He refused, and told them the motive of his refusal, for which he was so ridiculed that he at length consented to accompany them, and soon fell dead drunk from his chair. In this state the publican had him removed to the house of his father and mother, who, being very religious persons, and knowing the oath that he had taken, were much shocked at his perjury. They called together all the members of the family, and it was decided that he had made himself the slave of the devil, and that it would be pleasing to God to put him to death immediately. They consequently mixed some pulverized arsenic in an infusion of herbs, and giving it to the drunkard, who was still insensible from the fumes of the brandy that he had taken, he died in a few hours in violent convulsions. His murderers have been arrested, and will be brought for trial, for a crime committed by them under an idea that it would be agreeable to the Almighty.

A wet silk handkerchief, tied, without folding over the face, is, it is said, security against suffocation from smoke; it permits free breathing, and at the same time excludes the smoke from the lungs.

A LETTER from St. Petersburg states that it is proposed to construct a new line of communication from the frontier between Russia and Galicia to the seaport of Odessa, and that by means of the junction of the railroads at Cracow a similar communication will be opened with the Baltic and the North Sea.

The German Society for emigration to Texas, has purchased 450 square miles of that country, near St. Antonio de Bexar, and send their first batch in September.

EXTRAORDINARY TAKE OF SALMON WITH ROD AND LINE.—Four inhabitants of Newark have caught, at a place called the Devon Mouth, which empties itself into the Trent, near the above town, no less than 32 salmon, varying from 8lb. to 16lb. each; a circumstance not to be remembered by the oldest inhabitant living. The fish were taken within three days.—Doncaster Gazette.

THE LEADING DIPLOMATISTS OF EUROPE.—It has been much the fashion of the day to express an absurd wonder that the Jews possess so much influence in so many European cabinets. Why, they possess this influence in all, for show me the cabinet in which one at least of the privy councillors is not a Jew. A few years ago I went to negotiate a public loan to St. Petersburg. On my arrival I had an immediate interview with the Russian minister of finance, Count Cancrin; I found him the son of a Lithuanian Jew. I afterwards went to Madrid on a like errand, and I had to transact business with the Spanish minister, Mendizabal, the son of a Spanish Jew. Something connected with this loan required me to proceed straight to Paris, to consult the president of the French Council, Marshal Soult, in whom I found another Jew. Marshal Massena was also a Jew, his real name being Manasseh. Nor did my experience end here. Having a short time afterwards to go to Prussia, I was attending the council of ministers, when Count Arnim entered the cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew.

From the Montreal Courier, April 12.

STRANGE MALADY IN NEW BRUNSWICK.—We translate the following from the Quebec Canadian: we have seen no account of the affair in any of the lower province journals as yet:—

"The Governor of New Brunswick, Sir W. Colebrooke, has sent a message to the legislature on the subject of a disorder, the most hideous and fatal, which exists among the French population on the borders of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and which the medical men of the neighborhood consider, resembles the leprosy of the 17th century. It appears that this disgusting malady made its first appearance in 1842, and that, since that year, seven persons have died of it after languishing for five or six weeks in the most miserable condition. One of these patients, who had been 'sequestrée' in a log hut, and fed through a hole, died, as is believed, in a state of mental derangement, and the contagion was so much dreaded, that, in some cases, the inspector of the poor had been himself obliged to carry to these unfortunate creatures the food necessary for their subsistence, and for which, they still preserved their natural appetite and desire.

"There are at this moment twelve patients laboring under this malady in the county of Gloucester, and about the same number on the other side of the line which separates that county from that of Northumberland. Amongst the cases enumerated is that of a woman who was shipwrecked at Carraquet, on her way to Quebec, and who afterwards returned to Chatham, where the malady developed itself, and was communicated to two other persons in the family with whom she resided, and also to a child who frequented the house, who all died. It appears that the disease is invariably fatal.

"The reading the different documents which accompanied the message, excited a lively sympathy for these unfortunates. Doctors Thomson and Earl both declared their opinion that the disease was not leprosy. The former recommends above everything, to change the manner of living and food of these poor people, and to impress both on their minds and bodies, by education and amusements, an action more healthy and vigorous. The chamber, by a unanimous vote, granted 500l. to the executive, to procure for these unfortunates the assistance of medicine,—to separate those who are afflicted with this horrible malady from the other inhabitants, and to ameliorate the short span of existence which remains to the afflicted."

BURIED TREASURE.—In a field at Croalchapel, near Closeburn limekilns, while Thomas Wightman was engaged, on Monday, in ploughing a piece of ground which, till last year, had not been previously turned up, having formed part of Barnmoor-wood, he came upon a large number of old silver coins of Edward I. of England, and of the Roberts and Davids of Scotland. It was considered that not fewer than 10,000 pieces were found. The discoverer of the treasure, however, was not sufficiently selfish to conceal his prize; but having given notice of the circumstance to some of his neighbors, crowds immediately assembled of men, women, and children, from all parts of the neighborhood, and numbers of the thrifty housewives were seen literally carrying away the money in lapsfuls.—Dumfries Standard.

A MARKED MAN.—In the history of escaped convicts, there never was perhaps, one more easily recognized than one who has recently escaped from New South Wales, and is supposed to be at present in London. He is described in the Hue and Cry,—"Adam and Eve, tree and serpent, B. S. T. S., bust of a man, mermaid, half-moon, ship, George and the dragon, man, birds, heart and darts, hope and anchor, T., crown and flags, on the left arm; seven dots between the finger and thumb of the left hand; man and glass on the back of the left hand; ring pricked on the middle finger of left hand; two pugilists on the centre of chest. His name is Truelove Smith, and he is about 24 years of age. He was tried at Cambridge, on the 15th of May, 1830, and sentenced to transportation for life in his 10th year."

WOOD PAVING IN THE CITY.—By a decision of the Commissioners of the Court of Sewers, on Tuesday, it was determined that the plan of wood-paving should be proceeded with.

A treaty is said to be in progress to annex the principality of Oldenburg Birkenfeld, consisting of 675 geographical square miles, and about 30,000 inhabitants, to Prussia. This junction is to be effected either by exchange or purchase.

INDIA RUBBER MATTING.—The government have ordered the new garrison church at Portsmouth to be covered with this extraordinary manufacture, to prevent the soldiers from suffering from rheumatism, &c., brought on by sitting with their feet on the cold stones.

WHITE CROWS.—We were shown to-day, at a house in the Kirkgate, a brace of crows, nearly as white as snow. They are this year's birds, and were taken out of the same nest in company with a brother or sister of the ordinary color. When anxious for food, they caw their vernacular in splendid style, run about the floor, and are as well-grown as birds can well be of the same age.—Dumfries Courier.

DUE PROPORTIONS.—"Jock," said a farmer's wife to the herd callant,—"Jock, come in to your parritch, the flies are drowning themselves in the milk." "Nae fears," replied Jock, moving very deliberately towards the scene of action, "Nae fears, they'll wade through 't." "Od, you little rascal, do you say you dinna get enough o' milk?" "Ou, ay, plenty for the parritch."

General Espartero (Duke of Victory) and his lady and niece are passing the season in comparative retirement at their villa, called Abbey-lodge, Parkroad, Regent's-park.

From the British and Foreign Review.

The Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression, as connected with the Fine Arts. By the late Sir CHARLES BELL. Third edition, enlarged. London: Murray, 1844.

THESE Essays have long been prized by those who are so fortunate as to possess even the former editions of them, as one of the most valuable contributions of English literature to the arts, and one of the most pleasing volumes of an English library. We gladly therefore announce their reëappearance in an entirely new form, rewritten, rather than revised, and with such copious additions, especially with reference to the higher branches of the subject, that they must be considered as a new work. They formed, indeed, the earliest and the latest object of their lamented author's tasteful solicitude. They were originally composed, chiefly perhaps with reference to the very striking designs of his ingenious and expressive pencil, before the serious pursuits of life began, and before his subsequent experience and reflection had given him the key to those phenomena which in art he illustrated, and explained in science. The first edition of the work appeared nearly forty years ago, in 1806, when Sir Charles Bell left Edinburgh to fix his professional residence in London. During the most active years of a life which was unceasingly devoted to the arduous duties of the medical profession, and to the promotion of the highest branches of medical science, the revisal and illustration of this volume was his habitual recreation. In 1824 a second edition was produced, with considerable additions; but from that time Sir Charles Bell resisted the demand of the public for a further issue of this book, until he should have had an opportunity of verifying his principles of criticism in art, by the study of the greatest works of the Italian masters. With this especial object, he visited the continent in 1810; a brief but extensive excursion enabled him to refresh and to corroborate those impressions and convictions which had been the delight and the study of his life; and upon his return he recomposed the whole work for a third edition. Materials were collected in abundance, and for the most part they had been already adapted to the purposes and subjects of these Essays. The text had already been prepared for the press; and the care of the editor appears to have surmounted most of the disadvantages inseparable from posthumous publication. Some of the more fugitive notes from the author's journals have been subjoined, which record with the rapid grace of an artist's pencil the vivid pleasures of an Italian journey to a man endowed with so simple a love of nature, and so cultivated a comprehension of art. These remarks bear with singular originality and acuteness on the style and the works of the great masters; and if they sometimes wear the shape of a sudden conception, rather than of mature thought, they are not the less characteristic of that ingenuity and enthusiasm which Sir Charles Bell carried as far in the practice of the fine arts as in the more profound researches of science. It deserves, indeed, to be recorded that his early studies on the subject of expression in painting, and his observation of the effects of passion and emotion on the face and frame of man, first engaged this eminent surgeon in those investigations of the nature of the nerves and of their influence on the muscles, which led to his important discoveries in the nervous system; till, as he advanced in the demonstration of those truths which he detected in the animal economy, he derived from his more extended knowledge of the physiology of man, a more complete theory of art and a more solid foundation for those principles of criticism, which no one had before applied with equal precision to the productions of the great artists. Thus he tended, by a noble sympathy between his habitual and favorite pursuits, at once to increase the sphere of knowledge and to perfect the truth of art; whilst either gift was used alike to simplify our understanding of the works of the Creator, and to raise our conceptions of natural beauty.

It has sometimes been asserted that the pursuits and practice of the medical profession tend to deaden sensibility, and to bring the loftiest and noblest powers of the human mind into too close a subjection to the conclusions of material science. The philosophy of Broussais and the heartlessness of Roux or Dupuytren, may have given a color to such imputations; but a host of names crowd upon the memory from the records of all nations, and from none more than our own, to repel the charge. The proper function of medical science in its highest sense, is not to degrade the spiritual inmate of the human frame to the level of the machinery so admirably adapted to his service, but rather to pursue through the intricacies of contrivance the purposes of life, to acknowledge the energy of being in those functions to which it imparts activity, and to trace in the mysterious sympathies and expressions of the body the higher laws of that vital power which the body obeys. To such objects as these no man ever aspired more constantly, and we will add, more devoutly, than Sir Charles Bell. His sensibility was of the most delicate kind; and his mind seemed to turn with predilection from the distressing studies of pathology to the observation of the phenomena of health. It is related of him, that in the course of his great discoveries in the nervous system, which it was absolutely necessary to carry on upon a living animal, he was arrested on the very verge of demonstration by a degree of compassion for an ass, which he could not surmount; and he declared that he had rather abandon the discovery on which his fame was to rest, than put that animal to torture. An abler hand however, in a contemporary journal, has traced the course of his professional life and his scientific discoveries; and we are most happy to perceive that the services rendered by Sir Charles Bell to the cause of science have since been acknowledged by a pension to his widow, out of that most inadequate fund which the parsimony of Parliament has placed at the disposal of the Crown, for the reward, or rather the bare recognition, of the most important benefits which can be rendered to the nation and to humanity. The appearance of the volume before us suggests a different view of the pursuits of its distinguished author, and to that we shall exclusively confine ourselves.

Sir Charles Bell presents, we believe, a solitary instance of an extraordinary proficiency in medical science, amounting even to the genius of discovery, combined with a cultivated and profound acquaintance with the principles and practice of art. If, on the one hand, his name has been placed by a high authority in medical criticism by the side of that of Harvey, and if his investigations of the nervous system are the greatest additions to animal physiology which have been made since the discovery of the circulation of the blood; on the other hand, we venture to affirm that, as a manual to the young artist, or as a canon of sound criticism to the general reader, these Essays deserve to find a place by the side of the Discourses of Sir Joshua Reynolds. It does not, indeed, necessarily follow that a knowledge of anatomy must extend the sphere, or improve the productions of the arts. The Greeks, whose studies of the human frame were confined to the observations of the external muscles, exceeded in their statues all the performances of more scientific artists. But there is a point at which the observation of nature, the truths of science and the perfection of art, seem to meet. Under various forms and accidents the same thought is expressed—the same emotion conveyed; the mind acts visibly; the sympathy of the spectator is excited; in a word the idea assumes its form. That it is so, no one has ever doubted, and all criticism and precept has recommended the study of expression to the artist, as the beginning and the end of that language which he lends to life. But expression in the fine arts, as it is commonly understood, is the mere imitation of the natural phenomena which accompany emotion: Sir Charles Bell for the first time analyzed and explained the causes of these phenomena; he has shown what the physical effects of the emotions of the mind really are, and how they act upon the organs of life; he has brought us within another circle of those concentric laws which include the creation—a circle nearer to the centre of life and truth. In a word, in exploring the most hidden cells of our physical structure, he has brought to light truths to which the proper name of philosophy preëminently belongs. In other forms, the records of these discoveries will invite the scrutiny of the man of science; but in this volume, they may be studied in their application, without a trace of the repulsive associations of medical literature, and with all the charm they derive from a graceful pencil and an original pen.

The following extract contains the fundamental principle on which these speculations rest:—

"We have learned enough to know that the impressions communicated by the external organs of sense belong really to the mind; and there can be no doubt that there is a mutual influence exercised by the mind and frame on each other. This is not asserted on the mere grounds that each affection which is deeply felt, is accompanied by a disturbance in our breast; nor on the language of mankind, which gives universal assent to this proposition; but it may be proved by circumstances of expression, in which we cannot be deceived. I shall make it manifest that what the eye, the ear, or the finger, is to the mind, as exciting those ideas which have been appointed to correspond with the qualities of the material world, the organs of the breast are to the development of our affections; and that without them we might see, hear, and smell, but we should walk the earth coldly indifferent to all emotions which may be said in an especial manner to animate us, and give interest and grace to human thoughts and actions.

"The heart has an appropriate sensibility, by which it is held united in the closest connexion and sympathy with the other vital organs; so that it participates in all the changes of the general system of the body.

"But connected with the heart, and depending on its peculiar and excessive sensibility, there is an extensive apparatus which demands our attention. This is the organ of breathing: a part known obviously as the instrument of speech; but which I shall show to be more. The organ of breathing, in its association with the heart, is the instrument of expression, and is the part of the frame, by the action of which the emotions are developed and made visible to us. Certain strong feelings of the mind produce a disturbed condition of the heart; and through that corporeal influence, directly from the heart, indirectly from the mind, the extensive apparatus constituting the organ of breathing is put in motion, and gives us the outward signs which we call expression. The man was wrong who found fault with nature for not placing a window before the heart, in order to render visible human thoughts and intentions. There is, in truth, provision made in the countenance and outward bearing for such discoveries.*

"One, ignorant of the grounds on which these opinions are founded, has said, 'Every strong emotion is directed towards the heart: the heart experiences various kinds of sensation, pleasant or unpleasant, over which it has no control; and from thence the agitated spirits are diffused over the body.'

* This observation appears to have been borrowed by Sir C. Bell from a small treatise by the French physician La Chambre, entitled "l'Art de connaître l'homme." The passage may be found quoted by Lavater, in the first volume of his "Essays on Physiognomy," p. 56. Most of the principal authorities on the science are collected in the same place. The passage from Haller's "Elementa Physiologiae," tom. v., p. 590, is well worthy of notice, for it contains a careful investigation of the effects of passion on the countenance. Lavater himself applies the term physiognomy to the science of the features in a state of repose; and he calls the science of expression pathognomy, as it concerns the features under the influence of passion. But all these writers treated of the movements or form of the features as if they were directly affected by the disposition or emotions of the mind. Sir Charles Bell was the first physiologist who showed that the affections of the mind first acted upon the heart, and that, by means of the respiratory nerves, they then produced a certain reaction, which we call expression, in the countenance.

The fact is certainly so, although the language be figurative. How are these spirits diffused, and what are their effects?

"We find that the influence of the heart upon the extended organ of respiration has sway at so early a period of our existence, that we must acknowledge that the operation or play of the instrument of expression precedes the mental emotions with which they are to be joined, accompanies them in their first dawn, strengthens them, and directs them. So that it is not, perhaps, too much to conclude that, from these organs moving in sympathy with the mind, the same uniformity is produced among men, in their internal feelings, emotions, or passions, as there exists in their ideas of external nature from the uniform operations of the organs of sense.

"Let us place examples before us, and then try whether the received doctrines of the passions will furnish us with an explanation of the phenomena, or whether we must go deeper, and seek the assistance of anatomy.

"In the expression of the passions, there is a compound influence in operation. Let us contemplate the appearance of terror. We can readily conceive why a man stands with eyes intently fixed on the object of his fears, the eyebrows elevated to the utmost, and the eye largely uncovered; or why, with hesitating and bewildered steps, his eyes are rapidly and wildly in search of something. In this, we only perceive the intent application of his mind to the object of his apprehensions—its direct influence on the outward organ. But observe him further: there is a spasm on his breast, he cannot breathe freely, the chest is elevated, the muscles of his neck and shoulders are in action, his breathing is short and rapid, there is a gasping and a convulsive motion of his lips, a tremor on his hollow cheek, a gulping and catching of his throat; and why does his heart knock at his ribs, while yet there is no force of circulation?—for his lips and cheeks are ashy pale.

"So in grief, if we attend to the same class of phenomena, we shall be able to draw an exact picture. Let us imagine to ourselves the overwhelming influence of grief on woman. The object in her mind has absorbed all the powers of the frame, the body is no more regarded, the spirits have left it, it reclines, and the limbs gravitate; they are nerveless and relaxed, and she scarcely breathes; but why comes at intervals the long-drawn sigh?—why are the neck and throat convulsed?—what causes the swelling and quivering of the lips, and the deadly paleness of the face?—or why is the hand so pale and earthy cold?—and why, at intervals, as the agony returns, does the convulsion spread over the frame like a paroxysm of suffocation?

"It must, I think, be acknowledged, when we come to arrange these phenomena, these outward signs of the passions, that they cannot proceed from the direct influence of the mind alone. However strange it may sound to unaccustomed ears, it is to the heart and lungs, and all the extended instrument of breathing, that we are to trace these effects.

"Over such motions of the body the mind has an unequal control. By a strong effort the outward tokens may be restrained, at least in regard to the general bearing of the body; but who, while suffering, can retain the natural fulness of his features, or the healthful color of his cheek, the unembarrassed respiration and clearness of the natural voice? The villain may command his voice, and mask his purpose with light and libertine words, or carry an habitual sneer of contempt of all softer passions; but his unnatural paleness, and the sinking of his features, will betray that he suffers. Clarence says to his murderers,

"How deadly dost thou speak!

Your eyes do menace me: Why look you pale?"

"But the just feelings of mankind demand respect;

men will not have the violence of grief obtruded on them. To preserve the dignity of his character, the actor must permit those uncontrollable signs of suffering alone to escape, which betray how much he feels, and how much he restrains.

"Even while asleep, these interior organs of feeling will prevail, and disclose the source of expression. Has my reader seen Mrs. Siddons in Queen Katherine during that solemn scene where the sad note was played which she named her knell? Who taught the crowd sitting at a play, an audience differing in age, habits and education, to believe those quivering motions, and that gentle smile, and those slight convulsive twittings, to be true to nature? To see every one hushed to the softest breathing of sympathy with the silent expression of the actress, exhibit all mankind held together by one universal feeling; and that feeling, excited by expression, so deeply laid in our nature, as to have influence, without being obvious to reason."

This universal meaning of expression which, as the author elsewhere observes, is to passion and the emotions of the heart what language is to thought and the operations of the mind, is co-natural with man. It precedes the first inarticulate sounds of infancy; it hovers over the closing scenes of decay and death. It speaks when speech is silent. It is the common utterance of the white man and the black, of the bondsman and the free, of savage and of civilized life. Artificial manners may mask or constraint degrade it; but they cannot obliterate it, though for its highest development it requires a life of liberty, cultivation and truth. It even creates a tie of sympathy between man and the higher animals; for in all alike the upturned eye has supplication in it, the quivering muscles are relaxed by grief, the frame is knit and the teeth set by rage. It gives to instinct the eloquence of intelligence; but it rises in man alone to the highest pitch of delicacy and variety,—to laughter and to tears,—and gradually declines as it descends the vast ladder of animated life, where it occurs as the invariable exponent of the vital powers. Such observations as these have been developed with the greatest felicity in these Essays. We select the example of the eye:—

"We have said that the eye indicates the holier emotions. In all stages of society, and in every clime, the posture and expression of reverence have been the same. The works of the great masters, who have represented the more sublime passions of man, may be adduced as evidences; by the upturned direction of the eyes, and a correspondence of feature and attitude, they address us in language intelligible to all mankind. The humble posture and raised eyes are natural, whether in the darkened chamber or under the open vault of heaven.

"On first consideration, it seems merely consistent, that when pious thoughts prevail, man should turn his eyes from things earthly to the purer objects above. But there is a reason for this, which is every way worthy of attention. When subject to particular influences, the natural position of the eyeball is to be directed upwards. In sleep, languor and depression, or when affected with strong emotions, the eyes naturally and insensibly roll upwards. The action is not a voluntary one; it is irresistible. Hence, in reverence, in devotion, in agony of mind, in all sentiments of pity, in bodily pain with fear of death, the eyes assume that position.

"Let us explain by what muscles the eyes are so revolved. There are two sets of muscles which govern the motions of the eyeball. Four straight muscles, attached at cardinal points, by combining their action, move it in every direction required for vision, and these muscles are subject to the will. When the straight muscles, from weariness or exhaustion, cease to guide the eye, two other muscles operate to roll it upwards under the eyelid: these are the oblique muscles. Accordingly, in sleep, in fainting, in approaching death, when the four voluntary muscles resign their action, and insensibility creeps over the retina, the oblique muscles prevail, and the pupil is revolved, so as to expose only the white of the eye. It is so far consolatory to reflect, that the apparent agony indicated by this direction of the eyes, in fainting or the approach of death, is the effect of encroaching insensibility—of objects impressed on the nerve of vision being no longer perceived.

"We thus see that when wrapt in devotional feelings, and when outward impressions are unheeded, the eyes are raised, by an action neither taught nor acquired. It is by this instinctive motion we are led to bow with humility—to look upwards in prayer, and to regard the visible heavens as the seat of God.

'Prayer is the upward glancing of the eye,
When none but God is near.'

"Although the savage does not always distinguish God from the heavens above him, this direction of the eye would appear to be the source of the universal belief that the Supreme Being has His throne above. The idolatrous Negro in praying for rice and yams, or that he may be active and swift, lifts up his eyes to the canopy of the sky. So, in intercourse with God, although we are taught that our globe is ever revolving; though religion inculcates that the Almighty is everywhere, yet, under the influence of this position of the eye, which is no doubt designed for a purpose,—we seek Him on high. 'I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help.'

"See, then, how this property of our bodily frame has influenced our opinions and belief; our conceptions of the Deity, our religious observances, our poetry and daily habits."

Even the beard and hair have their appropriate meaning and effect:—

"The stages of man's life are outwardly characterized. An opinion prevails that the form and lineaments of old age are a consequence of the deterioration of the material of our frame; and that the resemblance so often drawn between an aged man leaning on his staff and a ruin tottering to its fall, is a perfect one. It is not so; the material of the frame is ever the same; years affect it not; but infancy, youth, maturity, and old age have their appropriate outward characters. Why should the forehead be bald and the beard luxuriant, if not to mark the latest epoch of man's life? or what reason can be given for the hair not growing on the chin during the vascular fullness of youth, but that it would be inconsistent with the characters of that time of life to be provided with a beard?

"When these Essays were first written, there was not a beard to be seen in England, unless joined with squalor and neglect; and I had the conviction that this appendage concealed the finest features. Being in Rome, however, during the procession of the Corpus Domini, I saw that the expression was not injured by the beard; but that it added to the dignity and character of years. It was evident that the fine heads by the old masters were copies of what were then seen in nature, though now but rarely. There were beards which nearly equalled that of the 'Moses' of Michael Angelo in length, and which flowed like those in the paintings of Domenichino and Correggio.

"The beard is characteristic of nations. In the East it is honored, and to be shaved is the mark of a slave. A beard of three hands' breath is a goodly show; but to exceed that requires a life of repose: violent exercise in the field shortens the beard. The Turks have a very poor beard. The Persians have noble beards, and are proud of the distinction. The beard of Futeh Ali Shah, the late king of Persia, reached below his girdle, was full and fine, and remarkable in a nation of beards for having no division in the middle. Such a beard, during the active period of life, shows finely on horseback; being tossed over the shoulders in the wind, and indicating speed. In the natural beard, the hair has a peculiarity depending on the place from which it grows. The hair of the upper lip is more profuse, and even in the oldest man is of a darker hue than that of the under lip; so that falling on the lower part, it can still be distinguished as it mixes with the purer white. Again, the hair descending from the sides of the face attains a greater length than that which comes from the chin; and this is more especially the character of age.

"In the French regiments they set frightful fellows, with axes over their shoulders, to march in front: on their heads is a black bear-skin cap, of the form and dimensions of a drum, and they select men with beards of the same hue, which grow in a bush, the counterpart of that on their heads. But the face, as seen between the two black masses, is more ludicrous than terrible, and has an effect very different from what is intended. A common fellow's beard, like a common fellow's countenance, is coarse.

"Even in the Franciscan and Capuchin monks, the beard has not always the fine character displayed in the works of the old painters. Their models are gone with their times. Something excessive and ideal may be represented by the beard. Michael Angelo has, perhaps, followed Scripture, in the beard of his 'Moses,' which floats below the girdle; and in the fresco of Jeremiah, in the Sistine Chapel. The finest painting of the beard that I have seen is by Correggio, in the Scala of the Albergo dei Poveri, in Genoa,—a fresco of the Saviour, in the arms of the Almighty, where the beard of the Father flows beautifully. In short, the beard may become, with knowledge and taste, the most characteristic part in a figure.

"Expression in the Lips and Moustaches.—Things familiar do not always give rise to their natural association. I was led to attend more particularly to the moustaches as a feature of expression, in meeting a handsome young French soldier, coming up a long ascent in the Coté d'Or, and breathing hard, although with a good-humored, innocent expression. His sharp-pointed black moustaches rose and fell with a catamountain look that set me to think on the cause.

"Every one must have observed how the nostrils play in hard breathing. We have seen that there is a muscle which is the principal agent in this action; and it may be felt swelling during inspiration, when the finger is pressed on the upper lip, just under the nostril. It is the depressor alae nasi. The action of this muscle, under the roots of the hairs on the lip, sensibly moves them; and as all passionate excitements influence the respiratory actions, the nostrils and moustaches necessarily participate in the movement in violent passions. Thus, although the hair of the upper lip does conceal the finer modulations of the mouth, as in woman, it adds to the character of the stronger and harsher emotions.

"I continued to think of this in descending the Rhone, in company with some French officers, they were merry with wine, and I saw their moustaches, black, red, and white, animated in their songs and laughter; and although with a furouche character, these appendages rather added to than concealed expression. We see the pictorial effect in the hilarity of the Dutch boor."

It will already have been perceived from the extracts we have given, that the science of expression as it was understood by Sir Charles Bell, touched the confines of those psychological studies, which demand for their discussion the strictest accuracy of philosophical language and the careful lucidity of logical arrangement. To these abstruse inquiries, however, the peculiar qualifications and pursuits of the author did not lead him. It cannot but be regretted, for the sake of one of the most curious problems of metaphysical science, that Sir Charles Bell's attention does not appear to have been directed to Descartes' Treatise on the Passions, or to the few philosophical writers who have treated the subject, although with scientific attainments very far below his own. We are inclined to suspect that a more close examination of the question would have induced him to modify his opinion, that "the faculties owe their development as much to the operation of the instruments of expression as to the impressions of the outward senses." Such a doctrine would lead far into the blank labyrinth of secondary causes; it tends to convert into a fallacious original what is in truth a faithful copy or image of the mind. We cannot omit, however, one paragraph which conveys a philosophical reflection in very striking language:

"Pain is affirmed to be unqualified evil; yet pain is necessary to our existence; at birth it rouses the dormant faculties, and gives us consciousness. To imagine the absence of pain is not only to imagine a new state of being, but a change in the earth, and all upon it. As inhabitant of earth, and as a consequence of the great law of gravitation, the human body must have weight. It must have bones, as columns of support, and levers or the action of its muscles; and this mechanical structure implies a complication and delicacy of texture beyond our conception. For that fine texture a sensibility to pain is destined to be the protection; it is the safeguard of the body; it makes us alive to those injuries which would otherwise destroy us, and warns us to avoid them.

"When, therefore, the philosopher asks why were not our actions performed at the suggestions of pleasure, he imagines man, not constituted as he is, but as if he belonged to a world in which there was neither weight nor pressure, nor anything injurious,—where there were no dangers to apprehend, no difficulties to overcome, and no call for exertion, resolution, or courage. It would, indeed, be a curious speculation to follow out the consequences on the highest qualities of the mind, if we could suppose man thus free from all bodily suffering."

From these topics it is agreeable to turn to the vivid and graceful impressions, snatched alike from nature and from art, in the course of Sir Charles Bell's Italian journey. There is not a higher gratification in life,—and possibly it partakes of the enlarged pleasures of a better existence,—than to pass, prepared for the change, into a region where the visions of the fancy and the abstract truths of the intellect are realized in the most perfect forms of beauty. As our author crossed France, the southern enthusiasm kindled his artist's nature. He saw men in the novelty of various manners, and the picturesque forms of warmer climates. Sometimes in the common accidents of life, and more frequently in the peculiarities of foreign gesticulation or the ceremonies of the Catholic church, an observation, which might have escaped a less watchful eye, went to illustrate speculations which originated in very different scenes. A man who should devote his life to pursue and to interpret the language of expression, has at once before him an endless variety in a perpetual identity,—the variety of human nature, the identity of man. To the great artists of Italy, similar scenes and observations furnished the models they so admirably imitated: to the critic in his humbler sphere, they furnish the true key to the appreciation of those works. The following passage will be read with great interest:—

"In the same day I made careful examinations of the anatomical studies of Michael Angelo, in the collection of the Grand Duke of Florence, and I compared them with his noble works in the tombs of the Medici. I observed that he had avoided the error of artists of less genius, who, in showing their learning, deviate from living nature. I recognized the utmost accuracy of anatomy in the great artist's studies; in his pen-and-ink sketches of the knee, for example, every point of bone, muscle, tendon, and ligament was marked, and perhaps a little exaggerated. But on surveying the limbs of those fine statues, this peculiarity was not visible; there were none of the details of the anatomy, but only the effects of muscular action, as seen in life, not the muscles. As, perhaps, this is the most important lesson which can be given to the artist, I shall venture to transcribe the notes I made at the time.

"The statue of Lorenzo di Medici, Duca d'Urbino, by Michael Angelo, is in the Capella di Principi, of the church of St. Lorenzo. Under the statue are two figures, one of Twilight, and the other of Daybreak. I observed in the male figure, which is of very grand proportions, the clavicle or collar bone, the head of the humerus, the deltoid and pectoral muscles developed beyond nature, yet singularly true in the anatomy. Such a shoulder was never seen in man, yet so finely is it imagined, that no one part is unduly exaggerated; but all is magnified with so perfect a knowledge, that it is just as a whole, the bone and the muscle corresponding in their proportions. In the same chapel are the statues of Giuliano di Medici, Duke of Nemours, and brother of Leo X., with the recumbent figures of Day and Night. It is in these finely conceived figures that we have the proof of Michael Angelo's genius. They may not have the perfect purity and truth that we see in the antique; but there is a magnificence, which belongs to him alone. Here we see the effect of muscular action, without affected display of anatomical knowledge. The back is marvellously fine. The position of the scapula, for example, makes its lower angle throw up the edge of the latissimus dorsi, for the scapula is forced back upon the spine, in consequence of the position of the arm. Michael Angelo must have carefully studied the anatomy in reference to the changes produced in the living body by the action of its members: the shifting of the scapula, with the consequent rising of the mass of muscles, some in action, some merely pushed into masses, are very finely shown."*

"Having just come from observing his sketches of the anatomy of the knee-joint, I was curious in my observation of the manner in which he made his knowledge available in the joints of these fine statues; and they gave rise to the following remarks.

* "I might make similar remarks on the statue by John of Bologna,—Januarius sitting, shivering under a shower, in a fountain in the Villa Petraia, near Florence."

"If an artist, with a knowledge of the structure, should look upon the knee in a bent position, he will recognize the different bones and ligaments. But if he look upon it in an extended position of the limb, or during exertion, he will not distinguish the same parts. The contour, the swelling of the integument, and the fullness around the joint, are not produced by the forms of the bones, but by the rising up of the parts displaced by the new position of the bones. The fatty cushions which are within and external to the knee-joint, and which serve the purpose of friction-wheels in the play of the bones upon each other, no longer occupy the same relative places; they are protruded from the depth of the cavity to the surface. How well Michael Angelo knew this, these statues of Day and Night evince.

"In these statues, great feeling of art and genius of the highest order have been exhibited; anatomical science, ideal beauty, or rather grandeur, combined. It is often said that Michael Angelo studied the Belvidere Torso, and that he kept it continually in his eye. That fine specimen of ancient art may have been the authority for his grand development of the human muscles; but it did not convey to him the effect which he produced by the throwing out of those magnificent and giant limbs. Here we see the vigor of this sculptor's stroke and the firmness of his touch, as well as his sublime conception of the human figure. We can imagine that he wrought by no measure or mechanical contrivance; that he hewed out the marble as another would cast together his mass of clay in a first sketch. Many of his finest works are left unfinished; it appears that he found the block of marble in some instances too small, and left the design incomplete. For my own part I feel that the finish and smoothness of the marble is hardly consistent with the vigor of Michael Angelo's conceptions; and I should regret to think that such a genius should have wasted an hour in giving softness or polish to the surface.

"Who is there, modern or ancient, that would thus voluntarily encounter all the difficulties of the art and throw the human body into this position, or who could throw the shoulder into this violent distortion, and yet preserve the relations of the parts, of bone and muscle, with such scientific exactness? We have in this great master a proof of the manner in which genius submits to labor, in order to attain perfection. He must have undergone the severe toil of the anatomist to acquire such a power of design, which it was hardly to be supposed could be sufficiently appreciated then or now.

"Without denying the beauty or correctness of the true Grecian productions of the chisel, they ought not to be contrasted with the works of Michael Angelo to his disadvantage. He had a noble conception of the august form of man; to my thinking, superior to anything exhibited in ancient sculpture. Visconti imputes inferiority to Buonarroti; and, to confirm his views, compares the antique statues restored by him with the limbs and heads which he added. But I can conceive nothing less suited to the genius of the artist than this task of modelling and adjusting a limb in a different position from that which is entire, and yet so as to preserve the proportions and character of the whole. The manner of his working, and the urgency of his genius for an unrestrained field of exertion, unfitted him for that kind of labor, while it is a matter of necessity that a copy shall be inferior to an original.

"What the figures of Night and Morning had to do before the degenerate son of the Medici is another matter. They seem to have been placed there as mere ornaments, and in the luxury of talent, to give the form and posture of the human figure, 'per ornamento e per solo spoglio di giacitura e de' forme.'"

"When in Rome I was impatient until I stood before the statue of Moses, so much had been said of its extraordinary merit, and also so much of its defects. It is a noble figure, with all the energy of Buonarroti displayed in it. It is not the anatomy alone which constitutes its perfection; but there is the same mind displayed in the attitude, the habili-ment, the beard, and all the accompaniments, as in the vigor of the naked shoulders and arms. It is the realization of his high conception of the human figure."

Sir Charles Bell inclines to give to the great sculptors of Italy a preference over the artists even of Greece, probably from the excellence of the former in that kind of powerful expression and character which he himself was best able to appreciate. Yet his criticisms on the "Laocoon" and the "Dying Gladiator" are of great value. We can only make room for the latter:—

"The 'Dying Gladiator' is one of those masterpieces of antiquity which exhibits a knowledge of anatomy and of man's nature. He is not resting; he is not falling; but in the position of one wounded in the chest, and seeking relief in that anxious and oppressed breathing which attends a mortal wound with loss of blood. He seeks support to his arms, not to rest them or to sustain the body, but to fix them, that their action may be transferred to the chest, and thus assist the laboring respiration. The nature of his sufferings leads to this attitude. In a man expiring from loss of blood, as the vital stream flows, the heart and lungs have the same painful feeling of want, which is produced by obstruction to the breathing. As the blood is draining from him he pants and looks wild, and the chest heaves convulsively. And so the ancient artist has placed this statue in the posture of one who suffers the extremity of difficult respiration. The fixed condition of the shoulders, as he sustains his sinking body, shows that the powerful muscles, common to the ribs and arms, have their action concentrated to the struggling chest. In the same way does a man afflicted with asthma rest his hands or his elbows upon a table, stooping forward that the shoulders may become fixed points; the muscles of the arm and shoulder then act as muscles of respiration, and aid in the motion of the chest, during the heaving and anxiety which belong to the disease."

We conclude with a passage which has much of the grandeur of those exalted works by which it appears to have been suggested:—

"There is a link of connexion between all liberal professions. The painter may borrow from the physician. He will require something more than his fancy can supply, if he has to represent a priestess or a sybil. It must be the creation of a mind, learned as well as inventive. He may readily conceive a female form full of energy, her imagination at the moment exalted and pregnant, so that things long past are painted in colors as if they stood before her, and her expression becomes bold and poetical. But he will have a more true and precise idea of what is to be depicted, if he reads the history of that melancholia which undoubtedly, in early times, has given the idea of one possessed with a spirit. A young woman is seen constitutionally pale and languid; and from this inanimate state no show of affection or entreaty will draw her into conversation with her family. But how changed is her condition, when instead of the lethargy and fixed countenance, the circulation is suddenly restored, the blood mounts to her cheeks, and her eyes sparkle, while both in mind and body she manifests an unwonted energy, and her whole frame is animated. During the continuance of the paroxysm, she delivers herself with a force of thought and language, and in a tone so greatly altered, that even her parents say, 'She is not our child, she is not our daughter, a spirit has entered into her.' This is in accordance with the prevailing superstition of antiquity; for how natural to suppose, when this girl again falls into a state of torpor, and sits like a marble statue, pale, exhausted, taciturn, that the spirit has left her. The transition is easy; the priests take her under their care, watch her ravings and give them meaning, until she sinks again into a death-like stupor or indifference.

"Successful attacks of this kind impress the countenance indelibly. The painter has to represent features powerful, but consistent with the maturity and perfection of feminine beauty. He will show his genius by portraying not only a fine female form with the grandeur of the antique, but a face of peculiar character; embodying a state of disease often witnessed by the physician, with associations derived from history. If on the dead and uniform paleness of the face he bestows that deep tone of interest which belongs to features inactive, but not incapable of feeling; if he can show something of the imprint of long suffering isolated from human sympathy, throw around her the appropriate mantle, and let the fine hair fall on her shoulders, the picture will require no golden letters to announce her character, as in the old paintings of the Sybil or the Pythoness."

To such fragments as these nothing need be added. It is well that the discoveries and the reflections of such a mind should be placed within the reach of the public at large in an accessible and attractive form. The truest acknowledgment of the services rendered by such men is the respect which every one may pay to their literary remains; and we are persuaded that the success of this volume will not be inferior to that of the admirable treatise on the Hand, and not unworthy of its accomplished author's lasting fame.

TAHITI.—The report of Admiral Thouars respecting the late events at Tahiti, has given occasion for an unusual display of the sensitiveness of our Gallic neighbors on any point in the slightest manner reflecting upon the national honor. If anything were wanting to justify the recall of Admiral Thouars, ample reason would be found in the report which he has just made. In speaking of the English missionaries, he has both gone out of the way, and exhibited either his ignorance or his malignity by describing them "as men chosen from the very dregs of society in London; taken from among laborers, such as blacksmiths, carpenters, and others of that class." It is almost needless for us to make any remarks upon such a statement; but we cannot refrain from offering a comment in the shape of an extract from a description of the condition of this same island by the present Minister of Marine, to whom, unhappily for Admiral Thouars, but happily for the cause of humanity and truth, his report was made. A few years since the present Minister of Marine visited Tahiti, and this is his description of the island under the influence of these low-born missionaries:—

"The state of the island of Tahiti is now very different from what it was in the days of Cook. The missionaries of the Society of London have entirely changed the manners and customs of the inhabitants. Idolatry exists no longer; they profess generally the Christian religion; the women no longer come on board the vessels, and they are very reserved on all occasions. Their marriages are celebrated in the same manner as in Europe, and the king confines himself to one wife. The women are also admitted to the table with their husbands. The infamous society of the Atreois exists no longer; the bloody wars in which the people engaged, and human sacrifices, have entirely ceased since 1816. All the natives can read and write, and have religious books translated into their language, printed either at Tahiti, Ulitea, or Eimeo. They have built handsome churches, where they repair twice in the week, and show the greatest attention to the discourses of the preacher. It is common to see numerous individuals take notes of the most interesting passages of the sermons they hear."

We have before us a letter from a Frenchman at Tahiti, and published in a French paper, which bears a similar honorable testimony to the happy results of the labors of English missionaries; and which states that five-eighths of the natives can read and write. Would that we could say the same of France, two-thirds of the population of which country are in a state of gross ignorance, no less than 17,000,000 of them being unable either to read or write.

A letter from Stockholm, says—"The late king, who died intestate, has left an immense fortune in landed property alone, consisting chiefly in vast domains and iron mines, situated in almost all parts of the kingdom, even in Lapland, which are estimated at eighty millions of francs.

A return of the yearly income and expenditure of the board for the encouragement of trade and manufactures in Scotland, gives the total amount of the income of the board as 4,539*l.*, and the expenditure 4,217*l.*

A cast-iron pulpit has been erected in the Jewish Synagogue, Seel street, Liverpool. This is said to be the first regular pulpit erected in a Jewish place of worship in this kingdom.

A grant of 1,000*l.*, being the first grant from the fund of 10,000*l.* voted by Parliament, for the purpose of providing public walks for the use of the inhabitants of large towns, has been allotted to Oldham.

COMMUNION SERVICES FOR THE NAVY.—Ten services of communion-plate are ordered to be sent to each dock-yard, to be placed in charge of the storekeepers, who are to furnish each ship to which a chaplain is appointed with one service of plate. It is to be given in charge to the chaplain, who will be held responsible for it.

SCRIPTURE READERS.—A society has just been established entitled "An Association for Providing Scripture-readers in connection with the Church of England," under the sanction of the Bishops of London and Winchester.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS is going to Italy at the end of June for a sojourn of some months. He also intends visiting France and Switzerland. We believe we may expect another "Christmas Carol," and also a fiction of greater magnitude and more coherent purpose than he has yet accomplished.

From the British and Foreign Review.

1. Stories of the Gods and Heroes of Greece, told by Berthold Niebuhr to his Son. Translated from the German. Edited by SARAH AUSTIN. J. W. Parker, London, 1843.
2. The Home Treasury. Edited by FELIX SUMMERLY. London: J. Cundall, 1843.
3. Puss in Boots: illustrated by OTTO SPECKTER. London: J. Murray, 1843.

If as much ingenuity had been expended in tracing the origin and causes of what is called national character, as in inventing hypotheses to account for it, we might perhaps by this time have arrived at some knowledge of the great secret of moulding the moral form of man. But in all that has been said or written on this subject, it is no less remarkable than melancholy how little evinces any humane intention, how little has been productive of the smallest good, how little shows any knowledge, or even any desire to obtain knowledge, of the secret causes which so powerfully modify our common nature. Striking contrasts and brilliant sketches, unfair satire and passionate invective,—or, at the best, fanciful theories,—have been lavished on a subject deserving the most profound, cautious and candid examination. For it ought to be the common labor of the wise and good to understand and correct the variations—be they what they may—of the human mind from the pole of truth. National vanity and national antipathy ought to yield to that benign humanity which looks down upon all infirmities with equal pity, and deems no question insignificant, no labor irksome, no sacrifice painful, so that it can trace one error to its source and then destroy it forever. But we may hope that the bitter and causeless hate of nations is dying away; we at least, in England, are no longer convinced that an unusual garment is a sign of depraved morals, or a strange dish a proof of an imbecile intellect; and if it be true that some of our neighbors still cling to the dream of a monopoly of excellence, we at least must renounce all such extravagant pretensions for ourselves with still greater eagerness than we deny them to others. The time is come when patient and benevolent research may be applied to the important subject of the moral differences in the human family, with a view to mutual correction and improvement.

It has often struck us that a humble, though not unimportant, and certainly not an uninteresting branch of this inquiry would relate to the books written professedly for children. Often, while turning from the practical and positive children's books of England to the more imaginative and tender infant literature of Germany, we have asked ourselves, how far each was the cause, how far the effect or the expression, of national character. If, as we are persuaded, they are both the one and the other, there can be no doubt as to the course which reason and conscience would dictate to all those who have the business of administering mental food to the infant generation, whether parents, writers, or publishers. Whatever were the reigning prejudice, the common defect, the darling sin of the country in which they live,—whatever the epidemic prevailing in the moral or intellectual atmosphere in which the infant mind has to develop itself,—they would anxiously withhold all that could dispose it to receive the contagion,—they would provide whatever could correct the noxious influences. Unfortunately all—parents, writers and publishers—do the very reverse of this; the first, from ignorance, fashion, and prejudice; the second, from these mingled with pecuniary interest; the third, mainly from the latter motive. Accordingly, whatever be the common obliquity of the old, it is sure to be consciously or unconsciously assumed and prescribed as the norm or pattern for the young;—in England, devotion to material objects and social distinctions, flat empiricism, blind religious antipathy; in France, monstrous national conceit, adoration of military renown, and love of theatrical effects; in Germany, misty abstractions and unprofitable sensibilité. Such are among the qualities, the reproduction of which seems destined to be eternal, and which go to form what is called national character. We know few things more useful, few that would require more sound and enlarged philosophy, than a fair comparison and complete analysis of the children's books of these three nations, so nearly on a level in civilization, so different in spirit. They are the mould in which each generation fashions the succeeding one to its own image, the link which connects the mind already formed to the tone and temper of its nation with that yielding mind which has its impressions to receive and its bent to take. That which is effected in infancy, by these unregarded instruments, could never be accomplished at a later stage of life by all the weight of science or all the persuasion of eloquence. The imagination has taken its tone, the heart has conceived the wishes, the hopes, the objects, which will be the springs of action through life. The studies of the man may awaken reflection or impart knowledge, but the first books which stirred his fancy or touched his heart are those which gave an indelible color to his character.

In every country and age children's books will partake of the prevailing tone of literature; or, rather we should say, in the fresh and vigorous stage of literature there will exist no such thing as children's books; because the books fitted to delight a simple and imaginative people will also delight children. So long as the literature of England retained its pith and vigor, its simplicity of style and fulness of thought and fancy, we hear nothing of children's books. "Robinson Crusoe" and "Pilgrim's Progress," the two books which have probably been read by a greater number and with greater interest and deeper effect than any others, were certainly not written for children.

But as this creative power and simple grandeur were extinct, or nearly so, in the seventeenth century,—as the eighteenth, critical and sceptical, could create nothing that children or child-like men could care to read, it became necessary to make books professedly and specially for the entertainment of children, a sort of industrie never enough to be deplored. Berquin, Madame de Genlis, and a host of imitators in France, Germany and England, sent forth, for the enfeeblement and demoralization of the young world, a mass of affectations and simulations of virtue, pretty much alike in design, but colored in each country to suit the national taste; till at length they attained such a pitch of mawkishness, that the whole race of faultless, theatrical, preaching and whining papas and mammas, aunts and children, became intolerable and gave place to better things. The original aim of this class of books was “to check the immorality of the age.” In many writers this was no doubt sincere,—in many it was affected,—in all absurd. The cause of virtue is not to be served by falsehood, and all affectation is falsehood.

This most tiresome and unprofitable class of fictions may be considered to be extinct: it was succeeded by one of a very different character.

The beginning of the present century was marked by a tendency to what the French call material improvement, which has since spread widely and rapidly. From the time when the excitement of war ceased, the minds of Englishmen became absorbed in the pursuits which conduce to wealth or to the physical well-being of man. This movement was instantly accompanied by a corresponding change in the character of children's books. All that could tend to nourish the imagination, or to suggest reflection on the unseen, (self-reflection included,) was rejected as useless and even pernicious. Not only the mawkish modern fictions, but the delightful stories in which were embodied the fancy, the tenderness, the humor, the wisdom of ages,—which had travelled from the remotest climes, and found acceptance among people in every stage of culture, which with some slight change of costume or of incident had been adopted into every tongue,—were denounced as absurd and false. Babes and sucklings were made judges of evidence and calculators of probabilities; and the good-natured old man, who thought to amuse his infant hearer with what had delighted himself, was silenced by the preliminary inquiry, if it was all true? If even Mrs. Barbauld's matchless infants' books were tolerated, it was because they contained some “useful facts,” and not for the engaging charm of their childish prattle, or the poetical and religious feeling which pervades them. Facts were now the order of the day.

There is no doubt that the originators of this movement were earnest and sincere reformers. Insofar as their object was to substitute such information as could, by any artifice, be made palatable to children, or such lessons in domestic morality and the conduct of ordinary life as could be illustrated by stories, for the feeble and vulgar dregs of the Berquin school, it was laudable and successful. What they undertook to drive out of the field, was equally devoid of imagination and good sense, or what is called practical knowledge. The time was come when one of these was indispensable.

It belonged to the temper of the age and of the country we live in to choose the latter. One or two admirable and popular writers of children's books did much to sanction and adorn this taste; but in fact they only obeyed an impulse, which it would have required much greater strength than they possessed to resist. They were among the organs and illustrators of a great tendency. The only objects deemed worth striving after are wealth and political or social consideration. To obtain these, a man must be possessed of some art or knowledge, by which he can make himself immediately useful or acceptable to those who have wealth and consideration to bestow: hence moral science fell into complete neglect, and may be said no longer to have a place in England. The highest speculations, if unconnected with polemical theology, (and hence with political and social power,) have no audience. The cultivation of the reason, the study of the spiritual nature and destiny of man, require more time and abstraction from the world than a competitor in the actual race of life has to give. To what end, then, develop in the child a taste for the impalpable—the unreal, as it is called? We will not say that this train of reasoning passed distinctly through the minds of the makers of children's books; but, by instinct or by design, they acted under the prevailing social influences. It is sufficiently evident that the heart and the fancy of childhood cannot take in the objects which fill the minds of “practical” full-grown men; the only means of fitting them for the reception of such views, is to wean them from the bright visions and wandering speculations which are their natural element. Children, therefore, were to be seduced into practical studies by those monsters—formed of more heterogeneous parts than sphinx or chimæra—stories to teach facts or morals, or more honestly forced to swallow the chaff of catechisms and compendiums as food. Accordingly, the starry sky, inviting to wonder and worship,—the beautiful flowers and animals, objects of its tender care and sympathy, and personages of many a pretty and touching drama,—the wide and strange world, and the adventures of its hardy explorers,—the heart-stirring events and awful figures of history,—all in short that could inspire love, pity, reverence and religion, were made the subject of catechisms. We once heard a child say, that she had learned thirteen of these instruments of mental torture and compression by heart. We need not say that the poor thing had, in the operation, lost the peculiar faculties with which heaven in its wisdom has endowed the newly-awakened soul. It had (not willingly indeed) bartered its birth-right for a mess of pottage,—the sense of the great, the wonderful and the beautiful, the power of placing these in countless combinations,—for the memory of barren facts of weight, number and measure, of which it could know neither the connexion nor the evidence.

It may be said that this is an extreme case:—we willingly admit it. We are far from denying that in many books, of great excellence in their kind, the facts are well selected and amusingly told, and that they are often such as it is a matter of conventional necessity to know,—if indeed we may abuse the word knowledge for the mere passive reception of certain assertions, which we take on credit. Such admission of unconnected and undigested matter into the mind can of course never be productive of any moral growth or fruit, and should pass for exactly what it is worth,—a convenient conformity to general usage. Works of the kind in question do perhaps sometimes answer a higher end,—that namely of stimulating the curiosity of children; and if that curiosity is then allowed free course and ample food, an active, fruitful mind may be developed; but we suspect this is very rarely the case.

In the whole of this large class of books England is preëminent, and is justly regarded on the Continent as the great fountain of nursery learning. The excellence of the workmanship is as little to be denied as that of the intention. A still more valuable preëminence is the unhesitating confidence with which the most careful mothers in Germany give their children English books, compared with the cautious admission of those of other countries. We have remarked with pride, that even those who cannot read English themselves, rest on the generally recognized safe morality of our books for childhood and youth, with a security which will we trust never be deceived.

But while we gladly do homage to all that is praiseworthy in such productions, we confess that we doubt whether the well-meant endeavor to bring everything down to the level of a child's mind, or to cram it with heterogenous particulars, be favorable to the production or nurture of any large intellect or elevated character. To speak plainly, we are convinced it is not. We complain, and with justice, of the universal diffusion of slight and superficial knowledge—the neglect of philosophy, the reign of empiricism in every branch of science, the absence of all æsthetic culture, the dearth of originality. And how do we attempt to remedy these defects? We give to our children books which are exactly adapted to lay on a varnish of science and literature over the whole surface of society, and to check the natural workings of the infant mind. It is not only the imagination, but the reason of children that is stifled. We have repeatedly seen, and never without wonder at the conceit it betrayed, a book taken out of the hand of an eager, attentive child, “because he could not understand it;” as if any human being would, for his own amusement, continue to read words to which he affixed no meaning. “Oh but,” we are told, “he would understand them imperfectly.” And what then? If you desire that your child should grow tall and erect, do you confine him in a room, the ceiling of which is exactly as high as his head? If you wish his body to unfold itself and acquire bulk and vigor, do you swathe it in tight bandages? Yet such is exactly the moral practice of good and careful mothers with their children. Nay, the absurdity and cruelty is in this case even greater; for the height and bulk of the body can be ascertained, but who shall take measure of that most wondrous, variable, quick and busy spirit, the mind of a young child? Who shall say that, because it does not understand a thing to-day, it will not understand it to-morrow? An hour, a minute, is often sufficient to suggest new trains of thought and open new combinations of facts. And what a burst of the young buds of reason and imagination have we witnessed, when a child has been left to its own unaided selection among books which it could not understand! At first the little discoverer has to grope his way through occasional darkness; but the lights that break in upon him are the brighter for the contrast, and lead him on with all the ardor of hope. How far more stimulating than the monotonous twilight to which you would condemn him! “The only books from which we really learn,” says Göthe, “are those which we cannot judge. The author of a book which we are capable of judging must learn of us.”

The early history and training of the greatest men is a subject of the deepest interest, and we have always been extremely anxious to see what were the books from which they received their first impressions. As yet it has not happened to us to have read of or known a person of vigorous and original mind, who had not been allowed free access to strong meat, as soon as the appetite for it was excited.

An equally empty pretension is that of “forming the taste” of children, by pointing out the beauties of what they read. This is exactly the process by which to secure their having no taste at all. Beauty wants no showman or direct expositor; she reveals herself to the eyes prepared to behold her; till they are so, there is nothing to be done. She reveals herself, too, under a thousand different aspects; each of us must behold her as he can,—as his gifts and opportunities will allow. It is easy to make a child repeat after its mother or teacher that a passage is beautiful, but no real intuition of beauty was ever the result of any such process. The taste may be, and ought to be, cultivated, but by negative rather than positive means,—by placing within reach the best and highest models, on which the imagination and judgment can exercise themselves, and still more by carefully removing all that could corrupt, enfeeble or debase them. For this reason it is obvious that our remarks do not apply to parents who fill their houses with the common trash of circulating libraries and book-societies. An informed mind left to itself, among the noxious stimulants, or no less enervating common-place superficiality of a literature written in and for idleness, must come to all the maturity it can ever attain, without having had a glimpse of the great, the beautiful, or the true. These are to be found in the works of genius, purged and sanctified by time. An active, susceptible mind, permitted to hold early converse with antiquity, and with the noble spirits of the best days of modern Europe, will stand the fairest chance of becoming original, discriminating and elevated, and at the same time simple and reverential. And such reading is the most inviting to a healthy mind. How captivating to children is the simplicity of Herodotus! We have seen a little girl, who could but just read, leave her children's books and return to him again and again. Xenophon is scarcely less engaging. Plutarch, as full of noble and gentle sentiments as of interesting events, attaches all generous children. The want of good and agreeable translations of these and other writers of antiquity, is a great evil; they would be read by children and by the people, who would not only be won by their simplicity, but elevated by their grandeur. A free acquaintance with great models is absolutely indispensable to the formation of that discriminating sense of the beautiful which we call taste, and this acquaintance cannot begin too soon. In like manner, it is not by telling a child that this or that picture is fine, but by giving it, from the very first, the best copies or prints we can command of the greatest masters, and keeping out of its way all mediocrity, that a pure, sound and unerring taste can be formed.

We must say here, that we are not in general great friends of "illustrated" books for children—not indeed for anybody, but that is beside the purpose. The artist gives his own conceptions, often very prosaic or very false, and this anticipates or thwarts the workings of the child's imagination. No expedient could be more ingeniously contrived to make it dull, cold and barren. Let the images have what merit they may, the mere fact that they are passively received, instead of being created and combined, is enough. The best pictures to children's books therefore are the rudest, which are merely suggestive. Pictures without text have a wholly different effect; there the child's imagination furnishes the story, as in the other it furnishes the forms. Otto Speckter's charming designs for "Puss in Boots" are fitted for adults, not for little children; they contain traits of wit and humor which cannot be appreciated without a knowledge of the world; such, for instance, as the opprobrious treatment which clearly awaits all dogs under the feline ascendancy (as exemplified in the last plate)—a stroke of political satire which no child, one hopes, could enter into.

Our own language furnishes a boundless store of enticing and invigorating food. The immortal works of Bunyan and Defoe—those wells of pure, unadulterated English—have been the delight, the passion of many of the greatest and wisest men of the last generation. We have seen Shakspeare read and re-read by children of seven or eight years old with an intensity of interest and pleasure, very different in kind, no doubt, but equal in degree to any he could excite in the most learned and sagacious of his commentators. What can be more likely to touch the young heart with a love of nature, a tender concern for all that feels, a sense of the wonder and beauty of creation, and the wisdom and love of its Creator, than that most charming and English of books, White's "History of Selbourne?" where the simplicity of the man is so exquisitely set off with the graces of the gentleman and the scholar, and so sanctified by those of the Christian. Where is the child's natural history book comparable to this? Why are such books as Anson's Voyages, and all the host of similar records of skill and intrepidity, to be altered and curtailed till they have lost all truth and vigor? The relations of travellers have each a characteristic stamp, which is not among their least interesting qualities; this is necessarily effaced in abridgments.

One great evil of professed children's books is their shortness. Children are now so accustomed to the stimulus of incessant variety, to turn from book to book and from subject to subject, that the power of steady and unforced application is daily becoming more rare. At a later age, when the necessities of life require it, this has to be painfully acquired, often to the destruction of health of body and mind. This was not the case when a child had to seek out his amusement in folio histories or quarto travels, as Göthe tells us he did in Gottfried's Chronicle and the "Acessa Philologica." We remember hearing a woman of the last generation, whose intellectual qualities were only inferior to her moral, (if indeed we can separate what had the same stamp of energy, justness and greatness,) say, that the earliest book she remembered being interested in was Rapin's "History of England." Her sister, two or three years older than herself, read it to her aloud; it was their free unbidden choice. We imagine the two little girls seated on low stools, the elder with the huge folio on her knees, the younger in all the radiant beauty of a golden-haired English child, with her doll in her arms, listening with fixed attention, and day after day following the driest of historians through his ponderous work. Exquisite and true picture, which we commend to any painter who could conceive it! he will find no living models for it. In this case, not only an intellect and a character of the highest order were developed, but a style of writing and speaking, distinguished for vernacular purity, clearness and precision, was formed, by the mere access to, a library composed of the classics of the English language. Nothing else came in her way. She was taught little (which, with an over-estimate of what she did not possess, she always unduly regretted,) nor was she either commanded or forbidden to read anything. She had much to do, and little external excitement; it was presumed that reading must be her pleasure, and her father possessed no trash. We have quoted an individual case, because we happen to know it intimately; but we have had an insight, less near, but still sufficient to corroborate this, into several others, especially among women. Nearly all those we have known who rose much above the average of their sex had pretty nearly a similar mental training, or rather growth,

We shall be asked if then we pretend that no books should be written for children? Certainly not; for though we are convinced that the highest order of minds must be produced by this process of free internal development, yet there remains a vast middle class who are not capable of sufficient independent action to carry them through such a process. These are the children whose imaginations are too feeble and inert to seize on half-understood images, to work on hints, to supply what their imperfect knowledge of facts leaves broken or defective. There are others whose reasoning faculty is too sluggish to delight in combining and inferring, (the never-ceasing occupation of intelligent children,) or whose curiosity is not robust enough to endure the fatigue of much toil in search of sustenance. For such as these, it is necessary to clear away the difficulties which afford wholesome exercise to stronger minds,—to deal in simple, clear, direct narrative,—to give inferences and conclusions ready made,—to point out the why and the because. It is not that much will come of such a training; but the faculties, which would never struggle into life if left to themselves, may be nurtured, not into vigor, but at least into existence. What we protest against is the tyranny of prejudging the case, and subjecting all alike to a regimen fit only for the infirm. Let the robust choose their own diet. No test is required but the child's own inclination, provided always that wholesome food, and no other, is within his reach; if his faculties are of the kind capable of self-development, he will do the rest for himself.

Of course all this has not the smallest reference or application to the process of learning, properly so called, which is the appropriate labor and duty of childhood—the burden it ought to bear, and will bear, gallantly and well, if there is no attempt at tricks to disguise it. Toil is the portion of us all; this is your present lot of toil; in time it may, if you choose, bring you advantage and pleasure:—such is the language to hold to children, whom it is neither easy nor safe to mys-tify. School, or whatever be the substitute for it, is the appropriate sphere for the exercise of the attention and the memory—for compulsory application to uninviting things, and conformity to rules not understood; in short, for discipline—great and glorious nurse of men, whose godlike face a womanish and mistaken tenderness has sought to mask; not perceiving how easily unspoiled childhood learns to love her awful beauty and to trust in her truthful promises; while those of the flatterer, who talks to it of learning without labor, are felt to be false long before they are found to be destructive. School-books, therefore, can hardly be too special, nor school methods too rigorously calculated: all latitude or choice is misplaced here.

By children's books are generally meant books which children voluntarily read, and to those our observations are confined. We perceive with pleasure that a reaction is taking place in favor of the only class of books which we admit to be necessarily appropriate to children—we mean fairy tales, or to borrow from the German the more comprehensive word for wonderful stories and legends—Märchen. The series of little books included under the title of "The Home Treasury," which appears at the head of this article, is one indication of this change, and provides well and usefully for a demand which is rapidly increasing. The tales that have hitherto appeared are edited with good taste and judgment, and are rendered in every way attractive to the eye; their real charm is however deeper and far more valuable. The announcement of this series will explain its intention; in its general spirit we entirely agree—how far we may differ, with respect to the value of illustrations, will appear from our previous remarks.

"The character of most children's books published during the last quarter of a century is fairly typified in the name of Peter Parley, which the writers of some hundreds of them have assumed. The books themselves have been addressed, after a narrow fashion, almost entirely to the cultivation of the understanding of children. The many tales sung or said from time immemorial, which appealed to the other, and certainly not less important, elements of a little child's mind, its fancy, imagination, sympathies, affections, are almost all gone out of memory, and are scarcely to be obtained. 'Little Red Riding Hood,' and other fairy tales hallowed to children's use, are now turned into ribaldry as satires for men; as for the creation of a new fairy tale or touching ballad, such a thing is unheard of. That the influence of all this is hurtful to children, the conductor of this series firmly believes. He has practical experience of it every day in his own family, and he doubts not that there are many others who entertain the same opinions as himself. He purposes at least to give some evidence of his belief, and to produce a series of works, the character of which may be briefly described as anti-Peter-Parleyism. Some will be new works, some new combinations of old materials, and some reprints, carefully cleared of impurities, without deterioration to the points of the story. All will be illustrated, but not after the usual fashion of children's books, in which it seems to be assumed that the lowest kind of art is good enough to give first impressions to a child. In the present series, though the statement may perhaps excite a smile, the illustrations will be selected from the works of Raffaele, Titian, Hans, Holbein and other old masters. Some of the best modern artists have kindly promised their aid in creating a taste for beauty in little children."

Let no one imagine we consider it a matter of pride or congratulation, that fairy tales lose their magic power over the mature man. On the contrary, it is because it is the exclusive prerogative, the divine gift of childhood, wholly to enjoy and half to believe these delightful fictions, that we shall ever condemn the presumptuous rebellion against nature which the withholding of them supposes. We look upon children who have been deprived of this poetry of infancy as defrauded not only of an intense pleasure, never to be regained, but of one important part of their internal development, which, if checked in its natural season, is destroyed forever. The idea that children will, in the face of their daily experience, continue to believe in talking birds and flying dragons, in giants that eat little boys, or fairies that change mice into footmen, is too absurd to be answered; there is not the smallest danger of the kind. But there is a danger that children brought up to imagine they know what is true, and nothing but what is true, and to have no sympathy with the invisible, should end by feeling nothing and believing nothing but objects of sense.

We do not find in fairy-tales the smallest danger of injury to the reasoning faculty, the paramount importance of which we fully acknowledge. The inductive faculty, so far from being weak, is peculiarly strong in childhood:—why?—because their learning or experience enables them to judge of the truth or falsehood of the data on which they reason? Not a whit: they know nothing of the kind; they may be told this or that, but all the phenomena of nature are new to them, and may, for aught they know, be new to the world—that is, supernatural. The clearness and precision of their inferences arise wholly from other causes. They have no interest and no prejudice—no favor and no false shame; in their natural state they go straight on to a consequence, with a fearless justness which we have often admired—admired with a melancholy feeling that it could not last. It is the world and its vile realities, its interests and its constraints, and not fairy tales, that stunt and distort the noblest of all our faculties. The robbing us of the one next to it in dignity—imagination—will not help us.

We reluctantly notice an objection, which will probably be made, to permitting children to read books written for men; we mean on the score of what is called their impropriety. There is little use in reasoning with persons who believe that virtue is to be secured by enfeebling the mind and character, or whose powers of observation and deduction are so small as to render them inaccessible to evidence. Those who have duly reflected on the nature of a child's mind, on the subjects which are fitted to excite its interest, and to which alone it can, by its organization and the range of its experience, be awake, will need no evidence indeed to convince them that these timorous and misplaced precautions are not only useless, but pernicious;—useless, inasmuch as a young child in its natural state is utterly unconscious of, and indifferent to, the class of subjects which are supposed by its elders, (from their own lamentable self-knowledge,) to have such dangerous attraction for it; and pernicious, because the whole force of that attraction, whatever it be, is thus reserved for the moment at which it is really felt, and consequently really dangerous. It will not be pretended that, as far as boys are concerned, it is possible by external precautions to defer free converse with books longer. The period of emancipation from the restraints of childhood must leave a young man to the guidance of his own taste, reason and conscience, in the choice of his reading; and woe to him if he has no better safeguard than the entire novelty of every coarse expression or equivocal allusion!

With regard to the other sex, the same impossibility does not exist. A careful mother may prolong indefinitely the vigilant surveillance of her daughter's reading, and we are assured that in France this is actually the case. Up to the time of their marriage, when this and other restrictions drop at once, young ladies not only read no novels, (a privation upon which we sincerely congratulate them,) but no books except those supposed to be expressly fitted for their age and sex. Whether the result is, on a comparison with the greater latitude allowed in this and other respects to English girls, unfavorable to the purity of mind and conduct of the latter, we leave it to our readers to determine. Without pretending to judge a question on which far too many hasty and unfair decisions are pronounced on every side, we shall only venture to express our conviction, that in simplicity and purity of heart and life, and in devotion to domestic duties, the women of England—especially those whose understandings have been early schooled and fortified by intercourse with the great and wise—are at least not inferior to any who have ever entered on the perplexing realities of life, from the walls of a convent, or encountered its temptations with the ignorance and inexperience of a babe.

It would seem superfluous to repeat that we mean, and can mean, no such absurdity as that all books are fit for children; but we know the unfairness with which opinions are distorted, and we therefore say again, that we take for granted that the books open to their choice would be only such as have the tendency common to all the highest flights and exercises of human genius and human reason—namely, to make us sensible of our position on earth and our kindred with heaven, and to excite in us the earnest purpose and the humble hope so to think, to feel, and to live, as not to belie our high calling. With such aspirations, religion in its purest and sublimest form—the religion of him whose life was the clear and perfect manifestation of the Godlike—naturally allies itself, and is indeed inseparable from them; for when the soul of man has reached its utmost strength and elevation, it can find employment and rest only in the Divine.

From the British and Foreign Review.

1. Report of Lieut.-Colonel Sir Frederic Smith and Professor Barlow, to the Right Honorable the Earl of Ripon, President of the Board of Trade, on the Atmospheric Railway. Presented to Parliament by command of Her Majesty. London, 1842.
2. Rapport, adressé à M. le Ministre des Travaux Publics, sur le nouveau mode de locomotion, dit Système Atmosphérique. Par. M. EDMOND TEISSERENC. Paris, 1843.
3. Report on the Railroad constructed from Kingstown to Dalkey, upon the Atmospheric System, and upon the application of this System to Railroads in general. By M. MALLET. London: John Weale, 1844.
4. A Treatise on the Adaptation of Atmospheric Pressure to the purposes of Locomotion on Railways. By J. D' A. SAMUDA. London: John Weale, 1841.
5. The Atmospheric Railway. A Letter to the Right Hon. the Earl of Ripon, President of the Board of Trade, etc. By JAMES PIM, Jun., M.R.I.A. London, 1841.
6. Observations on the Report of Lieut.-Colonel Sir Frederic Smith, R.E., and Professor Barlow, on the Atmospheric Railway. By T. F. BERGIN, M.R.I.A. London, 1842.

AMONGST the inventions which within the last twenty years have rapidly followed one another, in the application of steam power to works of public utility, the most important is the railway. Scarcely fifteen years have elapsed, since the practicability of this means of locomotion was untested even by experiment; and the astonishing rapidity with which, as soon as this point was ascertained, the invention was brought into general use, is itself a criterion of its vast importance.* During the last twelve years, several thousand miles of railway have been laid down in the British empire; and above sixty millions sterling had in 1841 been embarked in railway speculation; independent of this, is the still greater projected extent of its adoption on the Continent. When we consider all the difficulties to be overcome, the immense amount of labor to be encountered, and the enormous capital that has been so easily found and so readily embarked in this gigantic enterprise, we find cause for admiration, not less at the power, skill and industry which have been brought to bear upon this herculean task, than at the apparently limitless resources of our national wealth.

The invention and the successful application of such a power might appear sufficient for one age, were it not that the characteristic of power is to multiply itself, and that every new discovery proves only the incitement to fresh efforts of inventive genius. We are not content to look back upon what has been achieved, but press continually forward to what we are capable of accomplishing: new means beget fresh wants, and these again are the stimulus to those whose task it is to provide for them.

The history of the discovery which we shall sketch in the present article, presents an interesting chapter in the annals of invention, apart from its vast importance in reference to practical results; and we deem a subject of such universal concernment to be deserving of an historic record. With this view we shall, in the first place, relate briefly the origin and progress of the invention of the Atmospheric Railway, and shall reserve our remarks on its application to the conclusion of this article.

The first idea of employing the power of air in land-carriage* occurred to a gentleman at Manchester, Mr. Taylor, (the inventor of the first power-loom,) in 1805. In conversation with two friends, Mr. Duckworth and Mr. Clegg, the subject was discussed; and, although these gentlemen were all of opinion that the idea was capable of being realized, the means of accomplishing their object was so surrounded with difficulties, that the subject was ultimately dropped without any steps being taken or experiments made. The plan proposed was in principle the same as that which is now in successful operation in Ireland,—namely the application of atmospheric pressure obtained by the exhausting power of the air-pump. Mr. Taylor's scheme only extended to the conveyance of letters and despatches; he suggested that a tube, large enough to contain a parcel, should be laid down from one town to another: at these places a stationary steam-engine should be erected, which should exhaust the tube. The parcels being placed in the tube at one end, and the latter exhausted by an engine at the other, the pressure of the air would carry the contents of the tube along with immense velocity; at each station or town the letters and parcels intended for that district would be taken out, and the rest forwarded to their destination. This ingenious suggestion was never published; we believe that it has remained to the present time wholly unknown: its interest will be seen as we proceed.

In 1810, Mr. George Medhurst, an engineer in London published a pamphlet, in which he proposed "a new method of conveying goods and letters by air;" and in 1812 he published his calculations and remarks on the practicability of the scheme. "These publications," he says, "met with that indifference and contempt which usually attend all attempts to deviate so widely from established customs." His suggestions led however to no attempt to test their correctness; but in 1827 Mr.

* The Liverpool and Manchester line was opened to the public September 15, 1825.

* Mr. Papin originally suggested employing atmospheric pressure against a vacuum, but not for these purposes.

Medhurst printed another pamphlet,* in which the author suggests four applications of the principle of atmospheric pressure to purposes of travelling, which we will describe in his own words. The passages we select contain the whole account of what he purposed to accomplish, the rest of the pamphlet being filled with calculations and details of management, which it is unnecessary to quote.

"In order to apply this principle to the purpose of conveying goods and passengers from place to place, a hollow tube or archway must be constructed the whole distance, of iron, brick, timber, or any material that will confine the air, and of such dimensions as to admit a four-wheeled carriage to run through it, capable of carrying passengers, and of strength and capacity for large and heavy goods. The tube or aerial canal must be made air-tight, and of the same form and dimensions throughout, having a pair of cast-iron or stone wheel tracks securely laid all along the bottom, for the wheels of the carriage to run upon; and the carriage must be nearly of the size and form of the canal, so as to prevent any considerable quantity of air from passing by it. If the air is forced into the mouth of the canal, behind the carriage, by an engine of sufficient power, it will be driven forward by the pressure of the air against it; and if the air is continually driven in, the pressure against the carriage, and consequently its motion, will be continually maintained."—p. 3.

"When the carriage is to go through the canal, from the engine, the air must be forced into the canal behind it; but when it is to go the contrary way, the same engine is to draw the air out of the canal, and rarefy the air before the carriage, that the atmospheric air may press into the canal behind the carriage, and drive it the contrary way."—p. 15.

The next suggestion of Mr. Medhurst was as follows:—

"It is practicable, upon the same principle, to form a tube so as to leave a continual communication between the inside and the outside of it, without suffering any part of the impelling air to escape; and by this means to impel a carriage along upon an iron road, in the open air, with equal velocity, and in a great degree possessing the same advantages as in passing within side of the tube, with the additional satisfaction to passengers of being unconfined, and in view of the country. If a round iron tube, 24 inches in diameter, be made, with an opening of 2 inches wide in the circumference, and a flanch 6 or 8 inches deep on each side of the opening, it will leave a channel between the flanches, and an opening into the tube. If such a tube is laid all along upon the ground, with the iron channel immersed in a channel of water, and a piston or box made to fit it loosely, and pass through it upon wheels or rollers, this box, driven through the tube by the air forced into it, may give motion to a carriage without, by a communication through the channel and the water. No air can pass out of the tube while the channel is immersed in water, unless the air is of such density as to force the water out of the channel, and then the air will follow it and escape; but there is an opening made for a bar of iron to pass from the running box, in the interior of the tube—to which a rod or crank may be brought from the carriage in the open air, and from that receive its motion."

A third plan was the following:—

"A plan to combine the two modes together, that the goods may be conveyed within the canal, and a communication made from the inside to the outside of it, so that a carriage may be impelled in the open air, to carry passengers, would be an improvement desirable and practicable. It must be effected without the aid of water, that it may rise and fall as the land lies; and it must give a continual impulse to the outside carriage, without suffering the impelling air to escape. For this purpose there must be some machinery which will diminish the simplicity, make it more expensive, and more liable to be disordered, unless executed in the most substantial and perfect manner; but by skill, by experience, and sound workmanship, it may be accomplished in various ways."

Mr. Medhurst suggested a fourth idea:—

"The same principle and the same form, may be advantageously applied to convey goods and passengers in the open air, upon a common road, at the same rate of a mile in a minute, or sixty miles per hour; and without any obstruction, except, at times, contrary winds, which may retard its progress, and heavy snow, which may obstruct it. If a square iron tube be formed, two feet on each side, four feet in area, with three sides, and one half of the top of cast iron, the other half of the top made of plate iron or copper, to lift up and shut down in a groove in the cast-iron semi-top plate, as before described; and if a strong and light box or frame be made to run upon wheels, within the tube, and an iron arm made to pass out, through the opening made by lifting up the plate, as before described, this arm may give motion to a carriage in the open air, and upon the common road, without any railway, if the pressure within the tube is made strong enough for the purpose."

This pamphlet is now simply an interesting historical document: the suggestions of its author led at the time to no practical result, because, although he understood the principle, the point upon which its applicability entirely depended was unattained: the difficulty was, to find the means of rendering a tube sufficiently air-tight, and at the same time of allowing a piston, which should connect the motive power within the tube with the bodies to be propelled on its outside, to pass freely along an opening in this tube.

Previously however to the appearance of Mr. Medhurst's second tract, a patent was taken out by Mr. Vallance in 1824 for a plan of locomotion by atmospheric pressure. This was merely a modification of Mr. Medhurst's first scheme of exhausting a tunnel large enough to contain a train of carriages: a stationary engine was to be erected at one end of this tunnel, which, it was supposed, would create a sufficient vacuum for the pressure of the air acting on a piston, attached to the first carriage to impel the whole train forward. It is astonishing that a plan, for many reasons so palpably impracticable, engaged the attention of any man of sense, or was made the subject for a patent. A model of this railway was exhibited at Brighton, but this was the extent of its application.

* It was entitled "A new system of inland conveyance for goods and passengers, capable of being applied and extended throughout the country, and of conveying all kinds of goods, cattle and passengers, etc."

We shall briefly notice a claim put forward by Mr. Pinkus to be the inventor of a pneumatic railway. He obtained a patent, March 1st, 1834, for a contrivance precisely similar to that which Medhurst had published seven years before, excepting that he proposed to use a rope for the continuous valve, and substituted a cylinder for a square tube, which he describes as follows:—

“A flexible cord lies in the groove at the top of the cylinder, for the purpose of closing the longitudinal aperture; this cord is to be of the same length as the pneumatic railway, and to fit tightly into the groove or channel.”

The failure of this scheme was shown by the fact, that Mr. Pinkus took out a new patent in 1836, in which he says,—

“The method of carrying it into practice consists in a method or in methods of constructing the pneumatic valve and the valvular cord, and in the manner of using the same, one of which methods hereinafter described, I design to substitute for and in lieu of the valve and cord described in the specification of my said former patent.”

It is unnecessary to describe the specification of this contrivance, which proved a second failure; but we must note that it in no way anticipated or resembled the subsequent invention of Mr. Clegg. The difficulty had still to be conquered, and no approach to this had been made, since Mr. Medhurst first suggested the idea of making a continuous communication between the inside of the tube and the carriage without, sufficiently air-tight for the object required. On the 3d of January, 1839, Mr. Clegg took out his patent, which we shall presently describe, and on the 3d of August following Mr. Pinkus took out a third patent, in which he introduces a valve in every respect similar to that of Mr. Clegg, and further proposes to seal it with a composition to be alternately fluid and solid, as described in Mr. Clegg's patent, with the only difference that the composition was to be melted by a galvanic wire instead of a heater. This patent was enrolled eight months after the publication of Mr. Clegg's specification.

All the attempts hitherto made to overcome the difficulty we have mentioned had failed, until the invention of Mr. Clegg effected this, in a manner which, from subsequent experiments, removes any doubt as to the practicability of the atmospheric railway, and opens a new prospect of advantages, the extent of which cannot at present be calculated. The principal feature of this invention consists in “a method of constructing and working valves in combination with machinery,” to be applied to “railways or other purposes, by a line of partially exhausted pipes for the purposes of obtaining a direct tractive force to move weights, either on the railway or otherwise.” The following extract from Mr. Clegg's specification explains this:—

“My improvements consist in a method of constructing and working valves in combination with machinery. These valves work on a hinge of leather, or other flexible material, which is practically air-tight, (similar to the valves commonly used in air-pumps,) the extremity or edge of these valves is caused to fall into a trough containing a composition of bees' wax and tallow, or bees' wax and oil, or any substance or composition of substances which is solid at the temperature of the atmosphere, and becomes fluid when heated a few degrees above it. After the valve is closed, and its extremity is laying in the trough, the tallow is heated sufficiently to seal up or cement together the fracture round the edge or edges of the valve, which the previous opening of the valve had caused; and then the heat being removed, the tallow again becomes hard, and forms an air-tight joint or cement between the extremity of the valve and the trough. When it is requisite to open the valve, it is done by lifting it out of the tallow, with or without the application of heat, and the before-named process of sealing it, or rendering it air-tight, is repeated every time it is closed. This combination of valves with machinery, is made in the application of these valves to railways, or other purposes, by a line of partially exhausted pipes for the purposes of obtaining a direct tractive force to move weights, either on the railway or otherwise.”

In a pamphlet printed in 1841, Mr. Pim, the treasurer of the Dublin Railway Company, addressed a letter to the Earl of Ripon, then President of the Board of Trade, on the subject of the atmospheric railway. From this work we shall extract a simple description of the invention.

“On this system of working railways, the moving power is communicated to the trains by means of a continuous pipe or main, of suitable diameter, laid in the middle of the track, and supported by the same cross-sleepers to which the chairs and rails are attached. The internal surface of the pipe being properly prepared by a coating of tallow, a travelling piston made air-tight by leather-packing, is introduced therein, and is connected to the leading carriage of each train by an iron plate or couler. In this position, if part of the air be withdrawn from that length of pipe in front of the piston by an air-pump, worked from a stationary engine or by other mechanical means, placed at a suitable distance, a certain amount of pressure on the back of the piston (being the locomotive force) will take place, proportioned to the power employed. In practice, and to work economically, it will be sufficient to produce an exhaustion of air in the pipe, equal to causing a pressure from the atmosphere, upon or behind the travelling piston, of 8 lbs. per square inch, which is only about one-half the pressure due to a vacuum. Supposing the main pipe to be of 18 inches diameter, it will receive a piston of 254 superficial inches area, on which, with the above pressure, a tractive force of 2,032 lbs. is consequently obtained; and this is capable of propelling a train weighing 45 tons (or eight to nine loaded carriages,) at the rate of 30 miles an hour, up an acclivity of 1 in 100, or 53 feet per mile. The iron couler being fixed to the travelling piston within the pipe, and also to the leading carriage of the train, connects them together, moving through an aperture formed in the top, and along the whole length of the pipe; while one set of vertical rollers attached to the piston-rod, at some little distance behind the piston, progressively lift up for the space of a few feet, and another set of rollers attached to the carriage close down again, a portion of a continuous flexible valve or flap, of peculiar construction, covering the aperture; and it is the very simple, ingenious, and efficient mode of successively opening, and closing down and hermetically sealing this valve, as each train advances and moves on, that constitutes the merit of the invention, and the foundation of the patent; the operation consisting first, in opening the valve to admit the free admission of the external air, to press on the back of the piston, and produce motion; and then in effectually closing down and sealing the valve again, so as to leave the pipe in a fit state to receive the travelling piston of the next train, and ready to be again exhausted of its air. Stationary engines of sufficient power, proportioned to the amount of traffic and speed required, would, in practice, be placed at intervals of about three miles apart, and be arranged to work the railway to that length, alternately on either side of their position, as might be required." —pp. 6-8.

The means of stopping a train and passing from one section of pipe to another, are as follows:—

"When it becomes necessary to stop or retard the carriages, in addition to the use of a common break, a valve in the travelling piston may be opened by the guard or conductor of the train, whereby, the external air being admitted in advance of the piston into the exhausted portion of the pipe, the propelling power is at once destroyed. The separating valves, in the main or pipe between each section or division of the line, being made self-acting, there will be no occasion for stopping, or even for retarding the movement of the train, in passing from one division of the pipe to another, as the air is successively exhausted by the stationary power placed at the proper intervals. The carriages may, therefore, pass continuously, at any required velocity, as if drawn by a locomotive engine; and it is necessary to keep this circumstance in mind, as by any other system of traction by stationary engines than the atmospheric, a stoppage and a change at each engine is unavoidable."—pp. 9, 10.

It is difficult to appreciate fully the simplicity and beauty of this invention, and the facility and regularity with which the tube and valves act, without examining the apparatus or plans of its construction. The exhaustion of the main tube, and the propulsion of the piston and carriages attached, are easily comprehended; but the mode of passing from one section of the pipe to another, above alluded to, requires more attention: this is explained in the description given by M. Teisserenc in his report to the French government, to which we shall presently allude:—

"Quand on sort de la sphère d'action d'une machine pneumatique, pour entrer dans la sphère d'action de l'appareil pneumatique suivant, il est donc convenable que l'air du tube dans lequel on entre soit déjà raréfié; mais alors le tube est fermé à ses deux extrémités. Nouvelle difficulté pour éviter le choc du piston arrivant avec toute sa vitesse acquise contre la soupape de clôture, pour ouvrir cette soupape avec un petit effort, de manière à donner passage au piston, sans donner passage à l'air extérieur, sans arrêter, sans ralentir seulement le convoi. Ici il a fallu encore recourir à une disposition fort ingénieuse. La soupape de MM. Clegg et Samuda s'ouvre au moment où le piston ferme déjà le tube, et par l'action même du piston; l'effort est presque nul, la rentrée de l'air n'en est pas augmentée. Quant à la sortie du piston d'un tube, elle ne donne lieu non plus, à aucun choc, bien qu'une soupape de clôture se trouve aussi à l'extrémité du tuyau, et voici comment: l'appareil pneumatique placé sur le côté du chemin communique avec le tube de propulsion par un tube aspirateur. Il a suffi de placer ce tuyau aspirateur à quelques mètres en deçà de l'extrémité fermée par la soupape de sortie pour rendre toute rencontre entre le piston et cette soupape impossible. Dès que le piston a dépassé le tube aspirateur, l'air n'étant plus enlevé devant lui se comprime de plus en plus, augmente progressivement de densité jusqu'au moment où la pression intérieure étant supérieure à la pression atmosphérique, la soupape s'ouvre d'elle-même."—M. Teisserenc's Report, p. 112.

[On leaving the sphere of action of one pneumatic engine, to enter into the sphere of action of the next pneumatic machinery, it is necessary that the air of the tube into which you enter should be already rarefied: of course the tube is closed at both its extremities. And here is a new difficulty, to avoid the shock of the piston, coming with full momentum against the valve which shuts it up, and to open that valve easily, so as to give a passage to the piston and not to the outer air, and without stopping, or even retarding the train. This required a very ingenious device. The valve of Messrs. Clegg & Samuda opens at the moment that the piston enters the tube, and by the action of the piston itself. The force used is very small, and very little air gets in. When the piston goes out of one of the tubes, there is no more shock, although a valve is at the end of the pipe. It is in this manner. The pneumatic machine placed at the road side, communicates with the propelling tube, by an air tube. And by placing the air tube a short distance before the end of the tube closed by the valve, it is made impossible for the piston to strike against the valve. When the piston has passed the air tube—the air being no longer driven away, is more and more compressed, increasing in density until the pressure from without the valve, being greater than the atmospheric pressure, the valve opens of itself.]

Soon after Mr. Clegg had taken out his patent, he exhibited a model thirty feet long at Paris; and a second model, one hundred and twenty feet long, was erected in 1840, by Messrs. Samuda at their manufactory in Southwark, which excited much attention. In the autumn of the same year a space of ground at Wormholt Scrubs, half a mile long, was placed by the directors of the Thames Junction Railway Company at the disposal of Messrs. Clegg and Samuda, (who coöperated in carrying out the invention,) for the purpose of laying down a line of railway on the atmospheric principle; and in May, 1840, this experimental line was opened. An event so interesting attracted a large concourse of persons to the spot; and by the issue of the experiment then to be tried, would probably be shown the practicability or failure of the invention: several members of the Cabinet, and a large number of persons of rank and eminent engineers were present. The success which from the first attended these experiments realized the expectations of Messrs. Clegg and Samuda; they were repeated several times each week during a twelvemonth, and continued less frequently a second year. Engineers and persons connected with railway companies came from Paris, Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin and other parts of the continent, as well as from every part of the British dominions, to examine the apparatus and witness its operation. The results of these experiments appeared in a pamphlet in 1840, which was reprinted in an extended form in 1841. We shall refer to the points of chief interest.

The inclination of the line was 1 in 120; the vacuum-pipe half a mile long and 9 inches internal diameter; the exhausting-pump was 37½ inches diameter and 22½ inches stroke, worked by a steam-engine of 16 horse power.

"For the purpose of experiment, a series of posts were fixed along the half mile every two chains, and a barometric gauge was attached at each end of the pipe, for the purpose of ascertaining the degree to which the pipe was exhausted. A vacuum equal to a column of mercury eighteen inches high was obtained in about one minute, and both gauges indicated the same extent of vacuum at the same instant."

Following out the registered results obtained during six months, it was found that a main pipe of 18 inches diameter would be sufficiently large for a traffic of 5000 tons a day, viz., 2500 each way, supposing the inclination of the line to average 1 in 100.* But among the most important of the

\* The patentees give the following details:—"A main pipe, 18 inches diameter, will contain a piston of 254 inches area: the usual pressure on this piston, produced by exhausting the pipe, should be 8 lbs. per square inch (as this is the most economical degree of vacuum to work at, and a large margin is left for obtaining higher vacuums to draw trains heavier than usual on emergencies)—a tractive force of 2032 pounds is thus obtained, which will draw a train weighing 45 tons, at 30 miles per hour, up an incline rising 1 in 100. Two and a half miles of this pipe will contain 23,324 cubic feet of air, ⅓ of which, or 12,439 cubic feet, must be pumped out to effect a vacuum equal to 8 lbs. per square inch; the air-pump for this purpose should be 6 feet 7 inches diameter, or 24.7 feet area, and its piston should move through 220 feet per minute, thus discharging at the rate of  $24.7 \times 220 = 5434$  cubic feet per minute at first, and at the rate of 2536 cubic feet per minute when the vacuum has advanced to 16 inches mercury, or 8 lbs. per square inch, the mean quantity discharged being thus 3985 feet per minute: therefore  $\frac{12439}{3985} = 3.1$  minutes, the time required to exhaust the pipe; and as the area of the pump piston is 14 times as great as that in the pipe, so the velocity of the latter will be 14 times as great as that of the former, or 220 feet per minute  $\times 14 = 3080$  feet per minute, or 35 miles per hour. But in consequence of the imperfect action of an air-pump, slight leakages, etc., this velocity will be reduced to 30 miles per hour, and the time requisite to make the vacuum increased to 4 minutes: the train will thus move over the 2½ miles section in 5 minutes, and it can be prepared for the next train in 4 minutes more,—together 9 minutes; 15 minutes is there-facts deduced from these experiments are the following, which refer to the effects of wear and tear on the apparatus:—

• • • "The workings of the system are equally perfect during all seasons,—through the height of summer and in the severest winter that we have known for many years: in no single instance during the whole time has any derangement of the machinery taken place, to prevent, or even to delay for one minute, the starting of the trains. The main pipe and valve have considerably improved by working; the composition for sealing the valve has become so much more firmly bedded in its place, that while in June last we were only able to obtain a vacuum equal to a column of mercury 19 to 20 inches high, we now obtain from 22 to 24 inches, and occasionally 25. The speed, originally from 20 to 30 miles per hour, now ranges from 30 to 45. The whole attendance the valve and main received during this period was that of a single laborer for about one hour every week: the composition now in the valve-groove has never been changed; and 56 lbs. weight only has been added to supply the waste; the cost of this composition, which consists of wax and tallow, is 1s. per lb."—p. 11.

The success of these experiments, and the general attention which was drawn to the subject, forced it upon the notice of the government. Mr. Pim, who took a warm interest in the promotion of so important an enterprise, printed a detailed description of the atmospheric railway, the great public advantages which its adoption held out, and urged the subject strongly on the attention of the Board of Trade. In consequence of this appeal, Sir Frederick Smith and Professor Barlow were appointed to examine the experimental works at Wormholt Scrubs, and to furnish a report upon the applicability of the system. This document, addressed to the Earl of Ripon, was presented to Parliament, and is dated February 15, 1842. Its contents consist chiefly of calculations on the details of working, too purely scientific for our examination here. We cannot, however, but notice the partiality of the general remarks, the evident desire to suggest every doubt and to minimize every advantage of the atmospheric system. Notwithstanding this bias, however, the admissions forced upon its authors are decisive. The chief points on which questions naturally present themselves, and to which we shall first confine our attention, are the following: we quote them from the Parliamentary Report:—

"It is no longer a question whether trains of carriages may be worked by means of atmospheric pressure; the points now to be decided are:—

"1. Whether this principle admit of its being advantageously applied to greater distances than half a mile, which is the length of the present experimental line" [at Wormholt Scrubs.]

fore ample time to allow between each train, and supposing the working day to consist of 14 hours, 56 trains can be started in each direction, or 2520 tons, making a total of 5000 tons per day. The fixed engine to perform this duty will be 110 horses' power, equivalent to 22 horses' power per mile in each direction."

"2. The probable expense of constructing a railway on this principle, and of supplying the locomotive power.

"3. The relative economy in working such a line, as compared with a railway worked by locomotive engines.

"4. The degree of safety which the atmospheric system affords, as compared with other locomotive means."

The first of these points appears to be decided, by the successful results obtained on the railway from Kingstown to Dalkey, extending nearly two miles, which has been recently completed: these are still more satisfactory than the former experiments on a line of half a mile: but we shall have occasion to refer to them hereafter. We shall here quote the observations of Mr. Samuda on this point:—

"In answer to the first objection we would say, in every case where a train has been started, the pipe has first been exhausted to eighteen inches of mercury or upwards. . . . From the barometric gauges fixed at both ends of the pipe, the vacuum is ascertained to be formed to an equal extent throughout the whole length without any appreciable difference of time. The pipe laid down is nine inches diameter and half a mile long, and a pressure equal to a column of mercury eighteen inches high is obtained in one minute by an air-pump thirty-seven and a half inches diameter, moving through one hundred and sixty-five feet per minute. Now it is obvious that, if the transverse section of the pipe be increased to any extent, and the area of the air-pump proportionately increased, the result will remain unaltered,—i. e., half a mile of pipe will be exhausted in one minute; and supposing the air-pump has to exhaust three miles, it will perform the operation in six minutes: it is also obvious that if the area of the air-pump be increased in a greater proportion than that of the pipe, the exhaustion will be performed more rapidly, or vice versa. These results are matters of absolute certainty, as convincingly clear as that the power of a steam-engine must be regulated by the area of the piston on which the steam acts. No person of scientific attainments will for one moment doubt that, if a steam-engine were made with a cylinder twice the area of the largest cylinder ever set to work, the power obtained would be in proportion to the increased area. And so with the air-pumps before alluded to; the excess of work is immediately arrived at, that an air-pump six feet three inches diameter will perform over another of three feet one and a half inch diameter, the speed of the pistons being the same in both instances. So plain and self-evident is this result, that we believe the most skeptical will admit it to be correct; and this being granted, the applicability of the system to a line of any length must follow; for whatever the length of railroad be,—whether three, or thirty, or three hundred miles,—no different effects have to be produced. The working a road thirty miles long would be the same thing as working ten roads each three miles long. Every three miles an engine and air-pump is fixed, which exhausts its own portion of pipe before the train arrives; thus, as the train advances, it receives power from each succeeding engine in turn (and without any stoppage, unless required, until it arrives at its final destination,) and the air-pumps continuing to work, after the train has passed, on the section they act upon, re-exhaust it in readiness for the next.

2. With respect to the cost of construction, we now possess satisfactory data upon which to form a calculation. In the first place, on the atmospheric system one line of rails is proved to be sufficient, and half the expense of rails is thus at once saved. But in addition to this, the weight of the rail may be reduced very considerably, in consequence of the weight of the locomotive engine (from fifteen to twenty tons) being got rid of.

M. Mallet, in his recent Report to the French Government, (to which we shall refer hereafter,) makes another valuable suggestion, which will probably lead to a further saving:—"Could we not besides (as is done on the road from Kingstown to Dalkey, where the trains run more than five hundred metres by momentum, the piston out of the pipe) have long interruptions of the main pipes, at the ends of which the trains arriving at new mains should regain their lost speed. Great economy would follow such an arrangement. Of the different combinations which might thus be formed, much yet remains to be said."—p. 44.

Another considerable saving is effected in the expense of forming the road. Those who have studied the cost of constructing railways, know well how large an item this forms. A slight inclination in the course renders a succession of embankments, cuttings, viaducts, &c., necessary, which have not only to be made in the first instance, but to be maintained and repaired. The cost of this is too obvious, to any one who has travelled on our present lines of railway, to need indication.

M. Mallet, in speaking of the width of way required on the present system, says:—

"This width, more than quadruple that of the road, is rendered necessary by—First, the foundation of the slopes required by the cuttings and embankments. Secondly, the spoil banks. Thirdly, the side roads. Fourthly, the drains or ditches; and fifthly and lastly, the sidings for stations on the line. Of these five causes the principal is the foundations for the slopes, which are often very considerable. The necessity of great radii of curvature, and especially that of small inclinations, leads inevitably to this. With the atmospheric system, the earthworks, and consequently the extent of the slopes, will be much less considerable. To estimate the cost of compensation on this system at five ninths of that on the ordinary railroads would be to overrate this part of the expense."—p. 40.

And again:—

"Passing now to works of art, I shall remark that a great number among them, as bridges, under which the railroad passes, will be considerably reduced in their dimensions. Instead of a height of 5<sup>m</sup> 50 under the crown, these bridges will need to have no more than 3<sup>m</sup> 50 at most, since it will not be necessary to leave passage for the chimneys of the locomotives. The quantity of embankment at the approaches to these bridges will be proportionally less."—p. 41.

The fact has never been questioned, that the atmospheric railway admits of much steeper gradients; and, without entering on the wide field of calculations of economy and public advantage which this simple fact opens, we shall limit our remarks to one point of view, and leave our readers to follow out the deducible reasonings. A locomotive engine weighing seventeen tons will only draw a load of about thirty tons up an inclined plane of one in one hundred at the rate of twenty miles an hour. If required to draw any additional weight, at this small speed, another engine must be attached,—that is, the cost of working must be doubled. This is alluded to by M. Teisserenc :—

"Ne pouvant diviser les trains, ni créer à volonté des trains supplémentaires, aussitôt qu'un convoi est trop chargé, il faut atteler deux locomotives, c'est-à-dire doubler les frais de transport. Les accidents sur les trains menés à très-grande vitesse ont d'autant plus de gravité que le nombre des voitures attelées est plus considérable. Non seulement ils frappent un plus grand nombre de personnes, mais la masse en mouvement étant plus grande, les chocs, en cas d'arrêt brusque, sont plus difficiles à amortir, plus désastreux dans leurs conséquences."—p. 107.

[There being no way of dividing the trains, nor of bringing forward supplementary trains at pleasure, as soon as a train is found to be too heavy, it becomes necessary to attach a second locomotive, which doubles the expense of transportation. When an accident happens to a train going very fast, the mischief is increased in proportion to the number of carriages in it. Not only by the increased number of passengers, but the mass in motion being larger, it is more difficult to deaden the shock, in case of a sudden stoppage, and the consequences are the more disastrous.]

We now turn to the atmospheric principle. The stationary engine of one hundred horsepower, now at work on the Dalkey railway, draws seventy-two tons at twenty miles an hour, along a line of one and three quarter miles upon a gradient of one in one hundred. The parliamentary reporters admit that, whilst "a great part of the power of the heavy locomotive engine is expended in overcoming its own gravity and resistance, it is equally true that, on the atmospheric principle, the whole additional force is exerted on the load itself." This advantage of the atmospheric principle consequently admits the power of working lines economically on a large range of gradients from which locomotive power is necessarily excluded; the question of limit is, in fact, one not of power but of economical calculation. "The atmospheric system," says M. Mallet, "is, so to speak, master of the acclivities, and affords opportunities of making calculations which the present system, with its stringent conditions, does not admit of." To overcome the resistance of a load up a steep hill, the power of the engine must be increased; and it is only a question, in each particular instance, whether this will be more expensive than tunnelling or embanking. The parliamentary reporters remark, that "to work steep inclines by means of larger tubes would involve the necessity of stopping the train at the foot of such planes, and of again overcoming the inertia of the load; in both instances causing a loss of time." This objection is answered by Mr. Bergin as follows :—

"Assume for a moment, which however I altogether deny, that it was necessary to vary the size of the main on every ascent, and to stop the train at the foot thereof, for the purpose of changing the piston, I should say the cases are very few indeed in which the engineer, when laying out a line of railway, could not so arrange his plans that these stopping places should be the most desirable for stations, and thus render the accommodation afforded to the public perfectly compatible with the efficient and economical working of the line. But I do not agree in supposing it necessary to change the dimensions of the main on every steep incline; * * * the less the exhaustion in the main, the greater the quantity of air extracted at each stroke of the pump in proportion to the power expended; or, in other words, the less the exhaustion (within proper limits) the diameter of the main being proportionately increased, the greater the economy of the system; and in this assertion I am fully borne out by the reporters' investigation. Further, this reduction of vacuum does not materially affect the velocity of travelling, which is essentially dependent on the discharging power of the air-pump. Such being the fact, an engineer, when looking out a line of railway, and starting with the knowledge that he is not restricted to levels or even to moderate gradients, would find few districts in which he would not be able to form the railway almost on the very surface of the country; for he would be at liberty to avail himself of almost any ascent; the only consequence of his doing so being an increased expenditure of power, precisely in the ratio of the increased resistance."

There are many other incidental advantages, of an importance scarcely yet appreciable, which are obtained by the simple command of steeper gradients. It will be seen that this opens at once a much wider and more free choice to the engineer in the course of his line, and the expenses of compensation for the value of property may frequently be affected and considerably reduced or avoided.

Independent, however, of mere economical considerations, we remark the incalculable advantage of effecting the possibility of railroads in countries where locomotive power must ever remain inapplicable. Mountains may be bored, valleys may be bridged with viaducts, or filled up with embankments, but the power to effect this does not depend merely upon skill and the command of capital; it is restricted within the limits of prudential economy, of that foresight in man which regulates expenditure by anticipated profit—which plants the grain, that it may increase and multiply. These gigantic works will only be undertaken where the existing or anticipated traffic justifies the speculation; and we may hence estimate, in some degree, the value of an invention which offers so wide an extension of these advantages of communication, whilst it holds out increased inducements of profit to enterprising capitalists to promote the public benefit.

3. We now proceed to the relative expenses of working, on which point the parliamentary reporters make the following remarks:—

“This is a question to which no general answer can be given, because it depends entirely on the daily amount of traffic. We have no doubt that a stationary engine properly proportioned, according to the rules we have indicated for a pipe three miles long, would be able to work trains on a line every quarter of an hour, or every half hour, each way, during the day, (say of twelve hours,) amounting to one hundred and forty-four miles. Now to work this distance by a locomotive engine, at the moderate estimate of 1*s.* 4*d.* per mile, would amount to 9*l.* 18*s.*, say 10*l.* per day; whereas the stationary engine power would not cost one half that sum, and consequently a saving in working expenses would arise of 1800*l.* or 2000*l.* per annum. But if only half this duty were required, the expenses of the two ways of working would be much nearer equal; and again, if only half the latter duty were to be performed, that is of trains starting only every two hours each way, the advantages would be on the side of the locomotive engine. The fact is, that in one case the expenses per diem will be nearly the same, whether working at intervals of an hour or at every quarter hour; whereas in the other the charge is nearly proportional to the work actually performed.”—Report, p. 5.

This we assume to be correct; at the same time it will be borne in mind that, by ascertained facts, the atmospheric railway is now shown to work as easily at the rate of fifty to sixty miles an hour, upon an ordinary line, as at twenty miles,—with the remarkable advantage, that increase of speed does not increase the cost. In some respects, the tendency of increase of speed is even to lessen cost; for instance, it has been shown that the leakage is diminished in proportion to speed, and a saving is thus effected. Assuming therefore, on the other hand, that the traffic on a line renders it desirable to start trains every quarter instead of every half hour, it is easily accomplished. The statement of the parliamentary reporters shows how the economy on the atmospheric system would increase in such cases. And here we must remark a singular advantage of employing stationary engines, alluded to by M. Teisserenc.* The cost of a locomotive engine, in action, is nearly the same whatever load it draws; and the cost of repairs is proportionably smaller upon an engine of large size and power; such a motive power can therefore be only profitably worked with large trains, and this very fact tends to limit considerably the number of daily trains, and consequently the advantages of railway travelling.* A necessary regard to public security leads to the same conclusion. The rapid succession of trains upon a line is a constant source of danger, and delays are therefore unavoidable. Upon an atmospheric railway, on the contrary, the greater the number of trains started in a day, (without reference to their load,) the more economical is the system of working. By the registered experiments on the Dalkey railway, a train with a load of seventy-two tons, takes five minutes and thirty-three seconds to perform the journey of a mile and three quarters. Now, as upon this system no two trains can possibly move at once on the same section of pipe, no delay is required in starting the trains, to avoid danger from their overtaking one another. As soon therefore as one train has passed off a section, the tube is ready to be exhausted again (which is effected in about three to five minutes,) and to receive the next train immediately. Upon these facts it is easy to form any calculations; motives of economy would lead to the starting of as many, instead of as few trains as possible; and whilst no accident could by any chance occur from a rapid succession of trains, it is needless to remark that the public would be incalculably benefited.

An important point will be here observed,—that a considerable saving in the cost of working is effected by the very means which the public advantage requires—namely, by despatching trains as speedily as possible. Their weight is consequently diminished, and the piston, having less to draw, may be proportionably smaller in diameter. This reduces the cost of the pipe (which is the chief item in the first outlay of construction) in nearly the same proportion as the speed is increased, and as the rapid succession of trains is effected. In short, the economy of working and the advantage to the public are here identical.

Upon this subject we will only observe, that a consideration next in importance to that of security, is that of velocity—the power obtained by so much greater speed in carriage—and the manifold results which are connected, directly and indirectly, with this advantage. To these results we can only draw the reader's attention in a general way; the value to the government of a double rate of speed (independently of a reduced rate of carriage) is incalculable, for the transmission of despatches, troops, etc., but above all for the service of the Post-Office. We may imagine, but cannot estimate, the vast effect on the revenue and business of the Post-Office, which must accrue from the following advantages:—as quick a succession of trains as might be desired,—a speed of transmission more than double the present,—a large reduction of the expenses of carriage,—besides opening the possibility of employing railways in lines where they are now wholly impracticable. Without considering the really most important gain to the nation—of the new facilities of correspondence—we limit our remark to the effects on the Post-Office revenue.

* See his Report to the French Government, p. 107.

Another source of economy in working on the atmospheric system is, that the power expended may be exactly regulated according to the power required. M. Mallet remarks on this point:—

“Whatever be the load of the trains, the Rouen Railway Company pay 1*l.* 10 per kilomètre for locomotive power; whilst on the atmospheric system the action of the engines might be diminished, and the power proportioned to the resistance by making no more rarefaction than necessary. It would be possible, for instance, to use on ordinary occasions an exhaustion of twelve or thirteen inches;—this could easily be obtained in two minutes. Thus, at each trip, three minutes' work of the engines would be saved.”—p. 52.

The Parliamentary Report states, that “in the cost of the maintenance of way, there would be a difference in favor of the atmospheric principle.”

An objection has been raised to the atmospheric system, on the ground of the expense of the stationary steam-engines and establishments, and the liability to accident. This is replied to by Mr. Samuda as follows:—

“The objection as to the complexity and outlay attendant on a number of fixed engines, may perhaps be better answered by taking a review of the number and expense of these engines and the duty they are required to perform. On a line 30 miles long, supposing the average distance between the engines to be 3 miles, there would be 10 engines and air-pumps with their engine-houses; and if the railroad were appointed for transporting 5000 tons per day over the whole distance, (considerably more than double the amount carried daily on any railroad in England,) the expense of one of these stationary engine establishments would cost complete £4200, which, multiplied by 10, will give £42,000—total cost on the whole line. But it is a fact which probably must have escaped the notice of those urging this expense as a drawback to the atmospheric system, if they were ever acquainted with it, that to perform a traffic of only 1700 tons per day, upwards of one locomotive engine per mile is necessary; and as each locomotive costs £1500, the total capital required for locomotive power on a railroad 30 miles in length would be £45,000; in first cost, therefore, there would be a saving of £3000 in favor of the stationary power; but this is far from being the most important saving. Every mill-owner in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and any person connected with mining operations, will readily admit that this outlay being once incurred for a steam-engine to drive his machinery or drain his mine, and his engine being once fixed on terra firma, its deterioration, uncertainty of action, or annual expense of maintenance, is not a source of annoyance or anxiety to him. Five per cent. per annum on the cost will more than cover all repairs necessary to be performed to it, and all oil, hemp, and tallow used in working it. It is the exception, and not the rule, if a stationary engine once fixed, meet with a derangement to render a stoppage necessary.

The annual expenses will be for repairs at 5 per cent. on £42,000,

£2100

For coal for these engines, (when transporting 2000 tons per day,) 6420 tons per year, at 20*s.* per ton,
Wages to engine-men and stokers,

6420
1500

£10,320

“The Liverpool and Manchester Railway is 30 miles long, and is the only railway that transports as much as 1700 tons per day over its whole distance; and the annual expense of its locomotive department, including coke, is about £50,000 a year. Need we make any further comment, when the annual expense of power for the atmospheric system is £10,320, and for performing the same traffic on the locomotive system upwards of £50,000 is found necessary? Great as the pecuniary advantages have been shown to be, we must not forget to correct the third objection; viz., the erroneous opinion that the system is faulty because an accident occurring at one of these stations would interrupt the traffic on the whole line. Primâ facie, this argument is correct, but we have already shown how small the chance of accident is to a stationary steam-engine . . . To make assurance doubly sure, a pair of engines and a pair of air-pumps, each of half the requisite power, may be fixed at each station: should anything cause one engine and pump to stop, the traffic would not be interrupted; the only delay would be the retardation of the train while passing over that section of pipe where only half the power was in action; and, until the cause of the stoppage were removed, the trains would be some five or six minutes more than usual performing the journey.—p. 17.

We must notice one more objection of a serious nature, connected with the employment of a single line of way,—viz., that an accident occurring at one of the stations, or anywhere along the pipe, may interrupt the traffic on the whole line. Upon this point Mr. Samuda remarks:—

“The next objection we have to meet is the interruption to the traffic from some derangement in the pipe. This comprehends, 1st, an accident to the pipe itself; and, 2d, from the composition not being effectually sealed.—An accident to the pipe can only occur from breakage, and, unless designedly perpetrated, could never happen at all. But for the sake of argument, we will suppose a pipe has been broken—no matter how; the time of removing it and replacing it with another would be considerably less than the time now necessary to clear off the fragments of a broken engine and train after a collision; and supposing a length of valve to require replacing, it could be done in less time than replacing a rail when torn up by an engine running off the line. If, instead of one, there were one hundred places along the pipe where the heater had imperfectly performed its functions, the admission of atmospheric air through the composition in these places would only reduce the column of mercury a few inches: no stoppage or interruption of the traffic could possibly occur from this cause; and by comparing the quantity of air pumped out at each stroke of the pump, with the quantity that will leak in at each imperfectly sealed spot, any such erroneous idea will be removed. Perhaps on this head an appeal to experience will be more satisfactory than any argument, however strong. In the whole of our workings, the column of mercury has never varied in height more than two inches on the same day; and as it requires eight times the number of minutes to destroy the vacuum in the pipe, when the engine is at rest, than it takes to raise it when in action, it follows that one eighth only of the power (two horses) is all that is employed to overcome leakage. Perhaps the necessity of stopping the traffic of a line in the event of an accident, until the damage is replaced or the obstacle cleared away, should be regarded upon all railways as a peculiar advantage: by this necessity all chance of 'running into' is avoided; and where stationary power is employed the difficulties of communication which a locomotive line has to contend with are overcome. By means of an electric telegraph, every engine-station along 100 miles of road may be communicated with in half a minute, and thus the traffic may be suspended and resumed at pleasure."—p. 17.

M. Mallet has examined this objection in the following passage:—

"It has been said, should any accident occur on your single way, the traffic is all stopped; whereas with two lines of a locomotive road, if anything happens to one you have the other remaining. I will not dispute the validity of this objection, neither will I destroy it; but I can greatly lessen it in stating that very many of the accidents which happen on the locomotive lines, become an impossibility upon the atmospheric. No collision, no probable running off the rails: from whence then will accidents arise? From evil-disposed persons injuring the road! In that case, the lines of locomotives are as open to their attacks as the atmospheric, and they might as well injure two lines as one. I see not any chance of stoppage, except from the breaking of an axle or a wheel, and these are mishaps which occur but seldom; besides which, when they do, the road could speedily be cleared of one carriage rendered unfit for service. I will not for a moment deny that there may be occasions of interruption of the transits; so there are also upon the locomotive lines, in spite of their two lines of way."

4. In the last place we have to consider the safety afforded by the atmospheric system, as compared with other locomotive means. This is a subject of such paramount importance, that, were any one system proved to afford increased security, purchased even by increased cost of construction and working, a proper regard to public safety of life and limb ought to preponderate over pecuniary motives. When, however, on the contrary, an invention offers the means of reducing the expenses of travelling, and at the same time of obviating the possibility of accident, such a benefit to mankind ought at least to be met with every attention and encouragement. If any one feature characterizes the principle of the atmospheric railway, it is the very element of safety which lies in its construction and in the mode of its working. On this point we shall first quote the opinion of M. Teisserenc:—

"Au point de vue de la Sécurité.—Il est facile de montrer que le système atmosphérique remédie à toutes les causes principales d'accident sur les chemins-de-fer en usage aujourd'hui. Quelles sont, en effet, ces causes: les collisions entre les trains, la sortie de la voie, la rupture des essieux des locomotives, les éboulements dans les grandes tranchées, les incendies. Avec l'appareil atmosphérique, pas de collisions, pas d'incendies, pas de rupture d'essieu; la voie modelée sur le niveau naturel du sol ne nécessite pas de grands mouvements de terre; le train tenu par un point fixé ne peut guère quitter les rails."—p. 117.

[As to safety, it is easy to show that the atmospheric system removes the causes of most of the accidents which take place on our present railroads. These are: the collision of trains; running off the rail, breaking of the axles of the locomotives; slides in deep cuts; and fire. With the atmospheric machinery there can be no collisions, no fires, no breaking of the axle. The road being laid upon the natural surface of the soil, renders great alterations of level unnecessary; and the train being held by a fixed point can hardly ever run off the rails.]

Mr. Samuda remarks upon this subject as follows:—

"Besides these advantages, this system possesses others of still more importance to the public. No collision between trains can take place; for as the power cannot be applied to more than one piston at a time in the same section of pipe, the trains must ever be the length of a section apart from each other; and if from any cause a train should be stopped in the middle of a section, the train which follows it will be obliged to stop also at the entrance of the pipe, as there will be no power to propel it until the first train is out. It is also impossible for two trains to run in opposite directions on the same line, as the power is only applied at one end of each section. A train cannot get off the rail, as the leading carriage is firmly attached to the piston, which travels in the pipe between the rails; and the luggage and carriages cannot be burnt, as no engines travel with the trains."

The opinion given by M. Mallet fully confirms this statement. "Firstly," he says, "this system, from not employing locomotives, is exempt from all the dangers to which accidents to them expose us. . . . In the second place, the risk of collision entirely vanishes, and perfect security may be enjoyed on that head, two trains never being able to run in the same pipe at once." Again he says:—

"Upon an atmospheric railroad there is no possibility of running off the rails; or at least, if one carriage gets off the rails no accident can result from it. First, the leading carriage, firmly and closely attached to a pipe, which may well be regarded as immovable, from its own weight and the strength with which it is fastened down, cannot run off the rail. Those which follow it, and are linked to each other, would have even more difficulty in getting off the rails. But on a railroad, whilst the guiding carriage maintains its way, it is of little consequence if one of those behind misses the rail; its wheels may plough up the soil beside the track, but as it cannot get away no danger is to be apprehended, and the worst that can happen will be a check in the speed. This is an important result for the construction of roads upon the atmospheric system. Curves also, which on the locomotive system may not be made less than 800<sup>m</sup> radius, may by this system be taken much sharper. I do not think that it is wise to reduce them as far as those of the road of Kingstown to Dalkey; but I look upon radii of 300<sup>m</sup> to 400<sup>m</sup> as quite possible."—p. 28.

This point is of such singular importance to the public, that we deem it desirable to compare the opinions of all those engineers who have examined and reported upon the merits of the system; as it is essential that the fullest satisfaction should be afforded. We shall further quote a passage from Mr. Bergin's pamphlet, in which he notices a remark made in the Parliamentary Report—that it is a great element of safety for the source of power to be present with the train.

"There remains but one other matter to which I think it necessary to advert; but that one is, in my judgment, of such paramount importance, that, more than any other, it characterizes the atmospheric system; I mean the safety of the passengers; not merely relatively to other modes of transit, but the highest attainable degree of absolute safety. * * * Now what the locomotive system is in point of safety to the older modes of travelling, I believe the atmospheric to be to the locomotive: in a word, as free from hazard as it is possible for any human contrivance to be. What elements of danger are there?—collision is impossible, all recognized causes of fracture of parts are almost altogether absent. * * * In speaking on this subject, the reporters say, 'On railways, it is a great element of safety that the source of power is present with the train, and may be almost instantly turned off if any necessity shows itself for the stopping.'—The presence of the engine, it is too well known, has not always proved a source of safety, as no inconsiderable portion of the very worst of railway casualties have been solely occasioned by it. The latter part of the sentence is generally true; but in this respect there is no difference between the locomotive and the atmospheric systems; or if there be, it is in my opinion in favor of the latter, inasmuch as the means of turning off the power are still more certain; the regulator or steam-cock of a locomotive engine may stick fast, so that the engine-man cannot move it; this I have more than once known to be the case. But there are abundance of contrivances in daily use, any one of which is adequate for uniting the travelling piston to the train, and in which no difficulty of separation, nor apprehension of any derangement, can possibly exist. Besides, even were this not the case, this separation or casting off is not the only means at the command of the conductor; in common with the locomotive-train he has the break, and in addition he has the power of instantly opening a communication between the exhausted main and the atmosphere; this latter of course is not so immediate in its action as shutting off the steam in a locomotive, but combined with the break, which from the much less weight and momentum of the atmospheric train, I know by frequent trials, (even at full speed, and with the full motive pressure in operation,) to be much more effective than with a locomotive engine, I believe it practicable to bring to rest a train moved by atmospheric pressure, in as short a space as is consistent with the materials of the carriage holding together."

Thus, so far from its being a cause of insecurity for the source of power to be distant from the train, the very reverse is the case. "La locomotive porte avec elle," observes M. Teisserenc, "un élément terrible de destruction, le feu, dont le catastrophe du 8 Mai, les accidents arrivés sur le chemin de Liège, sur celui de Tsarkoé-Selo à St. Petersbourg, ne font que trop ressortir le danger." Similar casualties of daily occurrence, attended with more or less mischief, might be quoted. The objection stated in the above extract has been carefully examined by M. Mallet, who says in conclusion:—"I must add, that it is not true to assert that there is no communication between the engine-man and the train. The barometer, which he has continually before his eyes, ever indicates the power he is exerting over the piston, and the increased or diminished velocity of the train is perfectly known to him by the rising and falling of the mercury. The barometer, also, is an instrument which it requires very little instruction to understand and make use of."

But independently of the removal of this source of danger, it is manifest that, in the very point in which the parliamentary reporters ascribe exclusive safety to the locomotive system, the atmospheric has the advantage of not only possessing all the means of safety attached to a locomotive engine, unattended by any of its dangers, but others in addition. We may observe that the weight of the engine being dispensed with, the momentum of a train is reduced in proportion. The necessary weight in a train to convey two hundred passengers upon the locomotive system amounts to seventy-seven tons; whilst on the atmospheric system it is only thirty-three tons. So that the application of the break on the latter system will stop a train in half the time that it would with locomotive engines. Mr. Bergin has alluded to these in the above extract, but we may notice still another.

When the power is turned off in a locomotive engine, the momentum is checked by the break, and by reversing the action of the engines. Upon the atmospheric system, the required object is, as it were, also provided for in a beautiful manner by the natural action of the principle employed. The conductor no sooner opens the communication between the exhausted main and the atmosphere, (which is accomplished by the simplest means,) than the very power which had before served to impel the train, now, when it is required to act contrariwise, tends to retard it. As soon as the air is admitted before the piston, not only is the motive power stopped, but the very momentum of the train accelerates its own stoppage, by compressing the air before the piston; so that its density acts as a check powerful in proportion to its speed, and diminishes only as the train stops.

The action of this same principle meets another question. It has been asked whether, supposing any leakage or accident should happen in the tube before the piston, in ascending a steep incline, the train would not run backwards by its own force of gravity! Supposing any such accident to happen, the same principle of nature which we have noticed would act to prevent this result: the momentum is proportioned to the inclination, and the greater the speed from this cause, the greater would be the compression of the air—in fact the power to resist it. This beautiful operation of a principle of nature, so simple and self-adjusting, will be intelligible to every one.

We have thus noticed the chief points alluded to in the Parliamentary Report. A reply to many of the statements contained in it was published in the pamphlet by Mr. Bergin, of Dublin, to which we have alluded: in this he examines at great length the result of the experiments instituted by the parliamentary reporters, and their theoretical investigations, especially with respect to the estimated expenditure of engine-power required to maintain the exhaustion in the working main—the exhausting power of the air-pump, and the proportionate amount of leakage in the long valve and the piston in the main tube. Mr. Bergin examines, in a second class of observations, the remarks founded upon these calculations, which he considers as mere matters of opinion, and to which our attention has been more immediately directed. We shall proceed to notice the comparison of the merits of the two systems given by the patentees:

“We will first notice the principal defects in railways worked by locomotive power. These are, the expenses consequent upon their formation and working, in addition to the impossibility of obtaining a speed beyond 25 miles an hour, without incurring a more than proportionate additional expense. For an engine that would draw 61·29 tons on a level at the rate of 25 miles an hour, would,—if required to travel 30 miles an hour, only be able to draw 29·66 tons,—or, for the additional 5 miles in speed, a loss of more than one half in power. These evils arise from the following causes: first, from the necessity of making the roads comparatively level, owing to the nature of the power employed. The whole power of the locomotive engine is not available to impel the train, because it has to drag itself and tender. Thus a great portion of its power is consumed even on a level; but that loss of power is greatly augmented when contending with the slightest ascent.”—Samuda, p. 21.

Here we must observe, that the velocity of travelling offers a remarkable contrast between the locomotive and atmospheric systems of railway. On an atmospheric line, increase of speed does not increase the cost of transit: the amount of discharging power expended during the transit of a given load, over a given distance, is the same, whatever the speed; and at the same time a saving in the loss from leakage is effected also in proportion to speed. On a line worked by locomotive engines it has been clearly proved that an increase in the velocity of the train from 25 to 30 miles per hour, is attended with a loss of more than half the effective power of the engine. This disadvantage is also attended by another serious one when an engine has to draw a train up an inclined plane,—a difficulty which augments in an increasing ratio to the inclination; an engine that would draw 269·87 tons at 10 miles an hour, on a level of one in 1000, can only draw 84·07 at the same speed on a gradient of one in 100. Thus, as Mr. Pim well observes, “the power is lost or absorbed in the inverse ratio in which it requires to be augmented, precisely at the moment when it is most important to obtain an increase.”

The following table, taken from Mr. Wood's “Practical Treatise on Railroads,”* shows the gross load which a locomotive engine, capable of evaporating sixty cubic feet of water per hour, will drag, exclusive of the tender, at the under-mentioned rates of speed, on different inclinations of planes. This will enable the reader to estimate the advantage which the atmospheric railway possesses:—

| Inclination of plane. | 10 miles an hour | 12½ miles an hour | 15 miles an hour | 17½ miles an hour | 20 miles an hour | 22½ miles an hour | 25 miles an hour | 27½ miles an hour | 30 miles an hour |
|-----------------------|------------------|-------------------|------------------|-------------------|------------------|-------------------|------------------|-------------------|------------------|
| Level.                | 316              | 251               | 191              | 137               | 84               | 132               | 64               | 108               | 75               |
| 1 in 1480             | 325              | 262               | 206              | 150               | 97               | 143               | 66               | 101               | 65               |
| 1 in 1224             | 397              | 315               | 242              | 176               | 106              | 166               | 82               | 125               | 82               |
| 1 in 1120             | 276              | 176               | 136              | 106               | 75               | 111               | 58               | 84                | 54               |
| 1 in 1000             | 269              | 171               | 131              | 97                | 68               | 108               | 53               | 82                | 41               |
| 1 in 900              | 264              | 169               | 128              | 95                | 67               | 106               | 50               | 80                | 40               |
| 1 in 800              | 255              | 164               | 123              | 90                | 62               | 102               | 47               | 77                | 38               |
| 1 in 700              | 246              | 157               | 117              | 85                | 58               | 98                | 43               | 73                | 34               |
| 1 in 600              | 234              | 146               | 108              | 78                | 53               | 93                | 39               | 69                | 31               |
| 1 in 500              | 220              | 137               | 102              | 73                | 49               | 87                | 35               | 64                | 28               |
| 1 in 400              | 201              | 124               | 93               | 66                | 44               | 80                | 31               | 58                | 24               |
| 1 in 300              | 175              | 109               | 81               | 56                | 38               | 70                | 26               | 50                | 20               |
| 1 in 200              | 138              | 85                | 63               | 43                | 30               | 55                | 20               | 40                | 16               |
| 1 in 100              | 84               | 51                | 38               | 26                | 18               | 33                | 12               | 24                | 8                |

Mr. Samuda states further the disadvantage of the locomotive system:—

“Secondly, by the necessity of having great weight and strength of rails and foundation consequent on the employment of locomotive engines. These engines (exclusive of tender) weigh generally from 14 to 15 tons each; and, in addition to the rigidity of road required to sustain this weight passing over it on one carriage, the motion transferred to the wheels by the engines alternately on each side, causes a continual displacement or forcing out of the rails.

“The third, and perhaps the greatest evil, is the heavy expense attendant on working a railway by the ordinary method; and this item is rendered more excessive by the necessity of having a large number of extra engines in store, to keep an adequate supply in working order. By reference to the half-yearly accounts of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, the annual expense for locomotive power and coke is found to be from £50,000 to £60,000 a year, nearly £2000 a mile per annum, on a traffic of about 1700 tons a day. This amount is exclusive of first cost and interest on the original stock.”—p. 22.

This item is one of serious importance. The Parliamentary Report states, that “in respect of locomotive outlay, a line worked by locomotive engines, in order to be well stocked, should have an engine per mile in addition; this mode of working requires water-stations, engine-houses, repairing-shops, etc.” Thus the expense of all these engines, required to be constantly out of use, is exactly so much capital sunk, and yielding no interest. Nor is this a trifling matter, when we consider that each engine costs on an average above £1500, and that the expense of repairs on each in the year amounts to above fifty per cent. All this expense and loss upon capital invested is saved by the employment of a stationary engine, upon which the wear and tear is scarcely worth consideration. We recur to Mr. Samuda's statement :—

* Third edition, page 581.

"The fourth evil is the large consumption of fuel in proportion to the power obtained; which arises, in part from the great velocity in the movement of the pistons, preventing the steam from acting on them with full force; which causes a back pressure on the pistons, reducing their force in proportion to the velocity at which they move. The power of the engine is thus constantly diminished as the velocity of the train is increased. To so great an extent is the combined action of these defects felt, that when travelling at twenty miles per hour, the effective power of the engine is reduced to half that which would be obtained from the same quantity of steam generated and fuel consumed with a stationary engine. When travelling at thirty miles per hour, it is reduced to less than one-fourth; and at a speed but little exceeding forty-five miles, the power is so far destroyed that the engine will scarcely draw more than itself and tender. An additional waste of fuel, to an immense extent, is also occasioned by the loss of power (as already shown) on inclined planes. And, lastly, the chances of accident from collision, running off the rail, bursting of boilers, etc.; *** From the foregoing remarks it will appear that the evils of the present system are entirely attributable to the use of locomotive power, and the remedy must be sought for in the employment of stationary power in its stead."—p. 24.

With these disadvantages are contrasted the anticipated results of the atmospheric system :—

"1st. The loss of power occasioned by the locomotive engines having to draw their own weight is entirely avoided; and steep hills may be ascended with no more additional power than that actually due to the acclivity, as there is no weight except the train. There is no other known power which can be applied to locomotion without carrying considerable weight and friction with it. The ill effects of locomotive engines have been already pointed out, and the same disadvantages exist in the application of ropes, which must be drawn along with the train, and become an increased incumbrance on inclined planes. The defects of ropes in other respects are too generally known to need comment.

"2d. The weight of the rails and chairs on the new system may be less by one-third than where locomotive engines are employed, as the carriages of the train will be too light to injure them. The annual charge of maintenance of way will, from the same cause, be reduced to a considerable extent.

"3d. The wear and tear of locomotive, compared with stationary engines, is as 18 to 1.

"4th. By the new system the full power of the engines is always obtained; and on an incline, the additional quantity of fuel consumed in ascending will be saved in descending, as the trains run down by their own gravity. The expense of fuel will be further decreased, as the expense of using coal is only half that of coke.

"On the new system the velocity depends entirely upon the velocity with which the air is withdrawn from the pipe; therefore, by simply increasing the air-pump, any speed may be attained; and with a fixed quantity of traffic per diem, no considerable increase in the fuel consumed or any other expense is incurred for improved speed, further than the small additional power required to overcome the increased atmospheric resistance. An actual saving in the first cost of a railway constructed for high velocities may be effected, because by performing the journey in less time, a greater number of trains may be despatched each day, and their weight diminished; therefore the piston, having less to draw, may be smaller in diameter. The cost of the pipe (which forms the largest item in the first cost of this railway) will thus be reduced in nearly the same proportion as the speed is increased."—p. 26.

M. Mallet, in his Report to the French Government, makes an important observation on the effect which a reduction of speed, in the passage of a train, exercises upon the motive force. In describing various experimental trips which he made on the Dalkey line, he says, that in one journey, when travelling at the rate of forty-five miles per hour,—

"During our course the barometer sunk to twenty-one inches; this fall was caused by our going on quicker than the air could be withdrawn. The air which remained in the pipe caused a condensation which lowered the barometer. In the following experiment, made with the same train, a contrary effect was produced. Set off at eight inches, viz., with a power of seven hundred and four pounds. We went on very slowly, and saw the mercury rise to twenty inches gradually. In this manner the air-pump produced a vacuum quicker than we proceeded, and this is a very important point of the atmospheric system. If a slackness is produced by overloading a train, or if the train stops, the propulsive force instantly augments."—p. 16.

We shall not enter into further details of the probable saving to be effected by employing atmospheric pressure on railways. The calculations of the patentees show a large estimated reduction of cost in the construction and laying down of a line on their plan, and a saving of more than one half in the annual cost of working; and we have some guarantee for the general accuracy of their calculations in a comparison of their estimates with the actual cost of construction of the line at Dalkey. This gives us ascertained data. The cost of the apparatus complete, and placed on the line, is £4300 per mile; and that of the steam-engines, vacuum-pumps, engine-houses, etc., £1000: in all, £5300. At the same time we must here mention the remark made by M. Mallet, in describing this apparatus, that the engine "is evidently more powerful than is required for working this road:" he adds,—"I am informed that it would make a vacuum in a pipe of six miles long; they rarely work this engine to more than half its power at present."

In consequence of the success of the experiments at Wormholt Scrubs, the company of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, backed by the opinion of Mr. Pim, expressed their desire to adopt the atmospheric principle in an extension of their line from Kingstown to Dalkey. In furtherance of this object they applied to government for a loan of money, on the security of their existing railway, to carry on the works. In the meanwhile, the report above alluded to had been delivered to the Board of Trade, which fully admitted the accomplishment of the principle of the atmospheric railway, in the following words: "We consider the principle of atmospheric propulsion to be established, and that the economy of working increases with the length and diameter of the tube." With a creditable public spirit, the government consented to assist in the trial of this national undertaking, and granted a loan of £25,000 to the Dublin and Kingstown Company. The company however could not obtain a line of road without applying for a bill to Parliament; and to obviate the delay and expense which this would occasion, the Board of Works granted them the use of ground in their possession, which had been used for conveying stone from the quarries near Killina to the harbor of Kingstown. The nature of this road presented every difficulty to the formation of a railway; nevertheless the patentees felt such a confidence in their project, that they were glad to have it tried and tested for the first time under circumstances of such unusual difficulty. The accomplishment of the work may on this account be regarded as doubly important. From the nature of the line of road, a series of sharp and difficult curves was unavoidable, upon which no locomotive engine could run without the utmost risk, and at a slow pace. These are now passed with the greatest ease and smoothness at sixty miles an hour, and with loads attached of seventy-two tons at the rate of twenty miles. Another point has here been decided, upon which in fact the applicability of this railroad to extended lines of traffic in a great measure rests,—namely, the power of passing with facility from one section of pipe to another. At present, only one section of pipe is in operation, and consequently this experiment cannot be fully shown: its success however is ascertained by the fact, that the train has repeatedly passed off one section, with the greatest ease and regularity. The operation of the valve which divides the sections is simple and beautiful,—we have already quoted M. Teisserenc's description of this,—and the simple fact of the successful operation of this valve is conclusive. If a train can pass without stoppage off one section, it must necessarily enter at once upon the next, and there can be no question as to the facility of repeating this along a line of any length: a hundred stations can as easily be passed as one.*

The excellent Report of M. Teisserenc, to which we have had occasion to refer, was founded on observations made upon the experimental line at Wormholt Scrubs. After detailing the difficulties and dangers attending the locomotive system, he thus compares it with the atmospheric:

"Le système atmosphérique est exempt des défauts que nous venons de reprocher aussi bien aux locomotives qu'aux machines à câbles. Son application dispenserait à la fois et du poids inutile du moteur dans le premier système, et du poids inutile de l'intermédiaire dans le second; elle permettrait l'excessive division, l'excessive multiplicité des trains, sans accroître les chances de collision, comme cela a lieu dans le système locomotif; sans augmenter la dépense, résultat de l'emploi des locomotives ou des machines à câble, elle fournirait un moteur dont la puissance, bien loin de diminuer avec le poids des objets à traîner, avec la roideur des rampes à franchir, tendrait, au contraire, à croître dans le même sens. Elle rendrait possibles toutes les vitesses avec des charges utiles considérables, sur les chemins les plus planes comme sur les railways les plus inclinés. Bien loin de nécessiter une application lente de la puissance motrice au départ, un ralentissement progressif à l'arrivée, elle permettrait d'accumuler à l'avance la force motrice, de manière à imprimer rapidement aux trains leur maximum de vitesse. Avec elle seraient impossibles et les collisions et les accidents résultant de la présence du feu. Les sorties de rail deviendraient extrêmement difficiles; les effets de la force centrifuge très peu redoutables; puisque le train, composé au plus de deux voitures, serait étroitement lié à la voie. Enfin, construits pour recevoir des voitures trois et quatre fois moins lourdes que les locomotives, les chemins n'auraient plus besoin de rails aussi pesans, de points aussi résistants; les collisions n'étant plus à craindre, pas plus que les encombrements, puisque les marchandises voyageraient aussi vite que les voyageurs, une seule voie serait suffisante. Rien de plus simple, d'ailleurs, que la théorie de l'appareil au moyen duquel on réalise ces nombreux avantages."

—p. 108.

[The atmospheric railway is free from the evils which we have found in locomotives, and in trains drawn by cables. We are able, by means of it, to avoid the weight, in the first case of the locomotive, and in the second, of the cable; it permits us to divide trains at pleasure, and to increase as much as we please their frequency, without increasing the danger of collision, as we should do with locomotives; without increasing the expense, as we should if we used locomotives, or drew the trains by cables: it furnishes a moving power which so far from diminishing with the weight of the train, or the steepness of an ascent, tends to increase under these circumstances. It renders all desirable speed practicable, upon a level road as well as upon the steepest descents. So far from its being necessary to apply power moderately at starting, and to stop very gradually, it is safe to accumulate the moving power, so as to gain the maximum of speed as early as possible. Collisions and fires are impossible. It will be very difficult to run off the rail:—the effect of the centrifugal force will not be formidable; for the train, consisting at most of two carriages, will be strongly attached to the road. Finally, adapted to carriages three or four times lighter than locomotives, the roads will not need rails so heavy, nor such strong supports. There being no danger of collisions, or of being detained by lumber, (for goods will travel as fast as passengers,) a single track will be sufficient. And above all, there is nothing more simple than the apparatus by which all these advantages are gained.]

* Great credit is due to the engineers, Messrs. Samudras, for the skill and talent displayed in constructing the Dalkey railway, and improving many of the details of working.

This Report awakened the attention of the French Government; and as soon as the works at Dalkey were in a sufficiently advanced state, they sent over another engineer, M. Mallet, Inspector General of Public Works, to furnish a second report. This recently appeared in the French journals, and we shall extract a few passages from it, containing the results of trials upon the Dalkey railway, which are of great interest:—

“Après avoir reconnu que le vide était obtenu d’une manière plus parfaite qu’on n’aurait osé l’espérer, je me suis occupé de la vitesse. Je rapporterai ici quatre expériences.

1. Avec un convoi pesant 38 tonnes (la tonne anglaise est de 2240 livres,) le baromètre marquant 25 pouces, l’on a monté en 3 minutes 15 secondes. Par prudence, l’on a employé les freins pour franchir les courbes, ce qui a produit un ralentissement. Le maximum de vitesse, dans cette expérience, a été de 40 milles (16 lieues) à l’heure.

2. Avec le même convoi, l’on est monté en 3 minutes 7 secondes: maximum de vitesse, 45 milles (plus de 18 lieues.)

3. On est parti, le baromètre marquant 8 pouces, avec le même convoi. Pendant le trajet, le baromètre est monté jusqu’à 20 pouces. Le voyage a été effectué en 4 minutes 30 secondes. Sur quelques points, l’on a marché à 30 milles (12 lieues.)

4. Enfin, le baromètre marquant 25 pouces, l’on est parti avec un convoi de 69 tonnes. Le temps du trajet a été de 5 minutes 20 secondes.

Pour descendre, l’on a employé la gravité. A cet effet, l’on a rangé le piston de côté (ce qui se fait avec la plus grande facilité,) afin qu’il ne rencontrât pas de tube. Le temps de la descente a été d’environ 5 minutes. Le mouvement était ralenti par le frottement dans les courbes. Je n’ai rien à dire de ce moyen, usité par plusieurs chemins de fer.”

[After satisfying myself that the vacuum was formed more perfectly than I could have expected, I turned my attention to the speed. I will describe four experiments:—

1. With a train weighing 38 tons, the barometer at 25 inches, we went up in 3 minutes 15 seconds. As a precaution we used the break in going round the curves, which lessened our pace. The greatest speed in this experiment was 40 miles an hour.

2. With the same train, we went up in 3 min. 7 sec.; greatest speed 45 miles.

3. We set off with the same train, the barometer at 8 inches. During the passage, it rose to 20. The trip was made in 4 min. 30 sec. At some parts we went at the rate of thirty miles.

4. Lastly—with the barometer at 25, we set out with a train of 69 tons. The time was 5 min. 20 sec.

For descending, we employed gravity. To do this, the piston was fastened on one side (which is easily done) so that it might not touch the tube. The descents took about 5 min. The motion was retarded by the friction of the curves. I have nothing to remark on this practice, which is common on many roads.]

The following results of experiments subsequently made on the Kingstown and Dalkey line are extracted from the “Railway Times” of December 2, 1843. Their importance justifies our inserting them at length.

“Without the slightest hesitation, we have to state that the result of very minute investigation on the spot has fully confirmed the opinions to which we had previously come, from the scientific discussion of the principle, and from the operations of the very imperfect apparatus at Wormholt Scrubs.

“The line between Kingstown and Dalkey is 13 miles in length, in which there is a rise of 71½ feet, making an average ascent of 1 in 115, towards Dalkey. The main pipe between the rails, which is 15 inches internal diameter, commences at the Kingstown station, and is continued to within 500 yards of Dalkey. The communication between the main pipe and the steam-engine (at Dalkey) is formed through the medium of a close pipe, laid outside the trackway, and attached at the lower end into the main and at the upper end into the vacuum pump. A branch valve is placed at the junction between the close and open main, which allows the vacuum pump to act on the main, or be shut off from it, at pleasure. The dimensions of the engine are,—cylinder, 34½ inches diameter; stroke, 5 feet 6 inches; speed, 242 feet per minute. It works expansively, the steam being admitted in the cylinder at 40 lbs. above the atmosphere, and cut off at one-fourth stroke when the engine is at its full load; it is then expanded for the remaining portion of the stroke, and condensed in the usual way. The degree of cut-off is regulated by a cam worked by the governor, and is therefore proportionately shorter, as the duty of the engine is less; but in no case is the steam admitted for a greater distance than one-fourth of the stroke. The vacuum-pump is double acting. The dimensions are,—diameter, 67 inches: stroke, 5 feet 6 inches; speed, 242 feet per minute. With the above apparatus we saw a vacuum formed in the entire length from Kingstown to Dalkey—

|  |           |
|--|-----------|
| Equal to a col. of mer. 10 in. (or ¼ of an atmos.) | in 0’ 36” |
| “ “ 15 (or ½ “)                                    | in 1’ 51” |
| “ “ 20 (or ⅔ “)                                    | in 3’ 30” |

For the purposes of observation, distance posts were placed along the line at intervals of two chains, every tenth post (or one-fourth mile) having a distinguishing mark: and the following were the results of some journeys made for us during our visit:—

“Journey A.—Gross load 62 tons; maximum speed during trip for 2 chains was = 24 miles per hour; total time of journey, 4 min. 48 sec.

“Journey B.—Gross load 72 tons; maximum speed during trip for 2 chains was = 20 miles per hour ; total time of journey, 5 min. 33 sec.

"Journey C.—Gross load 75 tons ; maximum speed during trip for 2 chains = 21·17 miles per hour ; total time of journey, 6 min. 2 sec.

"Journey D.—Gross load 30 tons ; maximum speed during trip for 2 chains was = 51·5 miles per hour ; time at passing  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile-post 2 min. 57 sec. ; total time of journey, 3 min. 24 sec."

In the same journal of December 16th appeared the following additional details :—

"In following up the investigation, it should be observed that local circumstances, amount of traffic, and steepness of gradients, will to a certain extent influence this consideration ; but with the view of rendering it as generally applicable as possible, we have made the calculations on a similar scale to that in use on the Kingstown and Dalkey line, and have deduced such of the working expenses therefrom as the time it has been in operation will allow. We apprehend that this scale will never have to be exceeded on lines of the largest traffic. Where it is decreased the cost will be proportionately lessened, so far as regards construction. The decreased scale will only influence the weight of trains. The speed can be preserved on the smaller as on the larger scale, by maintaining the same relative proportions between the vacuum-pump and the main.

"The scale employed on the Dalkey line is—Vacuum tube, 15 inches diameter ; vacuum pump, 67 inches diameter ; engine, 100 horse-power. It will be well to notice the duty such an apparatus will perform on a level and up various rates of inclination. This proportion between the pump and the tube enables trains to be propelled 50 to 60 miles per hour, and will draw a train of 200 tons on a level.

A train of 80 tons up an incline rising 1 in 160.

|   |   |    |   |   |   |           |
|---|---|----|---|---|---|-----------|
| " | " | 72 | " | " | " | 1 in 140. |
| " | " | 65 | " | " | " | 1 in 120. |
| " | " | 58 | " | " | " | 1 in 100. |
| " | " | 53 | " | " | " | 1 in 90.  |
| " | " | 48 | " | " | " | 1 in 80.  |
| " | " | 44 | " | " | " | 1 in 70.  |
| " | " | 39 | " | " | " | 1 in 60.  |
| " | " | 33 | " | " | " | 1 in 50.  |

"The cost of the atmospheric apparatus complete, and placed on the line, is £4300 per mile ; and of the steam-engines, vacuum-pumps, engine-houses, etc., £1000 ; total, £5300. It would scarcely be useful to notice the other items that are necessary to complete a railway on this system, as the earthwork will vary materially according to the nature of the country through which it passes. In a difficult country the saving from adopting such gradients as would be suitable for the atmospheric instead of the locomotive, would considerably more than equal the entire £5300, while on a level or easy country a balance of expense would remain against the atmospheric system up to this point. In all cases the smaller quantity of land that would be required, the diminished size of the bridges, the lighter rails, the absence of all coke and water-stations, workshops, and stock of locomotives, will have to go to the credit of the atmospheric system against the cost of vacuum tube and engines."

"Among some interesting experiments made at Dalkey are the following. The first series shows the uniformity of the sealing process. During the same day, and after the running of each train, observations were taken of the time required to re-form the vacuum to the height of 15 inches, which was as follows :—

After the 4th trip the barometer rose to

|   |      |   |   |                    |
|---|------|---|---|--------------------|
|   |      |   |   | 15 inch. in 1' 45" |
| " | 5th  | " | " | 15 " in 1 40       |
| " | 6th  | " | " | 15 " in 1 42       |
| " | 7th  | " | " | 15 " in 1 40       |
| " | 8th  | " | " | 15 " in 1 45       |
| " | 9th  | " | " | 15 " in 1 40       |
| " | 18th | " | " | 15 " in 1 42       |
| " | 19th | " | " | 15 " in 1 45       |
| " | 21st | " | " | 15 " in 1 45       |
| " | 22nd | " | " | 15 " in 1 43       |

"The second series shows the amount of leakage due to the longitudinal valve, as separated from that due to the air-pump, travelling piston and station valves. In the following experiments the vacuum was in every instance raised to 22 inches ; the engine was then stopped, and the tube was allowed to fill with air by the leakage (from all sources) into it.

|  |                 |
|--|-----------------|
| With the train { the gauge fell 18 inches } Min. |                 |
| at Kingstown { i. e. from 22 in. to 4 in. }      | in 11 33-100th. |
| Advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ mile " " "                | in 10 88-100th. |
| Advanced $\frac{1}{4}$ mile " " "                | in 10 76-100th. |

the leakage being at the rate of one inch in 36·83 sec. in the first instance, one inch in 36 sec. in the second instance, one inch in 35·91 sec. in the third instance,—showing the additional leakage from the long valve to be only so much as was represented by the gauge falling per inch  $\frac{83}{100}$  of a second quicker in the first instance and  $\frac{91}{100}$  of a second in the last, and the additional power to compensate this being all the increased haulage power required per half mile. This is an experiment of no ordinary interest, inasmuch as it confirms the notion that the advocates of the system have long urged for it, namely, that every extension of the length is attended with increased advantages, and that while the Atmospheric Railway is equally applicable to short as to long lines, it is by no means applicable only to the former, which its successful application on a short line has induced many to imagine."

We had cited the above experiments, before the appearance of M. Mallet's report ; they however give substantially the same results, but in a more condensed form. Subsequently to the appearance of M. Mallet's first report in the French journals, a second and more detailed one, addressed by him to the French Government, has been published in Paris, and an English translation in London. That gentleman states, that "the fame of the success of this second experiment, made on a scale far greater than that at Wormholt Scrubs, spread itself into France. Immediately M. Teste, the minister, and M. Le Grand, Under Secretary of State of the Public Works, whose attention had been roused by the previous report of M. Teisserenc, desirous to know all the improvements and advantages of a system which might exercise so great an influence on the future prospects of railroads in France, gave me an order to embark for Ireland."

This report is divided into four chapters : the first contains a description of the line, from Kingstown to Dalkey, of the apparatus, and details of experiments; the second chapter treats of the application of the atmospheric system to railroads in general; the third gives the comparative expense of laying down a locomotive railway and one on the atmospheric plan; and the fourth gives the comparative cost of working on the two systems. We have had occasion to cite many remarks contained in this report, regarding the general merits of the atmospheric railway; and it is unnecessary to review it more critically. The chief part is occupied with a minute and careful detail of the experiments which M. Mallet instituted on the Dalkey railway, and upon which his opinions are founded: these merit a close examination, and will be peculiarly valuable to scientific men interested in the subject of railways. M. Mallet examines every advantage and disadvantage of the atmospheric system,—its applicability to existing and new lines, and under every circumstance attending construction. The English translation of this report is of much less value than it might have been, had the French measures and values been reduced to the English equivalents; but a point of still greater importance (and which we are surprised not to see noticed by the translator) is, that all the calculations of M. Mallet are founded upon the French prices of iron and of labor—naturally so in a report addressed to the French government; but unless this fact is borne in mind, throughout the calculations, and the difference noted between the English and French prices of iron, the reader is liable to be seriously misled. Premising this remark, we observe that M. Mallet calculates that, in the cost of construction, the atmospheric system would effect a saving of one-seventh, and in the cost of working a saving of two-fifths. The same calculation, made upon the value of iron in England, would show of course a very much greater reduction. M. Mallet examines carefully and impartially every objection which has been, or is likely to be, raised to the atmospheric system; and in concluding this part of his Report he says:—

“I do not think I have omitted any of the objections which have been pointed out to me. Several are worthy of being taken into consideration. But do any of them present insurmountable difficulties? Are they of a nature to induce us to abandon the invention? I do not think so, and therefore I advocate a trial. If the system had already arrived at perfection no trial would be necessary; we should have but to lay down the works, certain of success; but in spite of the enormous step shown to have been gained in Ireland, much yet remains to be done. Let its judges remember what the locomotives were at their commencement, and the enormous amount of improvement they have experienced during the last twenty years.”—p. 32.

There are many other points, connected with the construction and working, examined by M. Mallet, to which we should have referred, did our space allow,—with respect to the crossings, for instance, which we shall give in M. Mallet's words, with a suggestion he offers:—

“They are done precisely as on the locomotive roads; for this they divide the pipe; but not to destroy the continuity of the aspiration, the two divided pipes are connected by means of another pipe sunk in the ground, which curves back at a right angle at its two ends, to branch into their lower portion. The points of junction are above the valves of entrance and exit, which the interruption of the pipes compels them to put at their extremity. When in a proper state for use, the valve at the extremity of the pipe at the side by which the train would arrive is closed, as well as the entrance-valve of the other pipe. When the leading carriage appears, the first will be opened as usual by the compressed air driven forwards by the piston. Another valve, placed in the pipe of communication, will be closed at the same time by the effect of the passage of the train. That at the entrance of the next pipe will be opened, when the piston shall have entered this pipe, by the valve-man, or, what is better still, by the train itself. Another means which might be employed consists in not dividing the pipe, but making two inclined planes at  $0.05^\circ$  of slope, per meter, for the passage of carriages. In this case three openings are required, two for the wheels of the carriages, and the third for the piston-rod, the wheel which presses the valve and the cylinder which compresses the composition. The openings would be too large and too deep to allow of their being left uncovered. It would be easy to adapt thick planks of deal, with a counterpoise for this purpose.”—p. 29.

In having occasion to consider attentively, and to cite from, the official reports presented to the English and French governments, we regret to have a comparison forced upon us disadvantageous to the former. The object of a government, in appointing competent judges to report upon any scientific subject, is not merely to have objections raised and difficulties suggested, but to have every advantage as well as every defect of the system explained intelligibly and impartially. This is the view which M. Teisserenc and M. Mallet have taken of their duty; they have given precisely the information, fully and candidly, which might enable the French government to form their opinion on the merits of the invention, and their reports contain a large body of valuable information and remarks. In the English report, whilst the applicability of the atmospheric principle and its advantages, in point both of economy and safety, are distinctly admitted, these admissions appear to be unwillingly extorted, and every advantage is reduced to its minimum of computation. In the French reports, the importance of trying the merits of the invention is pressed upon the government, and an earnest desire is manifested to promote the investigation of a great work of national importance.

The historical sketch of the invention and application of the Atmospheric Railway here terminates; it is no longer an experiment, but an established means of transit, tested and proved by fair and repeated trials, and by the opinions of the most eminent engineers,* English and continental, who have witnessed and watched its success, and expressed their opinions satisfactorily upon the subject. Indeed, it is this testimony that has induced us to offer the present article to our readers: we waited until practical results had been obtained, and the merits of the invention had been placed beyond a doubt, before we felt it right to express an opinion. It has ceased to be a question limited to the circle of purely scientific inquiry, and now comes to be regarded in the results of its application; the power being once obtained, it remains only for enterprise to accomplish the rest, and to render it available to the service of man. The subject of the atmospheric railway has, since the opening of the Dalkey line, excited a daily growing interest, and the attention of governments and companies is drawn more and more to the adoption of the system.

In the course of a recent discussion in the House of Commons, on the appointment of a select committee to consider the standing-orders relating to railways, Sir Robert Peel stated that he had concurred in the opinion,— “That the public and the government are not to be precluded from availing themselves of any suggested improvement or invention of science, which may probably affect the present railway property; as also in the remark that we are not to be called on to compensate a company for its choosing a line upon which it may have been found necessary to expend £60,000 per mile. Far from it; if you can successfully compete, by means of any invention, upon a turnpike-road with such a railway company, you are perfectly at liberty to do so. If new discoveries are made applicable to rapid conveyances, the public will avail itself of them, and those improvements will always be the best security and check against imposition or exaction. What may be attempted by means of the Atmospheric Railroad it is difficult to conjecture; but I know that those who have witnessed its exhibition near Dublin, have returned to this country with changed opinions as to its applicability to longer lines than one or two miles. The proprietors of railways must soon find out that they are deceiving themselves if they neglect to provide third-class carriages. But the true interests of society will best be protected by holding over them the checks of competition, and of the improvements that may take place in science, rather than by attempting forcibly to control these companies, by attempting to reduce their profits or take the management of their property out of their own hands.†”

This is the sound and only safe course of legislation,—to encourage competition, is an indirect and proper means of checking monopoly.

* Amongst the opinions expressed by the most eminent of our engineers is that of Mr. Brunel. The prospectus of the Gravesend and Chatham Company, which has recently appeared, contains a recommendation of the Committee, founded upon the opinion of their engineer, I. K. Brunel, Esq., to adopt the atmospheric system. The prospectus states that,—“The Committee, having made a satisfactory enquiry as to the decided economy with which the Dublin and Kingstown Extension Railway is now being worked as an Atmospheric Line, and their Engineer having satisfied himself as to the advantages this plan of motive power affords, recommend its adoption on the proposed line of communication, both as a means of keeping the capital within a very moderate compass and increasing the profits by a reduced charge of working.”

† See debate of February 6, 1844. The importance of the Atmospheric Railway has been several times forcibly

In consequence of the determination of the government to continue the mail-packet station at Holyhead, a line of railroad is projected from that place to join the Chester line. With a view to ascertain the practicability of adopting the atmospheric principle on this line, (chiefly as a means of obtaining for the mails a considerable increase of speed,) Mr. Robert Stevenson has been desired to examine the works on the Dalkey railway, and to furnish a report to the government.

We shall, in conclusion of this article, briefly advert to some of the advantages which may be derived from the adoption of the atmospheric railway, in a social, industrial and commercial point of view. We have here a new and astonishing application of power opened to us, and it is impossible to anticipate all the important results to which this may lead. Success has silenced the questionings and hostility of interested opponents to the system; and if men are wise, they will at least pause before they rush into new speculations on a system which will probably soon be superseded.

The introduction of the atmospheric railway opens a new era in the means of transit, because, from the great reduction in the cost of construction and working, it is clear that we must enter upon an entirely new scale of economical calculations. This will operate in manifold ways; it will enable railway companies to lower their rates, whilst deriving even greater profits than at present, and thus to open means of travelling to larger classes of the community. Again: one great feature in the atmospheric railway is, that it is practicable on lines of road where the locomotive system is wholly inapplicable and useless. Let any one take a map of England and trace the net of railroads which have come into active operation within a few years: let him imagine this immense benefit, which at present is restricted by the cost attending it to traffic between large towns, extended over the whole country, carrying passengers and produce from one little market-town to another, bringing all this advantage to every man's door and placing it within every man's enjoyment. The benefits to the nation, in calling out her industrial powers, assisting her commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests, form too large a subject for us to enter upon here, but too obvious and important a consideration to escape attention. In a moral point of view, likewise, the result would be to extend largely the advantages of social intercourse and of education in every shape, which are now only to be found in large communities,—in fact, of centralizing the power and raising the moral character of the nation.

We have uniformly urged the importance of calling into action, by multiplying facilities, all the sources of our national wealth; and we have pointed this out as one great means of substantially benefitting Ireland. To unfold the resources of a country, is to teach a people their value,—the most important lesson of national politics and national economy conveyed in the most practical and intelligible form. It is impossible to estimate the change which a large system of railroads intersecting Ireland in every direction, stimulating production and exciting the energies of her population, would produce; and if that country, whose interests we are bound to promote, not less from mo-alluded to in the House of Commons, and we observe that Mr. Shaw has given notice of a motion, after the Easter recess, for the appointment of “a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the importance of an early and complete trial of the Atmospheric Railway.”

tives of policy than of justice, has a claim to share in any great work of national benefit, it has an especial claim in the present instance, where Irishmen have been foremost to second the efforts of English skill and talent, and to overcome the obstacles opposed to the public good by private interests and monopoly. If the Atmospheric Railway should prove, as we anticipate, a new source of benefit to mankind, it will be remembered, not ungratefully in this country, that to Ireland we owe its first encouragement and adoption.

Extending our view to the Continent, some idea may be formed of the extent to which the nations of Europe will be benefited by this invention of Mr. Clegg, from the length of the lines of railways now constructing in central Europe.*

In Austria the line from Trieste to Vienna is progressing. The atmospheric pressure removes the grand difficulty presented within a short distance of the capital, at the traverse of the chain of Alps which forms the boundary of Styria. Without such aid it would be a most costly work to carry a railroad over the Noric and Carnian Alps to the sea, even if the plan of inclined planes were resorted to. From Vienna the line passes to Olmütz, where it branches off westward through Prague to Dresden and Hamburg. From Olmütz a second line goes northward to the Riesen mountains, and through Silesia to Stettin. A third line, which runs to the salt mines of Galicia, will join the Russian railroad from Cracow to the Baltic, by the valley of the Vistula. In mountainous countries, the momentum acquired from descents is available for succeeding ascents, and the difficulties in the one system become facilities in the other.

The prosperity of Hungary is indissolubly linked with a good communication between the valley of the Save and the Adriatic Sea. A road of sufficient width, and of splendid construction—a monument of the public spirit of the Hungarian nobles—runs over the Julian Alps from Carlsbad to Vienna; its length is ninety English miles. The atmospheric railway could profitably be adapted to that road, whose gradients, although moderate, no locomotive engine could overcome. In this manner, the energies of twenty millions of Austrian and Turkish subjects would be made available in the markets of Europe, and the products of some of the finest countries of this quarter of the globe would be added to the general stock.

Berlin is to be connected with Hamburg by a direct line, and with the Rhine by two lines of railways. One will pass through Minden to Düsseldorf and Cologne, and there unite with the Belgic-Rhenish net. A second will pass through Cassel to Frankfort, and join the Taunus railway. To the east, a line to Königsberg is projected. From Frankfort, Hesse Darmstadt is continuing the Taunus line to Heidelberg and Mannheim, where the Baden net will take it up, and carry the communication on to the Swiss frontier. A railway is now constructing from Basle to Zürich. The Wirtemberg net of railways will connect the Baden and Hessian nets with the lake of Constance and with Bavaria: they cross the heights that separate the Rhine and its tributaries from the Danube. One line of this net, which has been considered scarcely practicable, is that from the Rhine by the way of Pforzheim and Stuttgart to Ulm, in which the ascent at Geisslingen is looked upon as insurmountable. By the aid of the atmospheric pressure this obstacle can be overcome, and the Rhine be connected with the Danube at the shortest interval. The Bavarian net is to consist of a central line running from the foot of the Alps to Saxony, which is to be traversed at right angles by a line from the Austrian to the Wirtemberg frontier, passing through Munich to Augsburg.

A most important decision has been made in Bavaria, to commence the line that is to connect Bamberg with Frankfort immediately. The country between these two towns is so mountainous, that it would require an immense outlay to construct a locomotive railroad. The atmospheric system, by availing itself of the principle of gravity, might perhaps be even more economically adapted to such a line than to a level.

Of the immense advantages which these vast countries will derive from the adoption of the atmospheric pressure to railway carriages it is therefore needless to say much. The anxiety entertained in all these countries to be released from the necessity of providing coals for these lines has been proved, by the reward of 100,000 florins voted by the Germanic Diet to the inventor of a galvanic machine at Frankfort. It is true that the machine has not been finished, and the money is consequently not yet paid. No machine depending upon a moving principle scarcely less costly than coals, can pretend to vie with the beautiful simplicity of the atmospheric pressure.

It is not merely the difficulty of providing coals that is an obstacle to railways on the continent. The cost of carriage of such a bulky article, in a country where the communications are indifferent, is a serious inconvenience, and one that, on the large net of railways we have described, would form an enormous drain upon the industrial resources of the country. A similar difficulty presents itself in central India, where railroads connecting the capitals have become almost indispensable, both in a military and in a political point of view. With the atmospheric system, the difficulty of collecting depôts of coal is obviated, and we may soon expect to see a railway connecting Bombay and Calcutta.

In this article we have endeavored to give our readers, first, an historical sketch of an invention which promises to realize such important benefits; secondly, an intelligible description of the construction and working of the apparatus; and thirdly, an examination of the merits of the system. We have consequently deemed it necessary to extract largely from all the reports and documents hitherto published, in separate and detached forms, —to cite the opinions of those eminent engineers who have instituted experiments and carefully examined the system in all its bearings, and lastly, to give the results obtained on the trials that have been made: these are of a peculiar value at this stage of the invention, as affording facts upon which calculations and reasoning may be grounded. We have carefully considered what might be most serviceable to the public to know, and in conclusion must express a hope, that the recommendation urged upon the French Government by M. Mallet, to give the system a fair and full trial, will not be thrown away upon the government of our own country.

* At the end of last year there were twenty-one lines of railroad open in Germany, the total length of which was 1033 miles. The railways then in progress would extend to nearly 1000 miles. Since that period many others have been projected.

THE LIVING AGE.

No. 6.—22 JUNE, 1844.

CONTENTS.

|  | PAGE.                                       |
|--|---|
| Correspondence, . . . . .  | 322   |
| 1. The Man of Genius, . . . . .  | A little French Novel, 323           |
| 2. The Dodo, . . . . .   | Bentley's Miscellany, 331            |
| 3. Shakspeare at the Court of Victoria, . . . . .  | Punch, 332                           |
| 4. Another Review of Jesse's Life of Brummell, . . . . .   | Spectator, 333                       |
| 5. TOPICS OF THE DAY.—Political Judges, . . . . .  | 337   |
| Bigotry of Laissez Faire, . . . . .  | 338   |
| Sivori's Morning Concert, . . . . .  | 339   |
| Taxation of Mottoes, . . . . .   | 339   |
| Cheapest Nation in the World, . . . . .  | 340   |
| 6. Poetical Works of Leigh Hunt, . . . . .   | Examiner, 342                        |
| 7. Books for the Working Classes, . . . . .  | " 343                                       |
| 8. South American and African Guano, . . . . .   | Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, 344 |
| 9. Kendall's Santa Fe Expedition, . . . . .  | Spectator, 346                       |
| 10. More Letters of Horace Walpole, . . . . .  | Examiner, 351                        |
| 11. Wilfulness of Woman, . . . . .   | " 352                                       |
| 12. The Sliding Scale of Manners, . . . . .  | Fraser's Magazine, 353               |
| 13. The Hermit of Cripplegate, . . . . .   | Ainsworth's Magazine, 361            |
| 14. Major Harris's Highlands of Æthiopia, . . . . .  | Tait's Magazine, 366                 |
| 15. Richard Rolle—William Dunbar, . . . . .  | Chambers' Cyclopaedia, 382           |
| 16. POETRY.—To the Age-fearing, 332—Trooper's Song, 336—Wilson's Last Wish—Try Again, 341—Prophetic Echo, 349—Poor Man to his Dead Child—To a Wild Bird, 381.  |   |
| 17. SCRAPES.—Hints for Publicists—Love of Country—Export Extraordinary, 330—Art Unions—Riddle—Diving Bell, 336—Slips of the Tongue—Submarine Plough—Difficulty and Perseverance, 341—Statue of Louis Philippe—French Colonies, 343—Writing under Difficulties—Charade, 349—Stuckey's Patent Filter—Hong Kong Panorama—Jews in Russia, 350—Foreign Affairs, 352—Permanent Influence of the Crusades—Potatoes with the Bones in—Hungary, 360—Old and New Style, 365—Female Friendship—Old Beau Bit, 384. |   |

BOSTON:

E. LITTELL & CO., 118½ WASHINGTON STREET.

BOSTON.—REDDING & Co.—JORDAN & Co.—HOTCHKISS & Co.
 NEW YORK.—MOWATT & Co.—SUN OFFICE.—BURGESS & STRINGER.
 PHILADELPHIA.—CLAUDE & CANNING—R. G. BERFORD—ZIEBER & Co.
 BALTIMORE.—N. HICKMAN—W. TAYLOR.
 ALBANY.—W. C. LITTLE—GEORGE JONES. PORTLAND.—GEORGE COLMAN.
 CINCINNATI.—ROBINSON & JONES.
 NEW ORLEANS.—BRAVO & MORGAN.

We have submitted to the Post Office department, a claim to send the Living Age as a newspaper to all parts of the country. That we print carefully, and dry and press our work before distributing it, ought not to be an impediment to it. And it is more a newspaper than many others to which the privileges of that order have been adjudged.

We have still some hope that the present Congress (for it is still in session while we write) may enact some law which will save to us and the postmasters all difficulty of construction, and will allow the public the fuller enjoyment of what ought to be one of the chief advantages of our government. If public opinion has been so far respected in England as to cause the establishment of cheap postage—may not we expect to have it, especially after the success of the experiment in Great Britain? The revenue of this department would be increased, if the postage were greatly lessened. If there be no reform, private enterprise will undermine it. We had offers to carry the Museum at one quarter the government price. It is true that this would not have been available for the scattering residences of very distant subscribers—but it would have taken away most of what is profitable to the Post Office. We wait in hope of better policy.

This number of the Living Age is dated 22d June—but the editor's labor on it ends at least a week before that time. It must afterwards pass through the hands of the printer—and being dried and pressed must then remain at the bookbinder's a day or two. Then it is our calculation to have it sent away so early as to travel hundreds of miles before the day of its date. In order that subscribers in distant places, who are supplied by resident booksellers, may receive the work early, we shall hereafter be ready to deliver it to country dealers, on or before Thursday. It may be well therefore for them to leave orders beforehand with their Boston booksellers, or at this office.

The Man of Genius we give more as a specimen of a French Tale, than for any great merit of its own. And yet it gives us some insight into the French marriage customs—of which we read so much in another shape, in connexion with Madame Lafarge.

Brummell we give again, because the Spectator's review is kinder—and because the additional anecdotes are sure to be entertaining.

We very much like the Spectator. It has a practical, sagacious view of all matters. It is one thing to be well-read in the science of Political Economy, and a far higher to apply its principles in actual life. The artificial state of society and industry in England, makes wise and necessary, many variations from what might be true doctrine in countries less crowded, and more natural. See the article on Laissez Faire.

Leigh Hunt was terribly mangled, under the title of the Cockney School, by the vigorous and unscrupulous partisanship of Blackwood. A great part of his life has passed under the shadow of this thunder-cloud. In his declining years the better part of his character has a more favorable exposure, so far as criticism is concerned. The Examiner is good authority in all matters of taste, apart from his political prejudices, and his hatred of the church and "priests."

Cheap "Books for the People" are manufactured to great extent in England. There it is found possible, as we hope to show that it is here, to combine reduction of price with great neatness of execution. Many of these cheap English books are really models of elegant simplicity in printing, &c.

"Ethiopia shall yet stretch forth her hands unto God." We published more than a year ago a very good article upon Moffat's Missionary Researches in Southern Africa, which opened a new scene to all readers, and was very popular. The book itself has since been reprinted here, and has met with a good sale. Major Harris's book is another very important opening of this dark continent, and we shall probably have traveller after traveller reporting to us. We earnestly advise our younger readers to peruse articles such as these with the map before them—so as to have clearer views of the geographical and other connexions. A large globe in an accessible corner, (cannot Yankee ingenuity make a three foot globe for a possible sum? we have seen English paper globes inflated with air)—a large globe at hand—and maps on the walls of a dining-room or hall, or as near the reader's eye as possible, would perform a very important part in the education of children, and be of great use at the same time to their parents.

Captain Sabertash in The Sliding Scale of Manners has many hits which will tell as well here as in England.

We have not overlooked the article on the Marquis of Custine's Russia—and were amused at the complete dissection, exposure and refutation to which his critic subjects him. He appears to be as little of a gentleman as the English marquis, Londonderry. But his book is hardly of sufficient interest in the United States, to justify us in copying so long an article. And upon the general subject—Russia—we think we can find better matter.

Translated, without acknowledgment, for the World of Fashion.

THE MAN OF GENIUS; A LITTLE FRENCH NOVEL.

CHAPTER I.

THERE was nothing spoken of, for more than three weeks, in the little town of S—, but the approaching marriage of the daughter of M. Gaudiffret the notary, who after twenty-five years spent in the exercise of all the virtues of his calling, at length looked forward to the enjoyment of repose, and was about to resign his charge in favor of a young man, who combined all the necessary qualities to fit him to become at once his successor and his son-in-law. M. Gaudiffret destined both his office and the hand of his beloved daughter, Herminie, for the happy man, the choice of whom had cost him a great deal of trouble and anxiety; for he had been obliged to institute the most minute and complicated inquiries, and to lavish all the art of most laborious diplomacy, together with no small sum in the way of travelling expenses, in order to obtain, on the occasion, exact and satisfactory information, and sufficient guarantees of aptitude, and above all, of morality. Thus had M. Gaudiffret found a son-in-law, who, if not highly accomplished, at least promised to constitute the happiness of Herminie, and to continue the prosperity of the establishment; and this son-in-law, so selected and approved, this son-in-law who had passed through so difficult an ordeal, was no other than the second clerk of one of the first scrivener's offices in Paris; a young man who, after five or six years of a painful apprenticeship, had limited his ambition to the humble position of a provincial notary.

M. Gaudiffret, who was resolved to take on his own shoulders the whole responsibility of choosing a husband for his daughter, and seemed to feel a kind of paternal pride in declining the intervention of every officious matchmaker and intermeddler, addressed those few words only to Herminie, after his return from the capital, where he had just concluded the final matrimonial preliminaries:—

"My daughter, my dear daughter, you will be satisfied."

In vain did Herminie enquire into details—those explanations which are so interesting to young ladies on the eve of pronouncing the fatal "yes;" in vain did she seek to gratify her legitimate curiosity as to what her father had seen, or as to the motives which had determined him in his choice.

M. Gaudiffret entrenched himself behind a wall of impenetrable reserve. He evaded her questions; and when Herminie, provoked and annoyed by this inflexible silence, threatened her father with some manifestation of ill-humor, the notary had recourse to the invariable formula of,

"My dear—dear daughter, you shall be satisfied."

At length Herminie came to the prudent resolution of awaiting with resignation the moment when she would be able to form her own opinion of her father's judgment in the affair. She feared, indeed, that M. Gaudiffret might not have been too indulgent upon certain points, the importance of which he did not perhaps fully appreciate; but at all events the husband, in search of whom he had gone to Paris, possessed in the eyes of Herminie a recommendation which predisposed her favorably towards him; for not only did he come from Paris, but he had even pursued all his studies there, and that not in an obscure boarding school, but in a royal college, renowned for its princely patronage, and for its classic connexion with the Tuileries.

Miss Herminie had no very decided taste for the profession of a notary. If her father had consulted her, or taken into account her peculiar inclinations and secret sympathies, he would have discovered that her imagination had sometimes pictured to her a husband entirely unconnected with the business of old files and musty manuscripts. She had hoped that marriage would at least have delivered her from the ennui of a country town, and it was on this account that she had shown herself so severe, so rigorous, indeed, towards her numerous local admirers. She could not suppose—she could not for a moment admit, that a young man in the provinces could be possessed of any mind or good taste; and although she looked with an indulgence, no doubt somewhat prejudiced, on the little town of S—; although she could discover in it the traces of a sufficiently advanced state of civilization, in point of luxury and industry, she had not seen in it any young man who was worthy of the hand of M. Gaudiffret's heiress.

It was, therefore, an important concession, a great sacrifice, which this gentleman had made to his daughter's taste, in undergoing the fatigue and expense of a peregrination to the metropolis, in search of a Parisian husband for the haughty and fastidious Herminie; but at the same time it must be confessed—and this circumstance might have diminished some of the merit of his devotedness in the eyes of his daughter—that M. Gaudiffret enjoyed the occasion as one which enabled him to see Paris, of which he had previously no knowledge, except whatever he had gleaned from the narratives of travellers, and from books of geography.

Thus had the old notary, in pardoning Herminie for her ill-founded repugnance to the aspirants of her native town, calculated on her entire and unreserved docility in other matters. He could not entertain the slightest apprehension that his daughter would raise any other more exorbitant pretensions. He wished his son-in-law to be a notary, and to take his office as a fortune with his daughter; and Herminie had resigned herself to submit to this decree of the paternal will.

At length came the happy day—the great day fixed on for the arrival of the intended son-in-law, whom M. Gaudiffret had chosen.

A letter from the young man preceded him in the town of S—, announcing that he would alight from the diligence about noon, provided, indeed, the conducteur did not deceive him.

Herminie was most anxious to peruse this missive, which her imagination had transformed into an epistle full of tenderness and sentiment; but the old notary obstinately refused to gratify his daughter's curiosity, by allowing her to judge of this specimen of Parisian style. He had, perhaps, divined Herminie's intention; and as the letter of the intended happened to be a singular example of conciseness, he hastened to deposit it in his pocket, after having announced to his daughter the news of an approaching arrival, which would put an end to her impatience and her incertitude.

It had just struck eleven by the time-piece in the old notary's cabinet, when Herminie knocked at his door.

"Well, what is wanted now?" said M. Gaudiffret, assuming an air of bad humor.

The door opens.

"T is I, papa."

"Ah! I was thinking so; but why do you come to disturb me?"

"What! is it not at noon that M. Bernard is to arrive?"

"Yes. But what then? Let him come."

"But, papa, would it not be proper——"

"To go and meet him, is it? To help him off the diligence? Could you think of such a thing, my dear! What opinion would Bernard form of us and of our habits! It is his business to come, and ours to wait here."

Herminie blushed on receiving this short lesson on taste and decorum.

"Ah! truly, you are right, papa," she said; "and I quite forgot that M. Bernard is a young man from Paris; that he understands the rules of politeness, and above all, of his position."

